GOING FOR THE GOLDEN GOAL.

Incidents in the Voyage of the Pioneer Ship Tarolinta—1849.

BY DR. J. C. TUCKER.

The Hotel Farrus, facing the quay landing at Rio Janeiro, an excellent restaurant kept by a Frenchman, was continually crowded and never closed its doors. It was said there were 3,000 Yankee Doodles in the city. It was there that the new-comers usually experienced the consternation regarding the amount of their bills in Brazilian currency, so amusingly described by Mark Twain.

A portion of our cargo out; fresh water taken in; our deck-load somewhat reduced by discharge and better stowage, with loads of fruit, wine, preserves, etc., coming over the side, purchases of passengers—the order was at last given: "Heave away on your anchor."

Once more the old familiar chorus of our sable crew rang out: "Storm along, stormy!" Then came the mate's response, "Anchor weighed, sir!" and amid pealing cheers from the remaining vessels, heartily acknowledged by ours in echo, with flags dipping and canvas filling, we slowly glided out of the lovely harbor of Rio Janeiro. The prow of the good ship turned southward on a direct course for Cape Horn. Off the Rio de la Plata, S. A., March 15, we were howling along twelve knots an hour, and going too fast to speak a homeward bound Boston brig that passed, or even learn her name. It was the first one on the home stretch we had met since leaving New York. She, too, was flying on the other tack, so we could only signal her, and exhibit the large canvas sign with our name and destination painted on it, the same used on the vessel in New York before sailing. The sea was running very high, but with glasses they must have easily made it out. Those wonderful native boats—catamarans—were, nevertheless, outrunning us in this sea, and out of sight of shore. Our run down the remainder of the South American coast was rapid and without any startling incident. The usual shoal of dolphins leaped and plunged beneath our bows, and many were harpooned. We eagerly looked for the poetically beautiful "changing hues of the dying dolphin," but while we certainly found enough to sustain the sentimental hypothesis, we generally conceded it to be a sentimental fiction. Sunfish, porpoises, shark we caught, cooked, and ate of them all. Whales without number were around us. The sea was luminous at night with phosphorescent anemones, while the sun reflected back a thousand different tints from the fleets of nautilus through which we sailed. The Southern Cross grew brighter as we neared it, and finally the "Magellan clouds," that mysterious constellated triad of clouds that regularly rise and set south of the straits of that name, guided us as did the pillar of fire the good prophet Moses. The days grew shorter, the nights seemed interminable. It was growing colder, too, and anon the grateful aroma of hot whiskies could now be detected in the cabin atmosphere. Let me copy a few lines from an old letter, descriptive of this portion of the trip: "The day was beautifully clear on which we saw in the distance off our starboard bow, the barren and inhospitable shores of Staten Land. Under a favorable breeze we rapidly neared them, and by five p. m. were directly off the bluffs of Cape St. John. Suddenly one of those fierce storms of wind and rain peculiar to the cape, in less time than I have occupied in writing this, overcast the before clear sky, and under close-reefed sails, the Tarolinta was scudding before it to the southeast. It had been the captain's intention to run through the Straits of Magellan, between the main land and Terra del Fuego. As it was, the sudden change of wind drove us into currents and latitudes that nearly ended there our voyage." We were driven as far south as 60 deg., much farther south, indeed, than I care to again go. To be sure the icebergs were grandly magnificent—when not so dangerously near; but I have never wished to see ice since outside of a pitcher. With our decks and rigging crystallized with ice, growing thicker each day; with hatches battened down, as the vessel pitched bows under into the high seas and counter currents that knocked the headway out of her, we spoke the brig Attila bound for California likewise. As severe as was the cold to us Norsemen, it benumbed and nearly rendered powerless our negro crew—nearly all from the South. At last the order was given to "Keep her away," and, her prow turned northward, a cheer of gratitude and relief arose from the forlorn and frozen crew and passengers.

Many amusing incidents and practical jokes naturally occurred among one hundred and twenty-five young men, confined aboard ship so long off the Cape, where we buffeted head winds, chop seas, and tides; for nearly two weeks we had but six hours of daylight. There was no fire in the cabins, and no room for exercise below.

The chances of washing or slipping overboard on deck were as excellent for landsmen as were those of frosted hands, feet, or nose. Those who imagined their supply of "grog" would last to Valparaiso, suddenly found frequent hot drinks had made low-tide in the demijohn. Liquor of any kind sold at mining prices—$5 a bottle. Even that price advanced as the stock grew less.

A speculative passenger had bought a barrel of gin at Rio, and bottled it aboard, to retail to the mines. He reluctantly parted with a few well-watered bottles at "50¢ a glass, buyer 5," when a conspiracy inveigled him upon deck, while his stateroom was burglarized, and the most of the bottles emptied and refilled with water. After that he was surprised at nobody's wanting any more gin at any price, until he sampled it himself one day, and discovered the raid made on him.

In ours—the largest stateroom—called the Star Chamber, a great chest of Dr. Phinney's, yeelp "the ark and covenant," was secured to the floor, in the center of the room, with cleats around the upper edges to keep things on. This was our table. Fastened upon it burned almost continually the spirit lamp, beating water for "hot stuff," coffee, or tea.

During the dark and tedious hours, there were gathered there some of the choicest of the good fellows—George Vail, and Pearson, of Troy, N. Y., Judge Munson (afterward on the bench at Sacramento City), William C. Hoff, Bob Sterling, Dan. Norcross, William S. O'Brien, Nicholas DePeyster, Coddington, Captain Langdon, and many others. The last stateroom forward, the Star Chamber, was next the ship's pantry. Only a thin partition separated the apartments. For our mess of nine, bribery for a long time obtained from the pantryman extra luxuries for our private suppers. But there came a time when sardines and pies were as scarce as liquors.

One night the foraging committee reported the discovery of a ten-gallon keg of something, located in the pantry near the stateroom partition. A diamond drill in the shape of a gimlet was at once run, closely followed by a tube, and the result to the ingenious "nine" was a stream of very choice brandy! Judge Munson manufactured an excellent article of arrack from alcohol (intended for medicinal purposes) and burned sugar (caramel). As the steaming arrack-punch or simmering port wine went round, wit, sentiment, and folly found vent. The following words, set to the tune of "A Wet Sheet and a Flowing Sea," were written and sung then with a roaring chorus:

Here's a health, my boys, to our island home
Far o'er the foaming brine,
And a toast to the better days to come,
And the jolly club of nine.

We'll drink to the lovely girls so trim,
And the blissful hours spent,
And pledge our glasses to the brim
O'er our "Ark and Covenant."
CHORUS—Here's a health, etc.
We'll meet, my boys, in future days
As miners rough and free,
And think how hard it was to raise
A glass of grog at sea.
We'll drink to old King Alcohol,
Sardines, and ship pantry,
And fill our glasses to the Club
With smoking "porteree."

Great was the wonderment of the destitute at the never-failing and varied supply of the Star Chamber. The neatly fitting section of a partition board was removed, and the pantry quietly relieved of a surplus of sardines, smoked beef, hams, tongues, etc. Before the astonished steward could locate his loss, the keg was drawn off, and at a time when the pantry door was open, adroitly turned around. The gimlet hole was previously plugged up in the partition, and no traces of the "diamond drill on the lower level" left to betray our move.

The Devil's Frying Pan, a manuscript paper, edited and read by Mr. Lawrence once a week, was the medium of many good and many bad things. The contributions were generally anonymous, and dropped through a hole in the editor's stateroom door. The weaknesses and follies of all were ventilated oftener with more malice than mercy.

As the days grew longer, and the warm, sunny atmosphere of the South Pacific thawed us out, the old deck-yarns were renewed. Then the Hon. Caleb Lyons of Lyonsdale came up from below, with a Turkish rug of divers colors upon his arm and a Turkish smoking-cap upon his flaming locks. As he sat cross-legged upon his mat and smoked his pipe, he modestly told us how he was appointed by the United States Government Minister Plenipotentiary and (very) Extraordinary to Constantinople. The recital of his interview with the Pashas, the customs of the country, etc., were very entertaining, for the Hon. Caleb was a man of much erudition and an acknowledged elocutionist and poet.

On the 24th of April, in latitude 50 deg. 9 min., longitude 40 deg. 10 min., off the southern coast of Chile, I attained my majority. On that day, there was nearly a mutiny on board the ship, because of the scanty food served. The Frying Pan contained many bitter things against the captain and the owners. A doggerel in the paper put our wants into song with a chorus—quoting the captain's invariable reply on the question of short grub—

"It's down in the hold,
But we'll get it out to-morrow."

An indignation meeting of sufferers who had "gone short" on raisins in their plum duff, pea soup, lobscouse, and other toothsome marine viands, appointed a committee of three of the leanest men to remonstrate again, and finally, with the captain. That worthy matelot was—as frequently—taking his afternoon siesta in his stateroom. To several respectful taps upon the door of that sacred temple there came no response. A more energetic rap from the thinnest committeeman elicited an inquiry, "Who's there?" Then came an explanation through the door, abruptly closed by a deeply base abjuration from the commander, consigning the lean committeeman to the lowest level.

Then the committee returned to the meeting, begged leave to report, and asked to be discharged from further consideration of the subject-matter! The same was then considered in committee of the whole passengers, with the following result. But first let me go back and describe the personnel of our worthy commander. In appearance, he was a powerful man, fully six feet four inches in height. A long, tangled yellow beard and moustache, with wild unkempt hair, and eyes of the same gamboge hue; he usually wore an old coat—faded to a harmonizing color. In stormy weather, the same blending of tints was preserved by a huge oilskin coat and "sou'ester."

Now, at Rio several goats were taken aboard as "fresh meat," and served up as early spring lamb. The veteran of the herd—an old ram—caught and broke a leg in an endeavor to jump out of the pen. It was set, the pet goat meanwhile enjoying the freedom of the decks and becoming a pet with all hands.

On this occasion the veteran was caught, his goatie yellowed by ochre paint, and with the captain's trumpet swung around his neck, the old sou'ester over the goat's horns, and the long-tailed oilskin coat bound around his body, he was quietly coaxed near the captain's stateroom door. There, when he had been irritated into a bucking humor, and was poised to pitch into his tormenter, who stood against the door, the knob was turned, it gave way, and the goat, in full paraphernalia, pitched headlong into the stateroom, and into the low berth opposite, where the commander lay. When the door again opened, and that unfortunate goat came hurriedly out on his ear, there was not a passenger within twenty feet of it. The commander did not reappear for twelve hours after. The breeze changed to fair, but the ship slid along under scant sail only, for the skipper still slept, and he alone could reef or carry. Nothing was gained by that charge.

With the majority of the passengers pea soup was a favorite article of our prescribed diet. Some of them had unlimited capacity for the article, and as it was whispered that the stock of dried peas was nearly exhausted, these soup sharps determined to make a corner in it by strategy. The "Doctor" (chief cook at sea) was not a particularly handsome or cleanly personage. He lived under a dirty old skull cap, the original color of which, indistinguishable with layers of grease, dirt, and smoke, had softened to a hue becoming his Ethiopian complexion.

As the soup was served, several of the sharps sat back and declined it. This elicited remarks of surprise from others.

"Why, how is it you fellows don't eat soup to-day?"

"Never mind," was the reply; "you can eat our share. No more pea soup for us!"

Urged to explain, the chief sharp spoke as follows:

"You know the old skull cap the 'Doctor' wears? Well, today, while he was stirring up the pea soup, it dropped from his woolly head into the soup-kettle. He fished it with a fork, and wrung it out into the kettle."

This recital was given loudly and listened to attentively. A general pushing back of plates followed, with "a marked decline in and little subsequent demand for" pea-soup.

I extract from an old letter as follows:

"VALPARAISO, CHILE, May 13, 1849.—Madam Aubrey's Hotel, Calle de Flores. Here, in this vale of Paradise, I sit down to address you again. After a long and tedious doubling of the Cape, we arrived here yesterday at 3 p. m. For the last eight days we had been within one hundred miles of the port, bucking head winds and tides; and we reached it just in time, too, for the heavy 'norther' that sprung up last night would drive before it any vessel outside.

"It would do your eyes good to see the great bars of solid gold that are constantly—and apparently carelessly—carried through this city on the shoulders of porters. One bar (much larger than that of soap) is a full load for one man. They are from California; and you can imagine how we long to reach there, feeling that our very step here is debarring our participation. The United States sloop-of-war Dale arrived here the day before us from San Francisco. She brings gold, and most cheering intelligence of increased quantities found. I have conversed with many of the officers, and gleaned from them much valuable information respecting the mines. They all had leave of absence, and one young "middy," sixteen years old, is said to have dug $70,000 in two weeks. Everybody that can, has left, or is preparing to leave this place for California. The Sutton, Laura Virginia, Croton, and Mary Stuart have arrived here."

Valparaiso was literally alive with Yankees en route for California when we landed. From Midshipman's Row to El Mandrel they swarmed, indulging in every conceivable eccentricity, prodigality, and prank. As they were generally good-natured, and spending money freely, their humors were indulged by the inhabitants. It was the last port before entering San Francisco, where, Whittingtonlike, the gold could be picked up in the streets. What was the use of packing money there? Why not get rid of the loose coin here, and start fresh with gold dust—the California circulating medium? I was dining with some friends in a private room at a restaurant. A knock was heard on the door, which opened wide enough to admit an unquestionably Anglo-Saxon head, uttering the one query, "Yankee Doodle?" We responded: "Yes; come in." In walked a gentleman, who, in an indescribably funny way, introduced himself as Dr. Johnston, a passenger on one of the American ships in port, and "flat broke." He said he had been obliged to dine out, at national expense, for the last three days. Of course, we invited him to join us, and a more witty, entertaining fellow I never met. He said he was by profession a Bohemian, but a fellow passenger dying on his ship, he had bought his effects—a homeopathic book and case of medicines—and proposed to practice medicine in California. Hence his title. His medicines were harmless, and he had engaged Nature to make the cures.

Dr. Johnston was afterward quite a politician in this city, and many of my readers may remember how near he came to hanging on the occasion of making a speech to a crowd—chiefly of Irish Democrats—on Portsmouth Plaza, in '51. "Who was the grandfather of Andrew Jackson, but an Irishman?" [Hooray! hooray!] Who was it that built the great cities and churches in the East—but the Irishmen? [Hooray! hooray!] Who is it that builds your great public buildings, your almshouses, your State prisons—but the Irishmen? [Hooray!] And who is it that fills them—but the Irish. [Hooray!]" Just there, as Johnston slipped off the stand, it dawned upon the crowd that Johnston was selling them. With a shout they rushed after him down Clay Street and into a saloon, that extended through the block to Merchant Street. Johnston had preceded the crowd sufficiently, however, to order the bar-keeper to set out his glasses, as "the whole Hibernian Club were going to drink!" He then dodged through into Merchant Street and escaped.

A party of half a dozen men from our vessel—including the Hon. Caleb!—landed, decorated with blue ribbons round their hats and in their button-holes. They registered at the hotel as "The Hon. Caleb Lyons and his suite," and inflated immensely. Our fellow-passenger, George Vail, heretofore spoken of as a man of big intellect and body—a gentleman in education and manners at all times—proposed to burlesque this aristocratic party. He hired an open barouche drawn by four gray mules, decorated with blue ribbons; and as many of our dainty sailors as could sit on the front seat, and hang behind, similarly ribboned. Likewise, bedecked with blue streamers, Vail sat upon the back seat, and was driven around to all of the hotels, registering as "The Hon. Geo. Vail and suite." At all times inclined to be waggish, Vail was particularly so after a few driks. Together we attended mass at the Grand Cathedral. A remarkably tall, handsome man, Vail had, a few days before we entered Valparaiso, to save his hair, shaved a small spot on the crown of his head. It happened to be similar to the custom of the Catholic priests. Out of respect for the religion, we both knelt, uncovered, among the devotees—principally women. To our mutual surprise, when the services ended, several women came forward and knelt before Vail, asking, in Spanish, for a blessing. They believed him a foreign priest—and he took the cue, immediately. To my horror, a very few moments saw him surrounded by a circle of pretty kneeling señoritas, upon whose heads he placed his hands most reverently, as he repeated something, in Latin, from—Æsop's fables. Directly, two priests walked down the aisle and saluted him as a brother—in Spanish, then in the language Vail responded in—French. They finally invited him into the sacristy, back of the altar, where I left him. The priests live well in Spanish America, and treated Vail like a lord!

We saw but little of him afterward, until on the morning we sailed. There was a "Procession of the Host" on that day, in which the priests walk two by two, carrying the insignia of the Church, or lighted candles. It was rich and interesting in the extreme to us, who had never before witnessed such a religious pageantry; but, as we knelt with the natives, while the procession passed, imagine our consternation and horror as we saw George Vail's towering but wavering form beside that of a fat little priest, equally unsteady, bringing up the rear of the line! They were both thoroughly besmeared with dropping wax from the lighted candles carried wabbly in their hands! You may rest assured we at once ran Vail into a small boat, and got him on board the ship. The city would have been a very dangerous place for him had his imposture been found out. My room-mate, P—, and myself were the last two on board. He had requested me, on the night before, to call at his quarters for him in the morning.

The ship was to sail at eight. The gun fired, and the welcome "anchor chorus" of our hearty crew rang out again. The last ship's boat, loading with the loitering passengers, reported that P— was not yet on board. Jumping into a carriage I started furiously for his late quarters, but happily met him—part of a curious party—on his way down to the embarradero. Sandwiched between Bacchus and Venus (a demijohn on one arm and a pretty señorita on the other), a porter following behind loaded with a multiplicity of things, they were leisurely sauntering along to the quay, while the Tarolinta, under steerage-way, was slowly getting up sail! Despite their remonstrances, P—, after many tender embraces, pathetic tears and poetic apostrophes, was tumbled, with his goods and gods (save the fair señorita), into a fast four-oared boat and, by a scratch, we reached the ship. La Señorita hermosa had, in an affecting little Spanish effusion, presented P— with the mirror in which she dressed her hair, "where her face would ever appear to him;" the reboso, so gracefully thrown about her head, which would ever exhale for him the perfume of her raven tresses he had so admired; and lastly, her poodle-dog—the poetical associations connected with which, owing to deficient Spanish, I failed to catch.

When the little group of waving handkerchiefs on the quay had grown dim, we were alongside the moving ship. A rope was thrown to us, and a rope-ladder lowered over the side. Tying the reboso around him, and slinging the mirror over his back, the gallant P—, bidding me bring along the poodle, dashed up the swinging ladder, amid the cheers of the amused passengers, with whom he was a great favorite. Ever courteous and gentlemanly, P— could not fail to recognize the compliment, and, forgetting the mirror, let go one hand to swing his hat, and the glass, with its sweet photographs, sank to the mermaids of the sea! For a while P— was utterly inconsolable, but finally concentrated his affection upon the poodle. The animal was in his arms a day carefully wrapped up in the reboso, and placed in a box, only to be as often found, under unfavorable circumstances, in somebody else's bed! As to the fragrant associations of the dark-eyed señorita's tresses, they were quickly supplanted by a doggerel, as my friend, DePeyster, once said:

THE DYSPEPTIC CLUB.

Interlocutors URUS, BOTTOM, AGRICOLA, GORGEOUS, POLLIWIG, ACETES.

URUS.—I was consulted during the week by a mother whose son—an industrious, bright, and good boy, nineteen years of age—has fallen into a puppy love with a country girl of the same age. The mother is much distressed, and I informed her I would lay the matter before the club. She thanked me, and begged that it should be a matter of discussion before dinner. She paid us the compliment of saying she thought the opinions of a set of old fogies given upon an empty stomach concerning the marriage of young people would be not otherwise than discouraging to any love proposition.

AGRICOLA.—The subject of marriage is one of the greatest importance, not only to the parties concerned, but to society at large. In order to consider it properly, we must have all the conditions of the parties set forth.

BOTTOM.—For heaven's sake, Agricola, be careful. You will let Polliwig and Gorgeous loose upon us with a deluge of statistics from Malthus, Sidney Smith, and Stuart Mill.

ACETES.—As for me, my mind is made up. I agree with Ouida, that "a young man married is a man that's married."

AGRICOLA.—Before Acetes gets started let us have the facts. The young man is nineteen?

URUS.—Just past nineteen.

AGRICOLA.—And the young woman?

URUS.—The same age within a few months. He is poor, and has no trade nor business. She is the only child of a well-to-do farmer, educated at a public school.

BOTTOM.—I say, let them marry. He can work on the farm; she can tend dairy, raise pigs, chickens, and children. The old folks will give way in time, and the young people will find themselves well to do farmers, going to church of a Sunday after fat farm horses, believing in God, paying their taxes—he a country magistrate, and she an honest woman.

ACETES.—Splendid prospect that. I am thinking of the boy. He is a boy. He thinks he is in love. He is a fool. All boys are fools. I always want to kick young fellows from eighteen to twenty-five. It is the asinine age—vain, foolish, piggyish, obstinate, they know more than their fathers. They think they know it all. They rush blindly into matrimony, and the result is either dissipation, crime, and worthlessness, a disappointed, soured old age, or a conventional relation between the parties that carries no sentiment beyond the honeymoon, and no real love or affection into the later years of married life.

BOTTOM.—Acetes has been abroad, and he would have our young people marry as they do in France—marriages of convenience and not of love, marriages made by parents and not by the parties, marriages resulting not from love but from business considerations.

ACETES.—I would have young people enter into the most important relation of life with some sense. After consideration, I would have them take the advice of parents upon this as upon all questions touching their future welfare. The boy seeks a profession or a trade by the advice of parents. He marries from the impulse of passion. He would not purchase a horse till he had consulted a jockey; he would marry a wife from fancy. She would consult her mother in buying a dress, take her advice in selecting a bonnet, but follow her own hot impulse in taking a husband.

URUS.—There is a great deal to be said in favor of the marriage of convenience—where the financial questions are to be considered, where the social standing of the parties is regarded, where the age, the pursuit, the habits of the parties are weighed.

BOTTOM.—When a girl is placed in a convent school, never sees a man except through bars, unless he is a father or brother, is kept locked and guarded as a prisoner from contact with the other sex, and when she finally takes a husband, accepts him as an escape from virtuous restraints. Compare French marriage and the domestic life of the Latin race with that of the English, German, and American, and you have the answer in the result.

GORGEOUS.—Bottom has the idea of all untraveled Americans regarding European, and especially regarding French, domestic life. I need not say untraveled, for the colony of Americans who centre around Charley Le Gay, at numero 2, Rue Scribe, that live at the Grand Hotel, and loaf along the Boulevards, and spend their days in looking at the shop windows in the Rue de la Paix, and their nights at Gardens Chantant and the Mabille, have no more idea of the family life of respectable Parisians than they have of the man in the moon. They never get an insight, they never cross the threshold, of the French home. I speak from negative proofs and from presumptions arising from admitted facts; but I declare it to be my opinion that there is no nation in the world where the wife and daughter and sister are treated with greater love, affection, and chivalrous consideration than in France. I believe that the French peasant is the type of a poor man's happy home. I believe that industry, thrift, frugality, and temperance distinguish this class beyond all others. I believe that the "good," the "better" society of France is the best in the world. There is a vein of brutality and indifference in England and Germany, in the lower and middle classes, that is not observable in France, Italy, or Spain.

ACETES.—Well, I am glad to know that there is some heart, some decency, and some politeness in France, for I am frank to confess that I have seen but little of it. It is my observation that a Frenchman has no home. He has apartments where he eats and sleeps. His home is at the café. A Frenchman has no politeness; he has deportment; he will bow, and parlez-moi, and parlez-vous, but he has no respect for women. I have traveled in many countries, but America is the only one where there is a true chivalry for the sex. Here woman is accorded the privilege in all relations. A woman may travel unattended from New York to San Francisco and never receive an improper word or look, unless she invites it. No woman of fair face can cross a boulevard in Paris without insult. Every smile is a leer; every bow is an insult; every look a look of lust.

URUS.—We wander.

AGRICOLA.—This boy is too young to marry; there is not a disparity of years. Ten years is the minimum of difference that ought to be recognized. The husband should be ten years older than the wife. Better fifteen than five; better twenty than none. At fifty years of age this man will be in the prime of his life; at fifty, with care of chickens, pigs, and children, she will be a broken-down old woman. At the time her teeth are decayed, her hair thin at the part, her form misshapen by child-birth, her complexion faded, her step weak and weary, he will be in the strength of a vigorous manhood. Look out for domestic broils about this time.

BOTTOM.—The old man and woman in the country want a stout son-in-law to work the farm; the girl wants a husband; the country wants children; the love of children will fill the mother's heart; the love of fat oxen and fast horses will supply the place of sentiment in that of the comfortable farmer. He will be a country magistrate, go to the Legislature, die a Christian. I vote to let them marry.

AGRICOLA.—And this is just the kind of family upon which rests the permanence of our government. An honest man who tills his own acres; an honest woman who fills conscientiously and honorably the place of wife and mother; children educated at the country school-house to honor their parents, brought up in innocence to honest toil; a family where labor is respected, where religion is not scoffed and sneered at, where fashions and fashion's follies are unknown, where books, and magazines, and respectable journals are read.

ACETES.—I do not at all undervalue the qualities you describe. I do not underrate the desirableness of a community like that, aggregated by intelligent, honest, industrious farmers. My views of the marriage relation I take from the observation of city life. I see the ruin and misery resulting from hasty, ill-formed marriages in our cities, in the poor and in the fashionable classes. If this young man who, I take it, is a gentleman, city born and city bred, desires to become a married farm laborer, and yokes himself to a country girl for the corn-beef and cabbage of domestic life, for babies, fat oxen, and brood mares, I accept his martyrdom and mistake as things out of which good may come. But in this city, around us, and in our every day intercourse, I observe foolish and improvident marriages out of which nothing but misery and disappointment can come. A poor young man, a day laborer, an Irish, or German, or Scandinavian workman, marries; the result is, more mouths than bread. Our town is filled with mendicants for labor, and the plea is an irresistible one—"family without food," "children without food," "I am willing to work, but no work to do."

AGRICOLA.—Is not marriage the natural relation? What would you do with the poor? Deny to them the privilege of marriage? How would you populate the country?

BOTTOM.—Let them marry, of course. God feeds the ravens. Only it is infernally provoking to an old bachelor like me to be told that I must aid to support the brats of every bull-necked foreigner who is taught by his religion to marry and get babies for somebody else to support; that I must be taxed to educate such children, especially to educate them to accomplishments that forever unfit them for the toil and labor for which they were born.

POLLIWIG.—Then how would you populate the country?

BOTTOM.—I would not populate it. I would prevent immigration both from China and Europe. We have too many foreigners. The Chinese are the least objectionable, but I would prevent immigration by law from all countries.

URUS.—You are crazy, Bottom, from your prejudice to foreigners. It leads you into all kinds of inconsistencies. You forget we are all the descendants of foreigners; and when you say the Chinese are the best of immigrants you insult your own race.

BOTTOM.—I forget nothing. Because I am the descendant of an early German immigrant shall I let all Germany over run the country? I am selfish. I admit and justify it. I have made some money. Shall I divide it with the next German immigrant that escapes the sausage, sauerkraut, and conscription of his native land? I am a pioneer and carved out a farm from the wilderness by hard labor. Shall I divide it with the tramp? We have a broad and fruitful country; we desire it for our descendants. Shall we haste to overrun it with men from abroad?

URUS.—And how about the Chinese? You say they are the least objectionable of immigrants.

BOTTOM.—Yes. First, because they do not bring their wives and multiply. The evil of their immigration is only the evil of one generation after we prevent their coming. They cannot become citizens, thank God, and they do not become rioters or politicians.

POLLIWIG.—I am opposed to the Chinese immigration because they come in conflict with white labor, but our country is the land of the free and the asylum of the oppressed of other lands.

BOTTOM.—You are opposed to the Chinese because they cannot vote, and you favor foreign immigrants because they can, and yet you know, and I know, and everybody else knows, who has the intelligence to observe and the courage to admit the fact, that the average Chinaman is the superior to the average European immigrant in intelligence, industry, cleanliness, and good manners. That they have less criminals among them, as indicated by our prisons; less paupers, as illustrated by the statistics of our hospitals and poor-houses.

ACETES.—I was interrupted by the introduction of this Chinese topic. I was speaking of the improvidence of the poor in forming the marriage relation. Among our better class there is a tendency to make love marriages, the consequences of which are even more distressing and pitiable than those of the working-classes. Our school and social system throws the sexes together, acquaintance are formed almost without restraint. The young fools fall in love, or think they do. clandestine marriages are made. Engagements are made that parents indulge for fear of worse consequences. It is deemed dishonorable if an engagement is made that considers the financial condition of the parties. The result is hasty and improvident marriages, followed by poverty, disappointment, humiliation, crime, divorce, unhappiness, and shame.

GORGEOUS.—It is true that our divorce record discloses a most unfortunate condition of things, and I am not prepared to say that the Catholic church does not take the correct position when it declares the marriage relation to be a sacrament, only to be disturbed by divorce a vinculo, and never to be followed by a second marriage. Catholics—I mean, of course, those who observe the teachings of their religion—and Jews seldom if ever are divorced; but I know of no remedy for this condition of things.

ACETES.—Well, I do know of a remedy that, if a law providing it were strictly enforced, would prevent half the marriages that are now so improvidently entered into.

URUS.—Then let us all give attention. Acetes has solved the most vexed of all the problems of society.

ACETES.—Like all great reforms it is simple. I would educate the sexes in separate schools. I would never allow boys and girls to meet each other in their puppyhood except in the presence of their parents. I would never allow them to court by moonlight, nor to enjoy each other's society alone in the parlor. I would make a law against round dances. All letters should be subjected to parental review. No courting should be allowed except after a declaration of intention served upon the parents or guardians. All courting should be done in the presence of the family, the young fellow and the girl sitting with their feet in a tub of ice water. No man should marry till he was thirty years of age; no woman till she was twenty-four. No marriages should be allowed, nor engagements be authorized, till the parties had made a trip to Santa Cruz in one of Goodall, Perkins & Co.'s steamers when the sea was rough. The young man should be compelled to live with his mother-in-law one year before marriage. The young lady should live that year with his family. During this year the engaged parties should have free intercourse with other young people, but not with each other. During the year the young lady should depend upon her prospective father-in-law for pin money, and the young gentleman should have no night-key to his mother-in-law's house—each being left at liberty to terminate the engagement at any time when the conditions were found to be irksome.

GORGEOUS.—Oh, bosh! Let us get back to sensible talk. It is undoubtedly true that marriage engagements are inconsiderately entered into. It is certainly true that the contract is too easily set aside by our courts. The relation will be rashly entered upon when it is known how easily the contract may be annulled. To the vicious and criminal it is the indulgence of passion; to the young and thoughtless it is an experiment.

URUS.—Our young women are too apt to think there is something of shame attaching to the unmarried condition; that to become an old maid is to be avoided—better marry carelessly than not to marry at all. This is all wrong and the unmarried condition is not so regarded in other countries. Marriage is the natural relation for women, but it is a thousand times more desirable to remain unmarried than to marry unwisely. It is a thousand times better to be an independent, happy maiden lady than to be a dependent, unloved, unhonored, unhappy wife. A happy marriage is delightful. There is no middle ground. Matrimony is either heaven or hell; there is no half-way house at Fiddler's Green where the conventionalities of life impose the observance of social amenities; and I would rather be Bottom and a bachelor than a husband in such a position.

BOTTOM.—I beg of you all to waste no sympathy on me. If I am miserable I have the privilege to go down or hang myself. I shall get no Caudle lecture when I go home tonight; I shall find no night-cap sitting up in disconsolate grief at the brutality of my absence or at the disgusting character of my breath. I am denied the sweet consolation of toiling to save money for spendthrift sons, or to purchase false ringlets and ten-button gloves for fashionable daughters. I am not disconsolate over the idea of not being snubbed by sons-in-law. I can travel where I please; I can stay out as late as I please; I can spit upon my hired carpet; I can smoke among my hired curtains; I can put my boots upon my hired mantelpiece. I can rail at women, laugh at marriage, and when I get old my money will purchase for me the most devoted attentions, and those who expect to be remembered in my will will overwhelm me with the tenderest love.

AGRICOLA.—Bachelors never live to old age, and if they do theirs is a sour, dyspeptic, bitter, unloved, selfish existence. They are surrounded by mercenary relatives anxious for them to die. An old, old bachelor is a miserable being. Try it again, Bottom; there are other sweet apple trees in the orchard of life; there are good fishes yet uncaught; there are prizes yet to be drawn in the lottery of matrimony.

Taking a Bath in Paris.

A correspondent writes: "I wished to take a bath. Found a bath-house afloat on the Seine. All the big bath-houses here are afloat. Warm bath, ten cents. Pay as you go in. Was asked by attendant if I wished a "bain simple" (pronounced bang simple). Told him I'd take a "bank simple." Waiter let on water and left. No soap, no towels. Door locked outside with a string. This was too simple. Found that ten cents included nothing but water. Could wash with water, of course, couldn't wipe with it. Rang the bell. Waiter came. Ordered soap and towels. Waiter grinned and left. Came back, grinned, and brought me two programmes, one of soap and the other of towels. Four kinds of soap and five kinds of towels. Thus—peignoir, serre-tête, drap, fond du bain, oreiller. Studied catalogue, and finally ordered the first on the list—the peignoir. Waiter brought peignoir. Turned out to be no towel at all, but a hot night-gown open in front. Felt as if just from the oven. Extra charge for peignoir, six cents. Laid by peignoir, and concluded to try again. Rang for another towel. Chose this time a fond du bain. Waiter rushed in with a sheet and doused it in the bottom of the bath-tub, rushed out, shut the door and locked me in again. Found myself no better off than before. Couldn't wipe myself dry with a wet sheet. Rang again. Waiter as before. Ordered another towel. This time an oreiller. Waiter rushed out and rushed in with a piece of linen about large enough for a pen-wiper. Did not, however, sousé it in bath-tub. It was like a towel in miniature. Thought I must be approaching the end. Patience and perseverance would bring a towel at last. Rang again. Ordered this time from programme a drap. Drap turned out to be a towel. Why not call it a towel? Charge, extra two cents. For serre-tête, two cents. For fond du bain, six cents. Concluded now to bathe. Hauled the fond du bain out from the bottom of the bath-tub and chucked it on the floor. Washed, got out, and concluded to get my six cents worth out of the peignoir. Did so. Put it on and sat in it. Very comfortable. All hot-baked night-gowns open in front are, after bathing. French bang a complicated affair.

Every dove has a cote, and every dog pants. A horse, unlike a man, is always prepared to meet an oat.

PICTURES.

She stood beside me, where the vines
Shadowed a face most wondrous fair;
A glancing sunbeam left a ray
Of glory on her golden hair:

Her sweet brown eyes looked up to mine
With all a child's simplicity,
Yet in their depths I fain had read
More than a passing thought of me.

The tiny hands and soft white arms
Closely about my own entwined;
The rosy lips held richer feast
Than amber clusters from the vine.

I stooped, and whispered soft and low,
So sacred seemed the words to me,
"Kiss me." I shook with sudden fear,
And then I waited, trustfully.

Quick, like the glow of early morn,
The blushes spread o'er cheek and brow;
She bends that fair and graceful head,
Those brownest eyes are dewy now.

And then she raised to mine the lips
That should be mine forevermore,
And all the earth and air and sky
Were glorious as ne'er before.

Through all my life, in good or ill,
Till hushed in silence of the grave,
My lips with glad delight will feel
That first warm kiss my darling gave.

BESSIE.

Casse.

Alas! how easily things go wrong.
A sigh too much or a kiss too long—
There follows a mist, a weeping rain,
And life is never the same again.

Alas! how hardly things go right.
'Tis sad to watch on a summer night;
For the sigh will come and the kiss will stay,
And the summer night is a winter's day.

MORA.

I Love Thee.

I love thee for the soul that shines
Within thine eyes soft beaming,
From out whose depths the prisoned fires
Of intellect are gleaming.

I love thee for the mind that soars
Beyond earth's narrow keeping,
That measures suns, and stars, and worlds,
Through boundless limits sweeping.

I love thee for the voice, whose power
Can in my heart awaken
To passioned life each slumbering chord
That ruder tones have shaken.

Thou ne'er, perchance, mayst feel the chain
With which this love has bound thee,
Nor dream thee of the hand that flung
Its glittering links around thee.

And vainly mayst thou deem the task
Thy captive bonds to sever—
Who madly dares to love thee now
Will love thee on forever. MADGE MORRIS.

The Poet.

The poet, weary of his task one night,
Tore up what he had writ and cast aside
His pen. Then bending in despair he cried:
"My hope of fame is past—no more I write."
When in a vision came unto his sight
The jasper gate, and it was open wide;
And lo! he heard the angel choir inside,
And spoke to him a spirit fair and bright:
"Oh, treasure in your heart of hearts the strain,
And when the time is ripe sing it again
Unto the listening world, and you thereby
Will win the poet's meed—a laurel crown,
A people's love, and very great renown,
And, when you die, a deathless memory."

RICHARD E. WHITT.

LITERARY AMOURS.

Research into the most elevated provinces of literature, inspection of the lives and doings of the most gifted of litterateurs, reveal phases of life and love that would at least show that literary genius is almost omnipotent in conquering all obstacles to its enjoyment. Men whose mental forces have enabled them to become eminent before the world, whose knowledge of language and human nature has enabled them to employ the former for the subjugation of the latter; men whose subtle understandings of love and its requisites have enabled them to love and be loved with unreserved passion; men of the greatest talent, the most graceful conception in the field of letters, have been notably "immoral." But few exceptions can be made to the general rule. During the early Grecian epoch this was almost entirely so. The poetry of passion ruled dominant, chastity became a rarity rather than otherwise, and undoubtedly the greatest days of ancient Greece were an age of unrestricted revelry, "wine, women, and song." The same epoch, morally, has been continually reproduced even to our own era. During the reigns of Pope Leo X. and of Clement VII., his successor, in the sixteenth century, there became celebrated as a writer, in Italy, the home of ancient Latins and their bands of gifted authors, Pietro Aretino. Himself the offspring of unhallowed passion, his habits were outrageously reckless. Indiscreet, extravagant, he flagrantly violated all the moral laws of his countrymen. Popular indignation was excited against him, he was forced into temporary exile, he was disgraced. Yet his genius was such that his clever writings, his witty sallies, his inimitable satirical talent, forced admiration from men and noblemen, and gained the easily conquered sympathies of their wives. Princes came to his aid, princesses sought his embrace. Ultimately he attached himself to the family of Giovanni de Medici, and accompanied the master to battle where de Medici was killed. He then removed to Venice, wrote continually and with splendid success, grew rich, made love to princesses and to servant-girls, sought the hospitalities of palaces and kitchens in turn, and finally sought and gained favor with Pope Clement VII., and received promise of the Pope's sister as a wife. With all his coarse nature his talents paved his way to ease, and fortune, and fame. Even Charles V. did him, or rather his talents, homage, and he lived in high glee. But his life ended abruptly. He so appreciated the comical side of his ill-doing that, upon being told of some of his mischief-making, he cast himself into chair that he might laugh the more heartily, losing his balance he capsize and fell upon his neck, breaking it. A fitting end for the life he had led. His is only one example of many similar ones of his time. Voltaire, too, possessed an abundant share of amorous inclinations. His life appears as of a continual commingling of wit and women—superior literary talent, and unsurpassable aptitude for forming notable and scandalous amours. His wit enabling him to form these attachments, they in turn afforded him extensive fields for observation and outlets for expression. Ill-favored though he was, his great genius ever made him sought for. His disposition displayed itself early in his life. While yet a boy he was always to be found in the society of the fairer sex, as much to their satisfaction as to his own. At twenty he became page to the Marquis de Châteaufort while in Holland. Then he encountered one Olympe Dunsy, who afterward wedded a German Baron, and a mutual sighing ensued. That she was pretty was sufficient to attract his attention. That his attention should be offered was sufficient to conquer the heart of Mademoiselle Dunsy. Her mother interfered, however, and with little ado their clandestine love-making received a severe check. But she was eager, and he was persistent, and the Marquis interfered and consigned the youthful Lothario to solitary confinement. His Dulcinea attempted to visit him in male attire, but was detected, and sent by her mother to Amsterdam. Mesdames de Rupelonde du Chatelet, Adrienne Lecouvreur, the actress, and many of the Parisian beauties, succumbed to his pleadings. The first he treated very shabbily, being more pleased to see her evidences of devotion than to accept freely of them; the second he adhered to notoriously; the actress was "diamond cut diamond" with him. He loved many women; she favored many men. But he was generous in his exactions from her, and seldom took exception to her amours. He created famous characters, and she personated them. He lavished attentions upon her, and she reciprocated. She died in his arms, expressing her admiration for Marshal de Saxe. What a queer sensation the words must have proven for Voltaire! She was denied consecration from the church. He became violently incensed in consequence, and immediately wrote a venomous, satirical denunciation of the church and churchmen, succeeding in provoking such public indignation that safety compelled him to seek retirement from the city. One woman, however, refused to submit to his caresses. She was the wife of Marshal de Villars—beautiful, fascinating. But Voltaire, with all his influences, could not conquer her. She was a thorough coquette, and fully understood and appreciated the value of being sought for without succumbing. If modern women could be made to understand this, many of them would be much more valued—and valuable. She alone appears to have withstood the attractions of the great, the gifted, the sensually passionate Voltaire. In England, too, during the reign of Elizabeth, genius and amateness, even unto profligacy, were consorts. George Peele, Robert Greene, Marlowe, Essex, Shakespeare, all the great intellects of the day, were submerged beneath social sensations, improprieties, scandals. Peele, Greene, and Marlowe had natural genius as distinctly great as that of Shakespeare. Yet their erotic excesses, their willful waste of their powers, prevented them from rising to lasting fame. Much of Shakespeare's greatest work was built upon the foundations furnished by them. Their gracefulness was lost sight of beneath their wild dissipations. They died comparatively young—Marlowe low in the thirties, having been stabbed during one of his many quarrels. Sir Walter Raleigh's ruin was due in a great measure to his rivalry with Essex for the love of Elizabeth—a love scare worth seeking, as his mournful end attested. Even Shakespeare, who loved to discourse of the beauties of virtue and the virtuous, who denounced corruption and corruptors with all his great mind and understanding of what was right and wrong, he, too, was woefully lax in matters of the heart. He knew his power, and exerted it freely, even if not for good. True, he married a farmer's daughter, because he loved her. He instilled into her the necessity of being true to him, and straightway went and sinned himself. He disregarded his marital obligations, and poorly exemplified the value of what he would teach. But rivaling in point of popularity even Shakespeare was Sir Philip Sidney. So great a favorite was he, that when he died, in 1587, at the age of thirty-one, "it was accounted a sin for any gentleman of quality, for many months after, to appear at court or city in any light or gaudy apparel." ("Life and Death of Sir Philip Sidney, 1650.") Popular and loved by all, because of his cultivated talents, his generosity, his noble station, and noble characteristics; all these things greatly aided his conquests of feminine hearts, and at the same time his good traits of character kept him in comparatively respectable restraint—that is, so far as concerned fleshly follies. His amours were numerous, notable, yet without free from severe reproach. His genius made him admired; it made him enjoy admiration. Elizabeth doted on him, called him "My Philip," granted him many favors, and sought his pleasure. For this she receives the imputation that it was more desire to spite the bearish husband of her sister Mary, than because of any great recognition of his good qualities. Certainly it was not because of any symmetry of features belonging to him, because he was extremely plain; ugly in fact, were not his manners so chivalrous, his powers of pleasing so many and so great. His greatest disappointment in love was his bereavement of Lady Rich. They were betrothed, but disagreements arose between them; they separated, and she married another. Afterward he grew more careless, sought female society, was cordially received, even invited; made love freely, gained fame, and died young. He was not impeccable, but was as near to being so as were most of his illustrious predecessors or contemporaries—and if the truth were known, probably as much so as his modern successors. Arrogant, savage in his insolence, a disgrace to the world, and to literature in particular, was Dean Swift. As literary works, his writings would in this decade be deemed unfit for publication. They have their piquant expressions, they employ novel methods of capturing interest, but as literary productions they are coarse, sensual, disgusting. American opinion would crush such a man into oblivion nowadays. With all the liberality of modern American ideas of propriety, with all the loose morals of this fast age, our weakness of flesh, likewise of mind, Mr. Jonathan Swift would meet with a warm, a fiery reception if he were to now attempt to display his vulgarity, either in letters or by wild profligacy. How he could have met with such widespread success in feminine conquest surpasses imagination. His proposals to Jane Waring, whom he asked to wed him, but by whom he was at first refused, afterward accepted, caused her to scorn him the second time. His brutal treatment of both Esther Johnson and Miss Van Homrigh, for whom every spark of pity is aroused when their wrongs are recited, would indicate the man unworthy of being acknowledged as human. Yet he pursued his reckless course of sensuality; dictated alike to women of high and low degree, and finally died as he deserved—insane. His insolence to the Duchess of Shrewsbury is an example of his every day doings. She took him to task for neglecting to dine with her. Witness the assurance of his reply: "It was too much for her to expect of him under the circumstances; she must make more advances; he looked for advances from ladies, especially duchesses." A titled "lady" might tolerate him; a woman never would. Crazy with egotism, he wrote to the Duchess of Queensbury: "I am glad you know your duty; it has been an established and known rule for more than twenty years in England, that the first advances have been continually made me by all ladies who aspire to my acquaintance. And the greater their quality, the greater their advances." And this from such a man as he was! In the foregoing has been presented a few varied instances of the attractions, the power of literary genius above all the dictates of reason and right, and even common decency. And it shows, too, the temptations with which all great men, literary or otherwise, are sure to be beset. Some men and women are so unscrupulous they sin from wantonness; some are so lacking in moral force of character they yield to temptation, sin and pray almost in the same breath, and find complete justification because the temptation was so great; others yield reluctantly virtue after virtue in the vain hope of acquiring a treasure, and, finding their visions dispelled, their gem another's dross, their idols valueless, themselves burdened with the debt of sin, pine away in misery. It is not to be supposed, however, that literary ardor will be checked, nor woman's love for genius be dispelled, because of these things. Men will continue to do as Byron did when he married Miss Millbank to get money with which to pay his debts; Miss Millbanks will be found who will willingly sacrifice themselves on the shrine of genius; and they will find, as these two worthies did, that they have made a mutual mistake. Great men may marry a farm-girl as did Burns, the daughter of a country squire as did Milton, a widow with two children as did Washington, or a "grass-widow" as did Andrew Jackson; they may wed their nurses as did John Howard the philanthropist, or they may emulate the example of Peter the Great, of Russia, and take to wife a peasant girl; they may marry their cousins, aunts, sisters-in-law, as many men do nowadays—they may do one or all of these things if they will and can, and they may be happy if they know how to be; but if they take good advice they will let matrimony alone. WHISTLECRAFT.

VAGRANT VERSES.

I.—Nocturne.

A single golden star
When the silence of night is deep;
A single light in the window
When the house is quiet with sleep.

And a shadow behind the light,
And a heaven beyond the blue,
And once in a while in one's life
A thought of a kiss from you!

II.—In the House of Rimmon.

The Syrian came to the Prophet
And said: "When I bow the knee
Before the altar of Rimmon
Impute it not unto me;
Because the King leans on me
The weight of his royalty."

Love—lost love, the style of the world is Whenever I bend the knee
(The monarch, Chance, leaning on me)
Impute it not unto me;
Though I bow in an alien temple
My heart is ever with thee.

III.—Triumphant.

No power can unspeak uttered words, or call
Kisses once kissed to a repentant mouth;
And I rejoice in knowing this, for all
Winter of parting, anger's summer drouth
Can not take back that spirit of the South—
Passion and fragrance of your kiss to me:
The fire-light wavering in its dreams uncouth,
You sitting with your head against my knee;
The pale snow driving 'gainst the wintry pane,
Your lips that kissed, and clung, and kissed again,
Humorous kisses, blent of fire and dew;
And you said thoughtfully: "In the night and rain,
Whereto I bend my wings, so kind and true
And faithful friend I shall not find as you."

IV.—In the Parlor.

Between the dusk and the daylight,
When the shadows longest grow,
There comes a silence on all things—
'Tis the hour when one speaks low.

We sit in the parlor together,
And heavily on the air
Floats the faint, familiar fragrance
Of the heliotrope in your hair.

And in the kindly twilight
I see your dark eyes shine;
I feel the touch of your garments,
Of your soft white hand in mine.

And one might see in the parlor,
When the day is almost done,
On the wall, two tremulous shadows
Of faces melt into one.

The School-Girl.

Come, tired eyes! upturn your tender light,
And let us read in depths of changing blue,
The winged thoughts that wave through and through.
Those mystic mirrors, if I read aright,
Reflect no lessons such as books recite,
But catch the subtler secrets that imbue
Thy woman's heart—making both false and true
In one deft-woven tapestry unite.
In what old picture wouldst thou fittest stand?
Haply as sweet Virginia—when through ways
Of crowd and jostle oft I see thee come—
Virginia, with her tablets in her hand,
Ere Apollus blights her with his rufian gaze,
Tripping across the forum of Old Rome.

A Japanese Venus.

As we were about to leave, a lady of elegant attire and attended by a female servant bearing her toilet apparatus, and another with other luxuries of the bath, entered. We thought the license of a stranger in foreign parts would warrant us in loitering a trifle in order to gratify a little curiosity. Our new arrival, after giving some directions, with the assistance of her maid, began to arrange herself for the bath. There are many points of radical difference between the human genders—psychologically, mentally, morally, and physically, and all in favor of the gentle sex. And so in their general habits. A masculine disrobing for the bath flings his clothes in all directions and bounces into the water with an impetuosity and violence anything but graceful. Our Lady Godiva, for such we will call her for short, with the help of her maid neatly folded and laid away on a cloth in a clean place each article of apparel as it was removed. First the silken robe, then the flowing gown-like robe of purple, then the nether garments of white, until we reached nature's own. It is said that astronomers frequently level their telescopes at one star in order to see another; we leveled our sight apparently at a pretty little creature in the bath, but by an obliquity of vision took in the other scene unobserved. As gently as a zephyr playing upon the foliage of the trees she stepped along toward the water. Her beautifully rounded form and poetry of motion would have been worthy of the sculptor's chisel. A beautifully rounded ankle and a pretty foot vaguely visible beneath the laminated folds of a dozen skirts would set a whole community agog; at home, whilst a whole form nude as nature and more beautiful than an angel would not so much as attract a passing glance in Japan.

George T. Bromley writes us a postal card from Santa Barbara and asks us "If we have ever been there?" and says he will not dilate upon its many attractions if we ever have. We have been there, and so Mr. Bromley need not dilate. He also informs us that he has just succeeded to the management of the "Arlington Hotel," that it is a "splendid" hotel—"perfect," "delightful," and asks us to come and "bask in the sunshine," "bathe on the beach," and "revel" in the luxuries of a tropical home. Now if Bromley can arrange a "pass" for us on the steamer we will proceed immediately to Santa Barbara, and at once enter upon our bathing, and reveling, and if the "Arlington" is as good as we can then the "Arlington" is on a financial basis, and Bromley will evidence the how to keep it.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Trout Fishing on the Cloud River.

IN CAMP ON CLOUD RIVER, July 4, 1878.

Grand primal forests! Giant pines! Mount Shasta, 14,441 feet in height, snow-clad and gorgeous in his monarch robes of forest trees, with crown of glorious sunlight and storm-clouds! From his base and from out the secret caverns in his rock-ribbed volcanic sides there bursts an hundred streams, which, gathering together, form the Sacramento. The Pitt is a magnificent stream, and the Cloud is a river of picturesque beauty. It runs through a great cañon of wooded sides, grand old trees, rapid like a mountain torrent, as broad as Montgomery Street, its waters pure and cold as melting snow, softened here and there with a glimpse of sunlight as it goes dancing along over its rocky bed, forming here and there occasional side eddies, deep pools in which the salmon and the speckled beauties hide and sport themselves. We are having a glorious time. One week in camp at the Cloud is worth a whole cycle in a French caf  . We envy no one of our wealthy loungers on the Boulevard Poissonier, as they listlessly wander in kid gloves and tight boots, looking through passages and down crowded streets, listening to the roar of the busy thoroughfare. We view the cloud-clad majesty of Shasta, catch sight of the leaping waters as they reflect through dim aisles of pine the sunlight on their foaming wave-tops. We listen to the melody of the winds playing through the trees, each leafy limb a harp-string tuned by the Master's hand. We sleep beneath the stars. It is the dreamless sleep of honest toil. We dine and drink, revel in the rude cooking of the camp, the staple of which is venison, trout, and appetite; we drink the pure cold waters of the stream, and the only water I ever tasted which one drinks for the love of the water. One sips it as he would a cordial, tastes it as he would sample a rare wine, drinks it by the goblet, as he would champagne, to allay his thirst, gulps it down as the farm laborer would in the blazing harvest field, souses himself in it head and ears, as does the horse sweating and panting from a hot and dusty drive. Talking of waters, why could not some of these upper streams of the Sacramento be taken out, and by ditch and redwood flume be carried down to the valleys and utilized for city and farm consumption? A ditch demands only labor; lumber is plentiful. Any man of sense can engineer water down hill. The moment a municipal government like San Francisco begins to discuss a water problem, everybody in its counsel loses his head, talks as familiarly of millions as maids of thirteen do of puppy dogs, a commission to examine, engineers of national reputation to be employed, great reservoirs of solid masonry to be planned, iron pipes to be contracted for, everything upon a scale of extravagance, and everybody in it to steal a fortune. A ditch and wooden flume, substantially built, would carry the waters of the Sierra to San Francisco with little repairs for a hundred years. Our party is a merry one. Originally thirteen, we styled ourselves "The Apostles"—B. B. Redding the master. An accession of one or two additional persons has relieved us from the apprehension of the ill-luck that attends the number that feasted at the last supper of the betrayed Essenian. Our party is highly respectable—not a member of Congress nor politician in the crowd. Only one lawyer, one preacher, and, thank God, only one editor of a daily newspaper; all the rest are above suspicion. Hence, we confer upon the party the immortality of print by giving the names as follows: B. B. Redding, Fish Commissioner of California; James McClatchy, of the Sacramento Be  ; James Carolan, Albert Gallatin, D. W. Earl; Sisson, of the firm of Sisson & Wallace; E. M. Arthur, W. W. Crane, Prof. Wilkinson, Rev. F. D. Shearer, F. Dewing, Jos. D. Redding, Frank Carolan, and O. S. McClatchy. We left San Francisco Saturday morning. Ferry, steamer, and steam-car via Sacramento, Marysville, Chico, Red Bluff, and Redding; fare $13. From Redding to Sisson's, in Shasta County, by the Oregon stage line, the distance is seventy-two miles—fare, $11 50—a fine mountain drive through groves of pine and oak; over hills and valleys, across beautiful rivers (the Pitt half a dozen times); by bridge and ferry across the Sacramento; over rivulets and nameless streams; across Salt, Dog, Shovel, Shotgun, Musquito, Bowlder, Flume, Slate, Blue Rock, and Castle creeks, each a beautiful, dashing river on its impulsive, heedless, reckless way down to the muddy Sacramento, through to the tule marshes, through the shallow bays to the infinite depths of the ocean. There is a simile here. I leave it for the reader, old and careworn, grizzled with age and care, immersed in business, and pursuing the phantoms of wealth and ambition, to remember his youth and draw the moral before he plunges into the ocean of eternity. The moral, as I draw it, is to go fishing. Go out amid God's primal forests, breathe his pure, pine-strained mountain air, catch his fish, roam over the hills for his antlered herds, live on plain food, take exercise, leave care, and forget business; leave politics, and money, and newspapers, and churches, and operas, and stocks, and sweat all the hypocrisy, formality, cant, and sham piety out of you; for it is an Arab proverb, that the days spent in fishing and in the chase are not recorded in the book where he marks the passing three score and ten, beyond which all are treading on uncertain margins. Our camp is twenty-two miles from Sisson's, in a charming bend of the river, on a peninsula, covered with great spruce and pine forests, the trees fringing the stream; one of the few places where close embracing mountains give way, and form an amphitheatre, leaving a level piece of land formed by Nature for a camping spot—a gilt-edged invitation in God's own autograph to all intelligent denizens of the murky, pent-up town to come out from among their wine-laden side-boards, their mahogany dining tables, their hair mattresses, and Axminster carpets, to drink water, live on game, sleep on pine boughs, and promenade in a flannel shirt under the shadow of over-arching pines and beside the murmuring waters of one of his most beautiful rivers. But we came to fish and not to moralize. Arrived in camp at 2 o'clock on Monday; spent an hour in untangling, assorting, and arranging the useless lines, hooks, flies, bobs, sinkers, leaders, reels, baskets, landing-nets, etc., that the commercial enthusiasm of our San Francisco sporting merchants impose upon the greenhorn who for the first time goes fishing to new streams and hunting grounds. The first grand conception of the Cloud fisherman is to take a salmon on the hook. Of course he fishes for brook trout, but he has the lurking ambition that he will land a salmon. He charts out in his own mind, as he sits upon the bank with the toes of his French hunting shoes dipping in the stream, how adroitly he will manage him, how deftly he will give him line, how patiently he will play him—when, whiz goes the reel, up flies the rod, the line goes burning through his fingers; the sensation through line and rod and backbone goes down to the toe-tips of his French hunting shoes, and Mr. Salmon, with a flap and a dash in the water, shows his brown back, surges away with hook, leader, line, and sinker, and the greenhorn of a city fisherman from San Francisco sits dangleing his French shoes in the water of the stream, and moralizes how unsatisfactory is all book learning of line and rod as compared with the experience that teaches how easy a thing it is to land a salmon. We live and learn, and on Monday evening we strut proudly to camp with a twelve-pounder in our net. The next day we take in five—a back load. The next day we tramp five miles down the stream and "dam" the infernal greedy salmon. We can't keep them off the line. We are tired of salmon; they are tedious to get to shore, they break lines, they are too heavy to carry to camp, they are useless, and we are fishing for brook trout and Dolly Vardens. As a sample of the splendid fishing of this splendid stream, I was yesterday one of three to bring in ninety-five finny beauties, averaging a pound in weight. My share was twenty-one, Mr. B. B. Redding double-distanced me by catching forty-two, and the guide, Mr. Fay, made up the balance—though spending a large part of his time in placing us at favorite pools, and in helping get our useless salmon on the bank. The salmon are not useless, as we use the females' roe for bait; but it seems almost wicked to cut open the salmon, take her golden spoil, and fling her lifeless into the stream as food for other fishes; but it is the rule of the stock exchange; they do it on California Street. Business is business; fishing is fishing. The game fish, and the rarest one to catch, is the Dolly Varden. Mr. E. M. Arthur was the first, and Mr. W. W. Crane the second, in this line of distinction. They are larger, more gamey, have salmon-colored spots, but are by no means so handsome or such good eating as the brook trout, with his gleaming spots and iridescent lines. Messrs. Sisson and Gallatin are the Nimrods of our party. Some three miles from camp is a deer-lick, where these gentlemen camped a night in ambush for the early deer. Their labors were rewarded with two splendid bucks. I wish I could convey to the readers of the ARGONAUT the graceful motions of these antlered dandies of the forest; how gracefully they poise the uplifted leg, as they come down the mountain; how like a lady in the stately minuet they put it down; how grandly they fling back their antlers and snuff the air for lurking dangers, and all the while their bright eyes are keenly searching for the hidden foe. So elegant, so graceful, and so proud; so innocent, so beautiful, and so timid, and yonder, just across the stream, lurking in ambush, with implements of death upon which human ingenuity has exhausted itself to kill each other, a Winchester and a Henry send forth their deadly shot, Gallatin plows his death volley through the larger buck, and Sisson sends his shot crashing through the brain of the other. It seems cruel, but we have them for breakfast, and they all do it in California Street; it is the mercy of the stock exchange. We have our sensations, too, as well as you of the turbulent town. Mr. and Mrs. Finn and Mr. and Mrs. A. P. Williams drove into camp, with servant, two horses, and covered vehicle—ladies in appropriate camping costume. Mr. A. P. Williams was the initial candidate for the convention upon the Non-partisan ticket, and beaten by the French hair-frizzer, whom the enthusiasm of the German and Irish mob has delegated to form the organic law for our State. Tuesday night a genial rain. Yesterday a thunder storm. To-day an unexpected keg of lager from Yreka. The elder McClatchy falls into the stream. We celebrate the nation's birthday by nailing the banner of the stars to the top of a lofty pine; we salute with a volley the rising sun. Young McClatchy and Redding have their cornets and play the national anthems, sending the swelling notes of our patriotic airs echoing through the hills and the cloistered river aisles. Thursday evening, our party returning are heard shouting and hooting over the hills just as the sun is declining. Boys let loose from school are not more hilarious than these staid men of business turned loose among the hills. Mr. Carolan is the hero of the biggest bag—twenty-five splendid fish, with three Dolly Vardens. Mr. Earl carried off the second honors. Professor Wilkinson brought in two Dolly Vardens and a nice bag of brook trout. One of the sports is to bet on time in catching salmon. Messrs. Sisson and Earl gambled to-day for coin that Earl could not land a salmon in thirty minutes. Money up. In two minutes a ten-pounder was hooked, in two minutes more he was off with the book in his gills. In ten minutes more another was hooked and lost. The game becomes exciting. Only eight minutes left. Another bite, and a twelve-pounder took the bait. All the party had gathered around the pool watching the contest. It was a pretty fight. The monster was brought to bank two minutes short of time, and Mr. Earl was the happy winner. Talk of our excitement in the gold room and stock exchange. They all do it. Messrs. Arthur and Shearer came in later with seventy-eight trout—the best bag of the campaign—the preacher carrying off the honors with a catch of forty trout, so far the best luck of the season. To-morrow we move camp to Castle Lake, thirty-two miles away, for fly fishing.

"David Bush, plumber and sanitary enginner." We have kept house for twenty years, and never fully understood the meaning of the word "sanitary," as connected with the management of drains and sewers, till we had our work done by David Bush. Our drains have smelled bad, our closets have leaked, our sewers have fouled, our stationary wash-stands have emitted malarious vapors; we have sworn at our bills, been worried by our wife, been swindled by patent traps, and quarreled over plumbing bills, till house-keeping became a vexation. David Bush, sanitary plumber, came and saw, and conquered. He put in air-pipes, he gave ventilation, he fixed traps on a common-sense principle, and the result is a sweet-smelling house, and we are restored to our wonted amiability of temper, and hope to escape typhoid fever for a long time to come. Moral—Better spend ten dollars for the advice of an intelligent plumber than a hundred for doctors and medicine.

Young lady, in a railway car, excitedly : "Conductor, this young man you put in this seat with me has insulted me!" Conductor, grandly : "Scoundrel ; what has he done, miss?" Young lady, indignantly : "He went to sleep." Howls of derision and wrath from the passengers. The scoundrel is put off.

A young lady of the age of seven, who is deservedly a pet of her household, but is a little exacting, and given to be-mean herself as being rather neglected and "sat upon" in her family circle than otherwise, said the other day : "No-body has ever cared for me, for even when I was born my mother and all my sisters were away at the seaside."

A practical joker, a prudent man withal, has gone to a café and ordered a three-masted schooner of beer, when a friend appears at the door and beckons to him to go out for a minute. The intending drinker is afraid that in his absence some one may get away with the liquid, when a happy thought strikes him, and he wraps around the handle of the mug a scrap of paper inscribed :

"I have spit in this !"

With a light heart he hastens to the door, communicates with his friend and returns to find written in another hand beneath his warning :

"So have I !"

MacMahon has not the reputation of being a brilliant speaker, neither is he considered to possess the happy knack of saying the right thing at the right time. He went the other day to the military college of St. Cyr, where they happen to have a student of unmistakable colored blood. Being requested by the kind-hearted governor of the establishment to say something reassuring to the poor lad, the chief man in the French Republic beckoned to the dark-complexioned boy to come forward, when the following conversation took place :

"Ahem ! you are a negro, are you not?"

"Yes, Mr. President, I am."

"Ah, well, I—aw—congratulate you. Continue as you are. Ahem, good-bye !"

Purchaser (looking over a collection of hats and bonnets with great deliberation and indecision)—"You see, I hardly know what to select. I don't want a hat for myself ; I want it for a woman with a beard."

"A woman with a beard !" echoed the stylish saleswoman in surprise. Then, after a moment's reflection, she put the usual query : "Is she married?"

"Yes, indeed," said the purchaser.

"Well ! well !" said the astonished saleswoman ; "this is an incomprehensible world. A woman with a beard is married, and I (casting an admiring look on her figure reflected in the glass) am left here to sell hats."

Mrs. Langtrety, the reigning London beauty, did a spirited thing the other day. In the midst of an admiring circle she asked her husband to introduce to her a certain well-known gentleman. He did. The gentleman, flattered, smiled and bowed. "I want you," said the beauty, giving him her handkerchief ; "I want you to wipe off the paint from my face, as I hear you say at the clubs that I am painted."

A poet sings : "I at the banquet of the gods have sate, * * * Their nectar quaffed, and their ambrosia ate, and felt the Olympian ichor in my veins." "Olympian ichor" is very good. It is poetic license for lager-beer ; and ambrosia is ditto for Limburger cheese and mustard on a cracker.

One evening the Rev. Dr. —, took tea with us. Out of politeness, I asked him to give thanks, forgetting for the moment the presence of my granddaughter and the fact that the doctor was long-winded. The child startled us all, right in the middle of the grace, by exclaiming in a loud voice, "Oh, amen ! Hand me the biscuit."

"Mais, monsieur le presidong," said General Grant, "you will be toujours le marechal de France, while I am jamais le general, but a plain citoyen." "But ze fame of your grand battalles will make you always live in ze hearts of ze peuple as ze marshal d'Amerique," replied MacMahon. "Ah, qu'est ce que c'est your donnezing us ; taffy ?" inquired Grant.

One of the Persian poets describes Paradise as an uncommonly fine section of bluegrass country filled with perennial lilies and roses, and surrounded by a picket fence composed exclusively of pretty girls, who never grow old, and with innumerable other attractions not less unique and rare. This we regard as one of the most seductive systems of theology that man has yet devised.

The most romantic incident connected with the Voltaire celebration was the formal opening of the windows of the room in which Voltaire died. The house, which forms the corner of the Quai Voltaire and the Rue de Beaune, belonged to the Marquise at the time of Voltaire's death ; and, in memory of the great philosopher, she caused the windows to be closed immediately he expired, and a special clause in her will ordered that they should not be opened until a hundred years had elapsed from that date.

There are more well-dressed ladies to be seen on the streets of Vienna than in any other city in Europe. In Paris, respectable ladies nearly always appear on the streets in plain black dresses, as if striving to avoid notice or attention. Vienna is the very reverse in this case, and they generally display great neatness and good taste in their outfits. They are lively and vivacious, as much so as the French, and remarkable for fine forms and graceful movement. In fact, there is seldom seen a man or woman on the streets of Vienna who possesses any of the characteristics of form or feature that would indicate they are Germans, unless it be among the lower and working classes.

Hard by the market of the Temple, in Paris, there is a retired little café, in a recess, with its curtains always closely drawn. You would fancy that it was unoccupied, but turn the door-knob and go in. Around two marble tables, standing or seated, crowd about fifty men, some very elaborately dressed, others plain as pipestems. These people drink coffee and absinthe, but that is not what they come here for by a long shot. They are second-hand dealers in precious wares, and they meet here to trade. Each, on his arrival, deposits on the table a jewelry box, divided into compartments, such as dealers in gold ware use, filled with gold and silver watches, chains, rings, brilliants, etc. There is one who carries in his hand a black leather valise, from which he draws out, as from a conjuror's bag, the treasures of every age—jewels, enamels, medals, cups, porcelain, etc. As soon as the goods are displayed on the table the sale begins, but in almost whispers. No shouts, no discussions, little bargaining. In order to be sure of what they buy, these dealers are always provided with a goldsmith's balance of extreme delicacy and infinitesimal weights. They give all the credit asked for, their transactions all being in honor.

Victor Hugo and the Bishop of Orleans.

Monseigneur Dupanloup, Bishop of Orleans, has hurled forth an imposing fulmination against Victor Hugo, for his eulogy on the arch-heretic, Voltaire, at the recent anniversary in Paris. Victor Hugo returns a broadside in this style :

"Monsieur—You are guilty of an imprudence. You remind those who might have forgotten it that I was brought up by a churchman, and that if my life began in prejudice and error, it was a priest's fault, not mine. That sort of education is so fatal that at nearly forty years of age, as you point out, I was still under its influence. All that has been said before. I don't dwell on it. I have a certain contempt for mere futilities. You insult Voltaire and you do me the honor to revile me. That is your affair. You and I are two men, better or worse ; the future will decide between us. You say I am old, and you pretend to be young ; which I believe. The moral sense is so imperfectly developed in you that you reproach me with the very act which does me honor. You undertake to read me a lesson. By what right? Who are you? Let us come to the point. Let us see what sort of a thing your conscience is, and what mine is. A single comparison will suffice. France has lately passed through an ordeal. France was free. One night a man treacherously seized her, overthrew her, and gagged her. If a nation could be murdered, that man would have murdered France. He brought her near enough to death to reign over her. He began his reign—since reign it was—by perjury, ambush, and massacre. He prolonged it by oppression, by tyranny, by despotism, by an indescribable parody on religion and justice. He was at once a monster and a pigmy. For him were sung the Te Deum, the Magnificat, the Salvum fac, Gloria tibi, and the rest. Who sang them? Ask yourself. The law abandoned the people to him, the church surrendered to him the Almighty. Justice, honor, country gave way before the man. He trampled under foot his oath, equity, good faith, the glory of that flag, the dignity of man, the liberty of the citizen ; the man's prosperity perplexed the conscience of mankind. This lasted nineteen years. During that time you were in a palace ; I was in exile. Sir, I pity you."

VICTOR HUGO.

Fans are the cheapest luxury of the day. The Chinese have given us an article, well made of bamboo and embellished paper, that may be had for two nickels. When the cost of importation is considered, the pay of labor in China is apparent. Fans are said to have originated in China 3,000 years ago. At a feast of lanterns the lovely Kanshi found the heat so oppressive that, contrary to all etiquette, she took off her mask. Partly to hide her blushes, and partly to cool her heated face, she agitated the mask before her nose. The thing became epidemic. Ten thousand hands at once held ten thousand masks, and fanning became a fact. The fan was used as a standard in war, and in peace the fan assisted the priests in the temple, both to raise a cooling breeze and to guard the sacred offerings from the contamination of noxious insects. In Egypt, the fan of the priest of Isis was made of feathers of different length, spread out in the form of a semicircle, but pointed at the top. It was waved by a female slave. Among the Romans, slaves cooled the room and kept away flies during meal time with fans. In the days of Louis XIV. and XV. fans glistened with gilding and gems, and were ornamented by Boucher and Watteau. These works of art were often sold at as high a figure as $75. The Chinese and the French are the great rivals in fan making. To such a degree of excellence has it arrived in France that a fan selling for one cent goes through twenty different operations, performed by as many pairs of hands.

A Chicago man has invented a kind of ink specially suitable for lovers. It remains bright for five days, and then fades out, leaving the paper entirely blank. Thus the most gushing of correspondence would be entirely sure.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

Your last letter, my dear, indicates dyspepsia. Is it true then, as I hear whispered, that the springs are dull this year and you are wishing yourself home again? Let me recommend you the latest and most approved-by-fashion remedy for your peculiar difficulty. It is Atuniss, or, if you like it better, milk champagne. It is warranted to put flesh on the thinnest, rouse the spirits of the dulllest, and restore health to the most forlorn. I know whereof I speak. Drop a postal to Mr. Myers, 825 Capp Street, for a dozen bottles, try it faithfully, and send me a bulletin of your health in six weeks from date. Had you been here yesterday, you might have seen your friend tucked away in her own special little corner at Bancroft's, having one of those "good times" that are so rare in her nowadays busy life. I mean to share my store of good things with you before long, but not to-day. I must ask you, though, if you have seen Longfellow's latest volume of poems? Was ever art more sweetly sung than in Keramos, wherein the potter turns his busy wheel and sings of life and of his work? Poor Palissy! his was indeed "the divine insanity of noble minds," and his whole life the chronicle of a long martyrdom. If we could only know the inner histories of the masters of any art, however humble, how much more would we prize the art itself. Is it not so? I think our silver poet grows stronger in these later poems than in his earlier ones. "Purity" is the word that best describes him. His heart and mind are as clear as crystal. Apropos of ceramics—and just think how long in our blind ignorance we have persisted in calling them "seceramics"—did you know that the cutting of figures and landscapes on the Doulton pottery is done by one artist only, and that one a woman. Her name is Helen Barlow, and she is called the Rosa Bonheur of Lambeth. Her animal subjects are all taken from live studies at the Zoological Gardens, and her work commands the highest prices paid except for that of one other, George Tinworth, whose specialty is the small terra cotta reliefs illustrative of Bible subjects, and so precious is it that it rarely gets as far from home as this, unless it may be in private collections. I have had what you call one of my "Stanley fits" on for the past few days, and so have been exploring my special errand being to hunt up something in the way of picture-frames. Of course, when I got to Sanborn & Vail's—you remember, the corner of Market and Fifth—I spent another good hour looking over a portfolio of those lovely photographs up-stairs. A portfolio, did I say? Well, yes, but a great improvement on the ordinary pasteboard concern that lets everything slip out on the floor just at the wrong minute, or nips them fast so there is no getting out the particular one you want without a struggle. This one of polished wood, in several compartments, lets down a broad leaf that has a leg to stand-on, and permits your sitting before it as comfortably as before a table. Admirers of Sir Joshua Reynolds pictures will find some excellent reproductions among them, but the cutest thing out that is entirely new is a picture entitled, "Moving Day," and its companion, "Family Cares." You must surely see them. I like engravings so much better than colored pictures; don't you? You will want to hear of my selections. I found that the dark frames, principally ebony, are the most popular just now. So, for my engravings, these were my choice. Those of medium width, with a design quite simple, and mostly consisting of corner bunches, is engraved in white; the inner border is of pale gray enamel, similarly ornamented, but in white instead of black, and a fine band of gilding relieves all suspicion of too much sombreness. Imitations of various woods are much used also. The old style gilt frame is still used for heavy, dark portraits, and large mirrors to some extent, but "combination" seems to be the rule here as in everything else, and the handsomest are of that kind. The black line engraving on a flat surface makes a very effective style. I shall have my favorite De Haas in one before you see it again. To illustrate the fluctuations of trade, Mr. Sanborn told me that of late, instead of importing the pretty violet frames and small easel stands, they are exporting them quite largely. I was reminded, by seeing a variety of brackets and carved woodwork, of your pretty fancy of having some made of California woods to send to Eastern friends. You can have them done here, either in designs of your own or those made on purpose for you, for all this work is done under Mr. S.'s personal supervision. Isn't it abominable the way American artists are being treated at the Paris Exposition? Not one admitted. Even Bierstadt, Huntington, and Hill shut out, though there is a rumor that one of the latter's may be accepted. The very next time we have a "show" we'll be of honor to France, and so "heap coals of fire on heads," and, Tom irreverently suggests, "send him out!" Something new and pretty in hair combs and feather, which are neither comb nor feather properly, but ingenious imitations made of hair, the first being made of one's own, the second of strings of delicate frizzes, which are looped from the crown of the head, and fall in a graceful, featherlike droop nearly to the shoulder. The comb is an open, basket-work braid like those you see in German peasant pictures, three or four strands in width, and rises from among the puffs that finish the extreme top of the head exactly like a comb that is stuck in sideways. I have a horror usually of those barber-heads with their mane faces, but the one on which I saw this style—and which, by the way, I nearly forgot to tell you, is at Shephard's, on Stockton Street, near Market—looked so like you, ma chère, that it caught my eye; hence this transcription for your benefit. Furthermore, I was seduced into a shampoo by their especial method, and I can't tell you how much I enjoyed it. The way your head is cuddled up in the towel and patted and patted, as if it were a spoiled child, is worth the price of the operation. Miss Shephard took the prize at the last Mechanics Fair for her particular line of work—the bronze medal, I think it was—and would have had one expressly for shampooing probably, if the committee had submitted its several heads to her personal manipulations. How can one write of heads without coming back at once to the delightful subject of bonnets, of which I am sure you are always glad to hear. Madame Oulif, Dupont and O'Farrell Streets, has a number of beauties on hand. I dropped in this morning under the impression that it must be an "opening day," there was so great a display of natty hats and evening bonnets visible from the door, but it was slack time, madame said, and very little that was new yet, except the "Opera," and the "Princess," two immensely popular hats, each with a turned-up brim, the former being bent in three large waves along the edge, the latter plain and filled in with flowers. Fruit is becoming more and more fashionable, either twined in with flowers or alone, cherries at present, being in season, are prime favorites. The "Balsamo" is just the thing for country wear. It is of course white or brown straw, tied down with a brown veil, which is held on one side by bunches of flowers or fruit. It must be worn far back on the head. Here is somewhat for you to do to pass the time. Make yourself a monogram fan, that's the latest. It must be some plain color, black, white or gray, in order to match any costume, and on it you paste the monograms of your gentleman friends, which you cut from letter paper, etc. The grouping is according to your own fertile fancy. I tried two or three pretty things at Sherman & Hyde's yesterday, among them those two songs from the burlesque of Evangeline, "Where art Thou now, my Beloved?" and "The Song of Birds." The first is especially pretty, not difficult nor requiring great range of voice, an advantage for ordinary singers that is peculiar to opera bouffe music. Millard's last "Alas!" is rather effective and exceedingly Millard-ish; not as good as his "Waiting," and some others. Stuckenholtz has reduced Drasdil's great success, "I cannot Sing the Old Songs," to a schottische. I make the announcement with sincere sorrow. It seems like desecration to me who do so detest that particular phase of the mild lunacy we call dancing; but then Stuckenholtz does everything so well that I suppose this must be forgiven him. When you summer runaways come back to town you will find a pleasant innovation at the California; that is, the establishment of a "Vienna Confectionery," inside the building, and the adoption of the pleasant European fashion of having ices, and they do say something stronger, if you want it, handed round during the entracte. Martial, formerly in Thurlow Block, has gone over to Market Street—752—with his glove store. His specialty is Jouvin's, though for a moderate priced glove, and one which gives general satisfaction, the Nilsson is well recommended, and, I am told, is selling five and six dozen pairs a day at his new place. The business here is a branch of the Paris house. I want to correct a slight mistake I made last week in placing Tucker's trunk store on Pine instead of Bush, near Kearny. I wish you had been here to go with me when I had my last photos taken at Houseworth's. They are just perfect, cabinet size, and only eight instead of ten dollars a dozen, since the late reduction in the prices there. The life-size crayon picture of Rose Wood as "Zoe" in the Octoroon, that stands in the vestibule at Baldwin's this week, was taken by Mr. Hamilton, Houseworth's own artist, and done in an incredibly short space of time—the order being given on Friday, and the picture delivered on Monday. I missed the last Bench show, but it was almost as good seeing the portraits of all the competing canines, done by the instantaneous process that is used for taking babies, race-horses and other active animals. The world is going so fast nowadays that I should not be surprised to know that Edison or some other inventive genius had invented a process for taking the typical "flash of greased lightning," without scorching the paper. Houseworth is making animal pictures a specialty, and has a room for the express accommodation of this special class of sitters (I hope the types won't make that settlers). He has some fine photos of Governor Stanford's and Mrs. Mark Hopkins' houses, taken lately. That reminds me, I heard the other day that Senator Sharon's house is about to be overhauled, preparatory to its being sold—the probability being that it will be bought for a club, but whether for one now in existence, or one about to be formed, is more than your faithful gossip can say. There is a fascinating picture just now on exhibition at Locan's. It is "Brunhilde, Queen of Normandy, condemned to death for inciting civil war." The author is Otto Schrader, and he has done a fine piece of work in this, his latest.

Yours, as always, LILIAS DUBOIS.

The following letter was recently written by a boy in Augusta, seven years of age, to his uncle in Savannah:

"Dear uncle George please get me a newfoundland dog. I want a puppy. I hope you are well like I am. I go to school now and have recess. I am bad off for the dog. send him as soon as you can. I send my love to you for christ sake amen."

ROBERT S. H.

Chicago females visit condemned murderers in prison and actually kiss them. This is taking a very unfair advantage of a man. He has no escape, and is therefore compelled to submit. We now understand why those two men who were hanged in Chicago, a few days ago, expressed a desire a month previously to have the execution take place "as soon as possible."

O ladies, softly fair,
Who curl and comb your hair,
And deck your dainty bodies, eve and morn,
With pearls and flowery spray,
And knots of ribbons gay,
As if ye were for idlesse only born,
Hearken to Wisdom's call:
What are ye, after all,
But flaunting poppies in among the corn!

Whose lives but part repeat;
Whose little dancing feet
Swim lightly as the silvery mists of morn;
Whose pretty palms unclosed
Like some fresh dewy rose,
For dainty dalliance, not for distaffs, born;
Hearken to Wisdom's call:
What are ye, after all,
But flaunting poppies in among the corn!

O women, sad of face,
Whose crowns of girlish grace
Sin has plucked off and left ye all forlorn,
Whose pleasures do not please,
Whose hearts have no heart's ease,
Whose seeming honor is of honor shorn,
Hearken to Wisdom's call:
What are ye, one and all,
But painted poppies in among the corn!

Women, to name whose name
All good men blush for shame,
And had men even, with the speech of scorn;
Who have nor sacred sight
For Vesta's lamps so white,
Nor hearing for old Triton's wretched horn,
Oh, hark to Wisdom's call:
What are ye, one and all,
But poison poppies in among the corn!

Women who will not cease
From toil, nor be at peace
Either at purple eve or yellowing morn,
But drive with pitiless hand
Your plowshares through the land
Quick with the lives of daisies yet unborn,
Hearken to Wisdom's call:
What are ye, after all,
But troublous poppies in among the corn!

Blighting with fretful looks
The tender-tasseled stocks—
Sweeping your wide floored barns, with sighs forlorn
About the unfilled grains
And starving hunger-pains
That on the morrow, haply, shall be borne—
Oh, hark to Wisdom's call:
What are ye, after all,
But forward poppies in among the corn!

O virgins, whose pure eyes
Hold commerce with the skies—
Whose lives lament that ever ye were born,
The cross whose joy to wear
Never the rose but only just the thorn,
Hearken to Wisdom's call:
What are ye, after all,
Better than poppies in among the corn!

What better? Who abuse
The gifts wise women use,
With locks sheared off and bosoms scourged and torn,
Lapping your veils so white
Betwixt ye and the light,
Composed in heaven's sweet cisterns morn by morn,
Oh, hark to Wisdom's call:
What are ye, after all,
Better than poppies in among the corn!

O women, rare and fine,
Whose mouths are red with wine
Of kisses of your children, night and morn,
Whose ways are virtue's ways,
Whose good works are your praise,
Whose hearts hold nothing God has made in scorn—
Though Fame may never call
Your names, ye are, for all,
The Ruths that stand breast-high amid the corn!

Your steadfast love and sure
Makes all beside it poor;
Your cares like royal ornaments are worn;
Wise women! What so sweet,
So queenly, so complete
To name ye by, since ever one was born?
Since she, whom poets call
The sweetest of you all,
First gleaned with Boaz in among the corn?

XXXII.—THE BRIDAL HOUR.

The moon's gray tent is up; another hour,
And yet another will bring the time
To which, through many cares and checks, so slowly,
The golden day did climb.

Take all the books away, and let no noises
Be in the house while softly I undress
My soul from broideries of disguise, and wait for
My own true love's caress.

The sweetest sound will tire to-night; the dew-drops
Setting the green ears in the corn and wheat,
Would make a discord in the heart attuned to
The bridegroom's coming feet.

Love! blessed love! if we could hang our walls with
The splendors of a thousand rosy Mays,
Surely they would not shine so well as thou dost,
Lightning our dusty days.

Without thee, what a dim and woeful story
Our years would be, O excellence sublime!
Ship of the life eternal, brightly growing
In the low soil of time!

ALICE CARY.

Self-respect is the noblest garment with which a man may clothe himself—the most elevating feeling with which the mind can be inspired. One of Pythagoras' wisest maxims, in his Golden Verses, is that in which he enjoins the pupil to "reverence himself."

The question, "What's in a name?" may find an answer by putting it at the bottom of a promissory note.

Make yourself an honest man, and then you may be sure that there is one rascal less in the world.

LITTLE JOHNNY ON KEARNY.

Sootymugs.—The True Inardness of Politics Illustrated by a Story of a Horse and a Gun.—The Fable of the Pollywog and the Pollywog's Tail.—The Author's Sister's Young Man's Brilliant Essay at Genealogy on the Down-Grade Ancestral Line.—Irrelevant but Natural Transition from Kearnyism to Hanging.

Uncle Ned he said: "Johnny, do you know what these Karmy fellers is a goin to do with this Guyment when they have got it?" and I spoke up, quick as you ever see a boy in school, and said: "Run it for to soot theirself."

Then Uncle Ned he said: "Johnny, if you cude jest see the faces of their deligths wich they have lected you wudent think there was any need for em to soot theirself, cos they have ol ready ben sooted by the band of a artist."

Then, wen I ast Uncle Ned wot was politticks all about, he tole me a little story.

Once there was a nigger wockin a long a rode, and he was over-look, the nigger was, by a wite man ridin on a horse back and carryin a gun. Then the wite man he said: "Im in big luck for to find you; you jest keep up with me to open and shet the gates, or lle shoot you."

But bime by the wite man he got tired carryin the gun, and he said a other time: "You aint got a nuff to do for to keep you out of michif. You got to carry my gun, too."

After a wile the nigger he said: "You got a horse and I got a gun; now for a division of propty."

So the nigger he pinte the gun at the wite man and made him git off his horse back, and the nigger he got on, and the wite man he had to wock, and open and shet the gates, and lug the gun, and have the sore feet his ownself. But bime by the wite man he thot a wile and then he said: "Mewtation is the great law of Nature, this is a world of change. I think it is a bout time for a other division of propty. You jest git off that horse back and take this gun."

And so it went on all the time, and they never got to where they was goin, cos it took em all their time to git on and off; for the feller wich had the horse was always too lazy for to tote the gun, and the feller wich was made to tote the gun always got the horse.

Uncle Ned he says the Karmy fellers is the nigger, and we is the wite man, wich bas jest handed him the gun. But my father he says wen it comes to callin them sand lot fellers niggers he wude like to kno wot kind of quodderpeds is to take the name of Nicks.

My father he says that feller Karmy has got to come to greef sooner or later, but Uncle Ned he says he gesses the greef wil be ourn, and Karmy wil jest come to look on and see how it is a workin. One mornin father he was readin the hed lines of the Ally out loud, and thay said: "Thiefs Fall Out. A Split in the Shirkinmen's Ranx. The Insenjry's Torch Tore by Discention. Karmy and Knight Lock Horns. A Horse Divided Against Himself Cant Stand Up."

Wen he got that far, Uncle Ned he spoke up and he said: "Once there was a tad-pole, wich some fokes calls a molly wog, and it was mostly all head, with jest a little bit of tail. Bime by some legs grode out, and it left the water and lived on the bank of the pond, and begun to jump, sted of swimmin, and didnt have no use for a tail, wich dride up and wasent nice to look at. So the tail it got mad, and said, the tail did: 'I ben a faiful follerer, but if you are a goin to stay out here on dry land, were we cant git any thing for to fil our belly with, lle thro you hier than a kite; yes, in deed, lle shake you, and you mus git yure meals best way you can.' So the follerer it fel away, and the tad-pole, wich was now a fine bul-frog, it turnd a round and et it every little tiny bit up."

But whats all this got to do with Mister Karmy and Mister Knight is wot flores me!

Them fellers tocks a good deel a bout the dignity of laber, but I notice no boddly likes for to dignify more than jest a little wile at once, even wen the mometer is at ninety in the shade. If the laberers is the only tru nobility I think most of the chappies wich voted the workn man's ticket is commoners. And now lle tel you a little story wich my sister's yung man tole me:

In the year 1889 the workn men had got all the offices, and Mister Karmy was a grate pollytition. He had got rich and had a big house on Nob Hil, and had lots of cumpy, but not any body wich had ever worked in all their lifes, or wasent rich, too. At first he bragd how he was a poor feller once his own self, but bime bi he didnt say any more a bout that. And at first he had his coat of arms painted all over every thing wich he owned, and the coat of arms was a man drivin a dray; but evry time it was painted new the dray got more and more like a chariot, and the man kep a groin into a Apollo, wich after a wile he said he was desended from throo a long line of Italian kings. One time this grate pollytition fel a sleep and had a dream wich he thot was shure anuf. He dreamed, Mister Karmy the pollytition did, that a little black feller wich had horns like a cow's horns and a tail to match, only no tossel on it, more like a fish hook, come to him and said: "You are as proud as a turkey cox; I mus take you down a peg; yes, indeed, lle make you humble as a little spring lam. You come a long with me and lle show you yure ansisters, cos them pourtraits on yure walls was took bad, no likeniss."

Then Mister Karney found hissef in a grave yard, and the little black feller moved a stone and led him down some stairs into a other world, like on the bottom crust of pie, only not so sticky. Bime bi thay come to a little hut made of terf, and looked in the window, and there in the dark thay seen a dirty ole Irish man a sleepin off his wisky on a heap of straw, long side a pig. Then the little black feller twinkled his tail like a labm, and said: "There's one ansister," and Mister Karmy he blusht jest like Billy, thats my brother, wen my mother asks wot's become of that stroberry jam, and said, Mister Karmy did: "Wich is the ansister?"

Then thay went on, and prety sune thay found a ugly chap in striped close, like a wops, only not any sting, jest his hair and ears cropt, and a big watch chain onto his feets. Wen the little black feller pinte him out, and smiled like a cole skuttle, the grate pollytition put his hands up before his eyes, so, and groned like he had et all his cake and Billy's up too.

Then the little black feller he said: "I aint got only one more for to sho you, cos you havent had but three ansisters wich was distingisht, and this is the first of the lot, but pon my honner as a workn man my own self, Ime all most a shame for to be so dam hard on you as to sho you thins. I wish you was wel out of this, poor feller, but here goes. Behole the lustrious founder of yure family!"

And wen the grate pollytition pulled his eyes out of his hands for to look, there stude the lustrious founder. It was a other pollytition.

Billy he says wy dont Govner Irwin hang Mister Karmy, but Mister Pichel, thats the preacher, he says wot good wude that do, cos he woud enlist the pliiikle simpatize of the hull country by sayin on the scaffle that it was for murder.

One time a feller was led out for to be hung for killin a nigger, and be tole the crowd that he dide at peace with the bul world, and his only regret was that that snifle nigger wasent spared to be present and see how a Christen coud die.

A other time, wile the rope was bein put on a other feller's neck, he turned to the sherif, wich had jest got shook by a yung lady wich he wanted for to marry, and he said, the feller did: "I see a lot of chaps about this ere gallus wich has got sinched by yung womens; may be if youd put my chance up to oction you wud get enough money for to bild a new jail."

To Whom It May Concern.

There's a land that is fairer than this; a land of immeasurable beauties and inexpressible pleasures. There the clear heaven overspreads its fathomless and unflecked vastitudes of blue above a laughing earth. Through forests of tropical luxuriance wander grassy paths, here bathed in golden sunlight, there checkered with the shade of overarching boughs. No harsh sound breaks the almost sacred silence. The tender trill of the birds' song blends softly with the low murmurs of the heaven-kissing tops of immemorial elms. Through the far sunlit vistas flit fairy forms of sylph-like loveliness. The spell of eternal spring hangs over all things. No drift of snow, no rime of bitter frost ever chills the fresh emerald of the grass; only the white apple blossoms sink from the embraces of the wanton west wind to the bosom of earth. Here and there clear fountains gush forth musically murmuring, and through their crystal current the eye catches the gleam of diamond pebbles and Pactolian sands. Far in the vernal depths of this land stands a palace of lordly magnificence that no words may paint. Pillars of chalcedony and jasper support a roof of beaten silver; over floors of polished agate the wanderer passes through passages that burn with precious stones set in panels of gold. In an inner court, where curtains of costly stuffs temper the glare of day, a throne awaits him; a silken cushioned structure of jade and amethyst. He nods his head; at the signal, the air is filled with a strange, delicious music, and a hundred odalisques, more than mortal in their exquisitely sensuous grace, surround him; lithe Almehts turn and twine in their weird delicious dance, and loosen the fluctuant transparent robes from their dusky quivering limbs. All around him, as the shades of night fall, glows a subdued light from lamps wherein priceless oils exhale fragrance. Aromatic odors steal over his senses; a spell of languorous delight takes possession of his whole being; existence seems transfigured, and life a dream, a vision of glorious, ineffable joy. That is where the office-boy goes when you send him round the corner to get milk for the cat, and he comes back one hour and three-quarters afterward and says the apothecary doesn't keep it.

THE DEATH OF POE'S SWEETHEART.

[Announcement is made of the death of Sarah Helen Whitman, at Providence, of heart disease. To this lady Poe was for some time engaged in marriage, but the lady wisely made the engagement conditional, and the weakened, dissolute poet was unable to observe the conditions, and they parted. In his lecture on poetry he awarded to her a "pre-eminence in refinement of art, enthusiasm, imagination, and genius," an estimate which the cultured lady scarcely justified. It was in September, 1848, that they became acquainted, and he thereafter often visited her in Providence. His published letters to his fiancée show much delicacy, and a refined moral sense, and are among the most creditable of all his writings. But some of them betray, in the language of Sarah Whitman, "the agony of the conflict in which he was foredoomed to defeat, with a power which no added word could heighten." The romantic circumstances attending his first meeting with this lady have been beautifully narrated by himself in his poem "To Helen," as follows:—]

To Helen.

I saw thee once—once only—years ago;
I must not say how many—but not many.
It was a July midnight; and from out
A full-orbed moon, that, like thine own soul, soaring,
Sought a precipitate pathway up through Heaven,
There fell a silvery-silken veil of light,
With quietude and sultriness and slumber,
Upon the upturned faces of a thousand
Roses that grew in an enchanted garden,
Where no wind dared to stir, unless on tiptoe—
That gave out, in return for the love-light,
Their odorous souls in an ecstatic death—
Fell on the upturned faces of these roses
That smiled and died in this parterre, enchanted
By thee and by the poetry of thy presence.

Clad all in white upon a violet bank
I saw thee balf reclining; while the moon
Fell on the upturned faces of the roses,
And on thine own, upturned—alas, in sorrow!

Was it not fate that on this July midnight—
Was it not fate (whose name is also sorrow)—
That bade me pause before that garden gate,
To breathe the incense of those slumbering roses?
No footstep stirred: the hated world all slept,
Save only thee and me. (O Heaven! O God!
How my heart beats in coupling those two words!)
Save only thee and me. I paused—I looked—
And in an instant all things disappeared.
(Ah, bear in mind this garden was enchanted!)
The pearly lustre of the moon went out;
The mossy banks and the meandering paths,
The happy flowers and the rejoicing trees
Were seen no more; the very roses' odors
Died in the arms of the adoring airs.
All—all expired save thee—save less than thou;
Save only the divine light in thine eyes—
Save but the soul in thine uplifted eyes.
I saw but them—they were the world to me.
I saw but them—saw only them for hours—
Saw only them until the moon went down.
What wild heart histories seemed to lie enwritten
Upon those crystalline, celestial spheres!
How dark a wo! yet how sublime a hope!
How silently serene a sea of pride!
How daring an ambition! yet how deep—
How fathomless a capacity for love!

But now, at length, dear Dian sank from sight
Into a western couch of thunder-cloud;
And thou, a ghost, amid the entombing trees
Didst glide away. Only thine eyes remained.
They would not go—they never yet have gone.
Lighting my lonely pathway home that night,
They have not left me (as my hopes have) since.
They follow me—they lead me through the years.
They are my ministers—yet I their slave.
Their office is to illumine and enkindle—
My duty is to be saved by their bright light
And purified in their electric fire,
And sanctified in their elysian fire.
They fill my soul with Beauty (which is Hope)
And are far up in Heaven—the stars I kneel to
In the sad silent watches of my night;
While even in the meridian glare of day
I see them still—two sweetly scintillant
Venuses, unextinguished by the sun!

The Wanderer's Shell.

One, lost and hopeless, found a shell
Far from its mother sea;
Its loneliness was as a spell,
That brought to him the olden swell
Of sweet waves tenderly.

Close by, the dusky mountain chains
Were crowned with misty pinewoods;
It was the land where silence reigns,
And the lost man, with bitter pains,
Dreamed of old fields and vines.

A peaceful cloud went slowly by,
As a fair, floating sail;
He heard again the sea-bird's cry,
Again the dear wave's low reply—
His face grew set and pale.

A thought broke all his moods to smiles;
He leaned with childish grace,
And took the shell; through lone defiles
The wind, with all its happy wiles,
Blew gently on his face.

At last, above a friendly tide,
He took it from his breast,
And looked on ocean, blue and wide;
Then with slow fingers let it glide
To its remembered rest.

The Origin of the Rose.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF ECKERT.]

A lambkin in the pasture nibbled rose-bush twig
From pure caprice and joy, nor meant to harm the sprig.

For that the rose's thorn caught from the lambkin there
One little flock of wool that did not leave it bare.

The thorn's sharp fingers yet the bit of fleece possess,
When came the nightingale, alert to make her nest.

She said, "Oh, open thy hand, and give that tuft to me,
And when my nest is done I will sing thanks to thee."

It gave, she took, and built, and as her trilling flows,
The thorn enraptured hears, and bursts into the rose.

SATURDAY, JULY 13, 1878.

It is understood that the Democratic programme, arranged at Sacramento during the last session of the Legislature, provides that Governor Irwin shall renominated for Governor, and Hon. Frank McCoppin for Lieutenant-Governor. This lets out the chivalry, and accounts for the attitude of that wing of the party and the Examiner in relation to the Constitutional Convention. It is a coalition between the Northern Democracy and the Irish. The labor movement is a demoralizing one, and creates confusion in the councils of the Democracy. A movement was put on foot by the Republicans at Sacramento, last winter, to nominate George Evans, of San Joaquin, as the Republican candidate for Governor. We have heard no one named for Lieutenant-Governor, and do not believe the Evans movement has gained any great momentum. It is said that the corporations favor the nomination of Senator Evans by the Republicans, and that they do not disfavor the nomination of Irwin and McCoppin by the Democracy. A movement is quietly on foot—non-partisan in its character—to nominate John F. Swift for Governor, with Waters, of San Bernardino, for Lieutenant-Governor. Swift is a Republican, and has won an anti-monopolist reputation by his persistent opposition in the courts and Legislature to the Spring Valley Water Company, while Waters was pronounced in his hostility to every measure favoring corporations during the session of the last Legislature. Senator Booth returns from Washington next week. If he determines to do so, he can mark out the policy and control the nominations of the Republican party, or he can reorganize a formidable Independent party.

We remember, many years ago, remarking to George Pen Johnston, that when the war was ended, slavery abolished, and the negro question eliminated from our national politics, that there would grow up at the North and South a great national party, not unlike that of the original Whig party—one that would embrace the intelligence, wealth, and conservatism of the nation. The war ended, and there came into our national politics an element that we did not calculate upon. The negro was not only made a free man, but he was made an elector. It was right to give him his liberty, because personal freedom is a natural right. It was a mistake to allow negroes to vote. The elective franchise is not a natural right; it is a political concession that ought to be given or withheld from considerations of policy. Nearly all of our entanglements and local troubles, all the vexed questions of reconstruction, the frauds in Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina, the necessity of an electoral commission, the danger that menaced the country at Hayes' inauguration, the Potter investigation, and all the thousand and one disgraceful incidents that have occurred since the war ended, are attributable or traceable to the fact that the negro can vote. This has postponed the time we prophesied; but it will come, and we think we can now see the first signs of the coming dawn of a better political condition. That it is necessary that intelligence and property should combine for protection to society is manifest now to all. The incursion of foreigners for the last thirty years has produced alarming results. The growth of the country and its increase of population has been abnormal. Without here discussing the question of foreign immigration, we may observe that it would have been better if our laws had been more stringent, and that this tide of aliens had not been permitted to sweep over our continent. As the result of this immigration, we have now in our midst a large, vicious, and dangerous element, a riotous, disorderly, and criminal mob of people, who by reason of defective reasoning faculties, idle habits, and dissipated tendencies, allow adventurers and political demagogues to lead them where their interests lie in the direct opposition to the public good. Our unwise generosity has armed a turbulent mass with weapons for our political hurt.

It has become apparent that when this riotous element shall have crystallized into a political party, and shall have drawn to it all the elements of native-born wickedness and foreign ignorance, it will become formidable to republican institutions. It is apparent that in the future it will have to be suppressed by force. To do this, the organization of a political party composed of the order-loving will become necessary. An "order-loving party" will necessarily embrace those of the poorer classes who have intelligence enough to know that their interest lies with order and good government. It will embrace the industrious who look hopefully forward to bettering their condition and the condition of their children. It will embrace all who have property to guard, and all who have rights to protect. It will necessarily embrace the intelligent, because they are intelligent. It will embrace all the honest and patriotic men of the nation, because they are honest and patriotic. This will be an American party—a "national American party." It will be as broad as the bounds of our government, taking in the North, and South, and West. It will invite to coöperate with it all foreign men of intelligence and property who love social order. It will take the gentlemen of the nation, the wealthy, the well-bred, the virtuous, the decent, and the responsible. It will be the party of "aristocracy," the aristocracy of respectability, the aristocracy of the law, the aristocracy of intelligence, the aristocracy of labor. It will be denounced by all the demagogues and adventurers, and loud-mouthed, blatant Democrats, and all the vile, pandering, office-seeking Republicans—that is, it will be so denounced until it becomes the dominant party of the nation. It is to such a party that the writer of this article desires to belong. It is only to such a party as this that republican government can be safely intrusted. A party thus composed is the only one that can keep down agrarianism and communism, and it is the only party that can successfully resist the aggressions of wealth, the greed of corporations, and the tyranny of political power. It is our idea to marshal the great middle class of society into an effective organization for the preservation of its rights, as against the insolence of wealth on the one side, and the insolence of the mob upon the other: a conservative, middle-ground party that shall embrace the landed estates of the country, the farmers that own the land they till, the commercial men of the nation, the manufacturer and artisans of the republic, the professional men and scholars, the gentlemen and thinkers, the quiet, contented, working classes—those who own their own homes, and have families and children. Against such a party as this the wildest storms of fanaticism would rage in vain. Around such an organization the disorderly might riot, the vicious might prowl, the idle might bum and beg. Such a party would give us intelligence in administration; would give us economy and integrity in office. That this class is now divided into parties—Democratic and Republican—is a shameful fact; it is a disgrace; it impeaches our intelligence and challenges our integrity. There is no reason why Mr. Pen Johnston, of the Examiner, should not indorse every line of this article. He is Southern-born, but the war is ended, and slavery is abolished. There is no reason why Mr. Coffee should not indorse this article. He is Irish-born and Catholic, but he is an honest man, and an intelligent one, and he has taken an oath of allegiance to the Republic. Both these gentlemen have (must have) an ingrained contempt for the Democratic party—Johnston must despise the foreign element that forms so large a majority, and Coffee must despise the American part that composes so contemptible and pitiful a minority. The Marysville Appeal suggests the propriety of renaming these parties, styling one "Conservative," and the other "Radical." The question of name seems of but minor importance, and the only significance in dropping as a party designation the word "Democratic" is that many stupid and ignorant electors adhere to the Democratic party because of its name. But as in the new organization we propose that intelligence and property shall be arrayed upon one side, and the stupid and ignorant upon the other, there seems to be no serious objection that this class of persons should style themselves democratic. The reorganization of parties is a national necessity. We are going to pieces under present party dissensions. The prosperity of the country demands some scheme for driving all the rascals, thieves, rioters, bread and butter spoilsmen, adventurers, discontented, criminal, and vicious, as far as may be, into a compact organization. We desire to see the ignorant and criminal massed and mobilized, so that we may know where to find them, and learn what they demand. The rascals are too nearly divided now between the two parties. They are active, ambitious, and owing to the indifference of good citizens, they become leaders, control primaries, conventions, and nominations. The result is the demoralization of both parties. If we can bring intelligent patriotism and property to a coöperation we are in hopes that we may out-number the ignorant, the vicious, and the propertyless. In such an event we should favor laws disfranchising the ignorant and the vicious, and would by force and the organization of a strong local police, and the formation of an efficient army, keep down the violent and the agitators by a discriminating use of the bayonet. We would disfranchise every person who cannot understandingly read our constitution and laws. We would disfranchise every person convicted of a crime. We would disfranchise every chronic idler and vagrant. We would withhold the elective privilege from all foreign-born citizens. In other words, we would establish a ruling class composed of persons who are native-born, intelligent foreigners already naturalized, those who can read and understand the laws, and those who have acquired property. Our government is founded upon sentimentality. It was well enough when, with three millions of people, we were waging a war for national independence and for recognition among nations, to invite to our shores the "oppressed of all peoples." It was well enough to clothe foreigners with the rights of the elective franchise until we found that they abused it. We have tried the experiment, and now, after one hundred and two years of experience, we have demonstrated that five years of pupillage to republican government is insufficient. We have ascertained that the foreign vote is an element of national danger, and the time has now come when, in self-defense, we are compelled to consider the necessity of reorganizing our naturalization laws. We appeal to this newly-elected convention to lead out in this direction, and trust to the people of California that they will ratify a constitution that shall set the example of elective reform to the other States of the Union, and rebuke this wild spirit of misrule and disorder that is now abroad in our land.

Commander Glass sails with his ninety boys for the South Sea Islands in the Jamestown. The annual cost of this absurd yachting experiment is $50,000. A training-ship for profligate youngsters, at a cost exceeding that of educating them at the University of California, is a striking instance of the kind of sentimentality that is controlling our educational system. If the training-ship Jamestown should burn, and Commander Glass be driven to earn an honest living as captain of a merchant ship, it would not be a serious calamity either to the commercial marine or to the educational system of the State. We regard the whole sham as a piece of wicked profligacy out of which idle politicians may steal from the tax-payers a luxurious living for a few worthless favorites. Our common school system is of the same piece of cloth. We spend in San Francisco one million of dollars annually to over-educate or mis-educate our children. The average graduate of our high schools, both boys and girls, is (by the system) rendered unfit for the station in life to which he or she has been born. It is a sufficiently difficult problem to solve, "What shall be done with our boys and girls?" It is a more complex one to answer what shall be done with a freckled faced girl whose mother is a washerwoman, or a pug-nosed boy whose father carries a hod, after she is educated above her station and he to be ashamed of his father's vocation. The present educational system is destructive of all respect for physical labor. If the statistics of our San Francisco schools could be ascertained, we are confident that the children who have graduated in crime out-number those who have accepted a life of physical labor. We are producing a class of useless boys and unprofitable girls. We are overcrowding the professions and we are producing no working class. The Chinese become more and more of a necessity, as time demonstrates the fact that from our native American population we are furnishing no workers and from our foreign-born very few. If it were not for our immigrating class industrial vocations would come to a dead lock. If it were not for the Chinese among us we should have so limited a number of menial servants that the whole system of domestic life would be compelled to undergo an organic change. The time will come, when in America and in California, the fact will assert itself that our present common school system is destructive of the class of working people. Nor do we believe that the kind and degree of education given at our high grade free schools is calculated to preserve either the virtue or the honesty of our rising generation. Our system of punishment for crime is equally out of joint. It is a more comfortable position to be a prisoner in San Quentin than to be a day laborer outside its walls. To the man who has lost his pride or his ambition, and to whom the mere creature comforts of life is all he demands, he may get within those walls clothing, food, medical attendance, and diminished hours of labor, that it is, if not impossible, at least difficult to secure on the outside. The county jail is the tramp's city of refuge and hospital. Sentimentality of the soft hearted and soft headed philanthropist protects him from labor and the chain gang, and sends him turkeys for Thanksgiving and books to inform his mind. The Industrial School moves our sympathies whenever a hoodlum is thrashed, and the ship Jamestown with Commander Glass is provided, at $50,000 a year, to take ninety scapegrace boys yachting to the islands of the South Pacific. The only class for which no sensibility is aroused is the over-burdened tax-payer who foots the bills.

The Constitutional Convention is happily constituted. It is Non-partisan by a clear majority. Eleven Republicans, seven Democrats, and fifty-one labor discontents will fairly represent all the grumbling elements of society. A majority of the Convention is composed of intelligent persons who own property and are interested in the maintenance of order and the preservation of good government.

PRATTLE.

A bishop of Virginia, patriotically concerned for the fame and popularity of the "reel" and "break-down," peculiar to that commonwealth, refuses the rite of confirmation to any man or woman who practices "round" dancing.

This good prelate has received from that great moralist, the author of The Dance of Death, what he supposes to be a letter approving his course, but feels a natural misgiving about opening it, lest it contain an all too warm and alluring description of the dance condemned.

"It is melancholy," says a writer quoted by a local morning journal, "to see how large the proportion is of young ladies who marry solely to get rid of their mothers." The desire to have done with the old lady is commendable because natural; the really melancholy part of the business is the method adopted of "throwing her over"—delivering her, bound and gagged, into the hands of that pattern and example of cruelty, the soulless son-in-law!

Mr. John Bartlett says he has traced the origin of the familiar line, "Though lost to sight to memory dear;" he avers that it was written by one Augustus Braham at an unknown date in the last century. This is a mistake: I find it was used six months before, by Theresa Corlett, in her Ode to Queen Anne.

The New York Herald calls the death of Queen Mercedes "another and exceedingly painful illustration of the sanitary condition of the palaces of Europe." Of all attacks, open and covert, that American freemen have made on the "monarchical system" this is the most ingenious and insidious. We confidently expect from the palaces a thronging output of effete sovereigns and tottering despots, like swarms of rats evicted from their holes.

Miners are continually dying of heat in the lower levels of the Comstock, but that does not disturb the pride of the Gold Hill News in the facts that on the surface there are snow-storms all the year round, and water congeals at forty degrees. Gold Hill, I suppose, is the place described in the familiar missionary hymn—

"Where every prospector freezes,
And only miners bide."

Our local press has "exerted" itself with considerable industry to account for the unexpected circumstance that a Californian mare was beaten in a race with a Kentuckian horse. It was the muddy track. It was the humid day. It was the enervating effect of the Eastern climate—on the susceptible tissues and tallows of a beast accustomed to the midsummer races at Sacramento! May be it was because the horse pulled up his feet and replaced them on the ground with a nimbleness that the mare was unable to achieve.

Some of our citizens who have had the misfortune to be "cinched" for their "loyalty to California" in this horse-race business display the customary alacrity to "damn the jockey," and account for their losses by "incompetent riding." This is like walking a long way to find one's feet; the trouble was incompetent betting.

At the dedication of a church, the other day, the officiating clergyman expressed his belief that his deceased predecessor in the holy office of pastor was spiritually present. Why not bodily? The dead are fond of religious ceremonies of this character. At the consecration of a new convent near Tours, in the sixteenth century, all the nuns who had died in the old one arose and passed round the new edifice three times, chanting a hymn. This is related by Brabius, who seems to have risen from his own grave to relate it, for his account of it is dated 1583, whereas he died in 1567. When the church in which Charlemagne was afterward buried (in the discarded sarcophagus of Augustus) was consecrated in 804 there were present 363 prelates of the Church. (The world was not then afflicted with a famine of clergymen. It has not been since.) Two bishops of Tongres then arose from their graves at Maestricht, and attended the performance in order to make the number of prelates equal to the number of days in a year. If you do not believe it, reader, you can easily satisfy yourself that a year has exactly 365 days. What more would you have?

Supervisor Gibbs promises to introduce a resolution, shortly, abolishing licenses. It is hoped that this will not include the "poetic license" which permits our local bards to rhyme "flower" with "languish" and "heart" with "despair," conclude a line of dactyls with an anapaest, and make a monosyllable of "incomprehensibility." We can get on without municipal revenue, but not without municipal poetry.

SUPERVISOR SCOTT.—I move that the resignation of Mr. Brickwedel be rejected, and he resume his seat in this Board. SUPERVISOR FOLEY.—I object; Mr. Brickwedel gave as a reason for resigning that he could not afford to associate with thieves. SUPERVISOR BRICKWEDEL.—I apologize; on reflection I think I can. ALL.—That is satisfactory.

I fear if we hang up a set of rigid "house regulations" in the Temple of the Muses the effect upon the present lot of devotees will be like that intended by the following notice, displayed above the door of a Belgian village church: "Les chiens hors de la maison de Dieu."

By the way, speaking of poetic license, I wonder how the ARGONAUT's clever contributor, Miss May Hawley, justifies her use, throughout an entire poem, of the name "Dolores" as a dissyllable rhyming with "shores." Dr. Johnson once "explained away" an error to a lady critic who had "caught him out," in these words: "Ignorance, pure ignorance, madam." As frankness is a charming attribute it is not to be doubted that Miss Hawley has it, but it is not so easy to believe she has the ignorance. If I might venture a word of counsel to this gifted young lady it would be to give a little more care to the mechanical construction of her verses, and throw away her copy of the Songs of the Sierras. We can not afford to have any of her gold wasted by careless handling, or adulterated by admixture with the base metal of Mr. Joaquin Miller.

I have sometimes proposed to myself the pleasure of devoting these columns for one week to a talk with several of this paper's lady contributors—I to do all the talking, as a matter of course. I say several—they are not all worth it. There are various reasons why I have not done so—such as consciousness of my lack of that "small talk" which a great statesman considered an indispensable qualification in the Prime Minister of a Queen; fear that by rude speech I should offend even in admiration, and catch it back upon the ear (for female writers are not, like the conies of scripture, "a feeble folk"); and, finally, apprehension that my sincerest praise would be misconstrued as veiled censure. But for these and other considerations how delightful it would be to metaphorically gather this pretty brood about my knees and give them good counsel out of my abundant (because never-drawn-upon) literary wisdom—laying an admonishing hand upon the head of this one or that, shaking the finger of warning under the nose of Blondette, and permitting the slow growth of a tolerant smile beneath my own as Blackeyes develops her "idea"; then administering encouraging pats all round, and concluding with a general imposition of hands and a comprehensive blessing! I think, indeed, I could endure the performance of the various rites and ceremonies in something more than a metaphorical manner.

While on this pleasant subject I wish (if it is permitted) to say a serious word concerning one whom I had not in mind in penning the foregoing paragraph—one for whose talent my respect is too deep to permit me to think lightly when thinking of her—I mean Miss Emma Frances Dawson. If that name does not recall to the regular reader of this journal two stories—"Shadowed," and "An Itinerant House"—the regular reader may justly boast himself possessed of a memory that is steel to impress and tallow to retain. Faults they had in abundance—faults enough to gratify the most insatiable critic—but these demerits had this merit: they were the faults of genius. It is not my custom to set "the crown of praise" upon every head that is presented, but of Miss Dawson I should like to be understood as affirming, with whatever of strength resides in forthright sincerity, that in all the essential attributes of literary competence she is a head and shoulders above any writer on this coast with whose work I have acquaintance; and on this judgment I gladly hazard my small possession and larger hope of reputation for critical sagacity. To that admirable young woman nothing but the undesirable is denied. She has but to let her mind be penetrated with the significance of the fact that the best products of the human brain are called "works"—taking their name from the only possible method of their production—and through noble toil will come a noble reward. In the mean time, if she has not had the providence to be born wealthy, she must learn to live without eating.

The professional journalist never, I think, adequately realizes the public's ignorance of what to him are the most familiar professional facts, and is subject all his life to new surprises as one phase or another of it is revealed. For example, I was asked, not long ago, by one of the most intelligent persons of my acquaintance, why the ARGONAUT did not achieve all attainable literary excellence in all its features and departments. My first reply was, naturally, that I did not manage the ARGONAUT; but, perceiving that this might be misunderstood as a reflection on those who do, I "amended the answer" by making it a question: "Why does yonder merchant keep on his shelves any but the best and highest priced goods?" Being told that that was "a different matter," I frankly confessed it was, and there this luminous and instructive conversation died the peaceful death of a spent match.

As to matches, a friend of mine in lighting his cigar always throws away unignited the first lucifer that he takes from his box and uses the second. For a long time I supposed this custom to be a religious observance of the same kind as pouring a libation to the gods before drinking, and forbore to speak of it; a tribute of brimstone suggesting a divinity to whom my friend would perhaps prefer to do homage in secret. Later I learned that the rite had no other significance than the practical one of economy in time: this acute observer had noticed that one seldom gets a light with his first match.

A daily paper of this city announces that it will publish "an interview between Mr. Stoddard and the distinguished authoress, George Eliot." If I were Mr. Stoddard I would disappoint that journal, if only in revenge for a conjunction of names that is, to say the least, inconsiderate. But there is a better reason: the proposed article is "bad form," and not all the conceded charm of Mr. Stoddard's prose can atone for the violation of taste. George Eliot—who, by the way, I have the misfortune to think a grotesquely overrated writer—is a famous woman; she has achieved a renown which Mr. Stoddard has yet to achieve. No one than he is better aware (and no one than he, I am sure, would more readily admit) that he had no claim to her hospitality or acquaintance that he and every well-behaving man do not enjoy in common, and can not with equal confidence present. Whether he should visit her was a question which he had an undoubted right to determine in the affirmative, subject of course to the possible censure of those who believe that reverence for great intellect should be manifested otherwise; but whether, having visited her, he shall publicly recount the particulars of the visit is a very different question, indeed. It is one which he has no right to decide for himself according to the promptings of his nature or necessities, but which is already decided for him by the universal aversion of well-bred people to the kind of thing which he proposes to do. It is one of those instances in which a man may profitably save himself the trouble of thinking.

Mr. Stoddard's essay in this direction last week was not, I should think, so successful as to encourage him to repetition. It had at least the merit of not being a violation of confidence, whatever may be said as to the point of taste, for the people whose receptions and literary life he so neatly described live for no other apparent purpose than having them described. I happen to know about these people, and they are essentially vulgararians, who, like so many of their class in London, habitually "hunt" literary celebrities, and are hunted by them in turn; for I am sorry to say that the representative literary celebrity of England is a toady from the capital offense of his head to the bottom fact of his foot. He is as prodigiously tickled by the attentions of a knighted butlerman as the knighted butlerman is by his. Socially the two are well-matched; morally the l. c. has commonly the advantage—he is the more immoral. In point of intellect the k. b. is of course incomparably inferior, as is, blazingly apparent by comparison of the book which he feels that his position in the literary world compels him to write, with the gorgeous descriptions of his receptions which the other fellow writes; or even with that person's unpublished lampoons on him which circulate in the club and coffee-house.

But really I have more to say about literary London (and its American contingent) than I care to put into these columns. As for Mr. Stoddard, he is not likely to question either my friendliness or judgment when I urge him not to pursue here a course that can not fail to give him a fame as a toady that will outlast his well-merited reputation as a writer—as the odor of the hog's-lard survives that of the eau de Cologne in the oil of flowers on the head of beauty.

"May we close the office to fight the Indians forty miles away?" telegraphed the officials of the Land Office at Walla Walla; and the Commissioner replied, "You may."

O never may their fame exhale!
O long survive their glory!
Posterity repeat the tale,
Tradition tell the story
Of office-door and money-vault,
Made fast and firm against assault
Through all that dreadful day—
Of heroes, rank on rank, inside—
Strong breasts against the battle's tide,
Strong hearts to bear the fray,
Long arms that felled the savage horde,
Forty miles away!

The editor of the California Christian Advocate is "fer-nist" the State University because it is "Godless." What troubles this good man is not that the University has no God, but that the God of the University will not make it into a kind of Methodist Book Concern. It annoys him also to think that the Deity who cares for the University is the same Deity that looks out for the Baptists.

The dramatic critic of the Chronicle thinks Mr. George Rignold's brain has never been cultivated at the expense of his body. Nor does his moustache show the efflorescence gained by a sacrifice of luxury to the art of him.

anything that came uppermost; the bees that visited my garden, and foraged for honey and pollen in such a fussy, buzzy, blundering way, hurrying and scrambling for fear some other bee should get ahead of them, and muttering and talking about it all the time, like some people who take their dinner with so much needless noise and commotion that their friends wish they would do their eating, in Greenland, and only come home between times. And then of the butterflies, the gorgeous, beautiful creatures, the floating flowers that perch upon the anchored ones, and fan them with their painted wings, and display their beauties in the sunshine, and sip so deftly, that like some other people who take their bite and sup most daintily, pleasing you with their brightness all the time, you hardly ever remember that they eat at all.

And then of the wasps, those fervid fire-worshippers, who seem to die with every chilling wind and to be born again with the sunshine; idle as well as peevish, they like best the vicious silence and other gummy flowers that have already exuded their treasures for them; but most of all they love the juice of a bruised strawberry, an over-ripe raspberry, or a fallen pear. That's the wine for their lordships. They tinkle and tinkle, till they scarcely can rise again in the warm summer air, and then go drifting lazily by to leeward, centerboard down.

The child's eyes had now long been closed, the fingers had fallen quite away from mine, her whole frame seemed quite relaxed and tranquil in a sweet, calm sleep. Softly rising from my seat, and holding up my finger to Everett as an entreaty for perfect stillness, I stole silently away again to my own Garden of Eden.

Not many days after, my Pilkins came once more to see me. I spoke to him cheerfully as he entered the library, but he did not answer. I asked him if anything had happened—if Florry was worse, but he could not answer. I opened my arms and he ran into them, hid his face on my shoulder and cried long, long and heavily.

True to himself, however, he struggled with his sorrow; he checked it as manfully as he could, and soon lifting his head, he said gently:

"My Florry's gone, all gone at last! She went away this morning, just a little while ago, and everything happened the way she wanted it. She had a good sleep the day you were there. When she woke up she said, 'Ettie, dear, when you see the lady that lives in the Gardena-Edena, tell her she soothed me to a sweet, long sleep, the best I ever, ever had.' And in that sleep she had a vision. It was a vision of an angel. It was dressed in white and it looked like you, and had flowers in its band as you had."

I smiled at the simple childishness that did not see how the living fact had suggested the dreaming fancy.

"Yes," Everett went on, "and if smiled, too, like you smiled at Florry, and it looked in her eyes, and it laid its gentle hand on Florry's, and it said, 'I'm sure you would not be afraid to go with me,' and Florry said, 'Oh, no, not at all! I'd love to go with you!' And then it said, 'I shall come soon,' and it faded away like a light, fainter and fainter, smiling at Florry all the time. It looked like you, only it was ever so much bigger and stronger, and dazzled up all the room. Joey said it was a dream, but Florry said no, it was a vision; and farther said, 'Who knows? Let the child take her comfort.' The next morning Florry made them wash her nice and clean, and lay her white frock by her. 'It may come to-day, Ettie, dear,' she said, 'or it may come to-morrow; and I must be all ready.' And yesterday she got all ready again and waited. But this morning she called Joey early, and made her put the white dress on her, and tie her curls with the new white ribbon. 'This is the day,' she said; 'I wasn't sure before, but now I know it; call them in, and kiss me good-bye, all.' Then we all kissed her good-bye, one by one; and little Collo felt lonely, and climbed up on the bed, and cried and lapped her cheek, so she kissed him good-bye, too, and he cuddled right down by her side. Then she said she was tired and wanted to go to sleep; but first she wanted Joey to lay the little new baby on her arm so that she could feel it there a little while, and then she smiled at us and said, 'I'm just as happy as I can be,' and fell fast asleep."

"And did not wake again?"

"Only for a minute. We think the angel must have come for her; for after a while, she opened her eyes quick and bright, just as if somebody had called her, and said softly, 'Yes, yes! I'm all ready!' and smiled and lifted up her arms to be carried, and then—and then—they said she was gone!"

Once more the poor little man gave in to his sorrow, and leaned his head on me, and sobbed while I spoke such words of sympathy as seemed to soothe him best. "Everett," I said at last, "let us do something for Florry that we know she would like. Let us take quantities of flowers, rich, and sweet, and beautiful, and let us make a perfect bed of them—bed, and pillow, and coverlet—for the little form in the little white dress that Florry left behind her."

"Oh, that would be nice," said Everett; "my Florry did love flowers so much."

And so we did; the little, pearl-white child, with all that was beneath her and about her, we so garlanded, and crowned, and wreathed, and decked with flowers that the last picture of her on earth was that of a waxen bird in a great wilderness of glowing brilliant blossoms.

This happened on the eve of a long-planned visit to the sea-shore.

When I returned, after six weeks or more, I missed my little comrade. I looked often at the place in the open parlors where the pleasant little face had been wont to frame itself, and listened many a time for the soft footfalls that used to come so unobtrusively in at the side gate, but in vain. At last I bade my hand-maid, Rose, summon him to his friend and the flowers once more.

"Oh, dear, ma'am," she exclaimed penitently. "I do beg your pardon, I'm sure! I forgot entirely to tell you that the little fellow was here twice to see you. The last time, when I told him you'd be away for a couple of weeks yet, he just cried and said he'd never see you again, and he left a long message for you. I passed particular remarks upon it, madam, he gave it so wise and old-fashioned like! 'Tell her,' said he, 'that I came to say good-bye. Father says a poor man with a big family can't do much for his children, but he can give 'em room to grow, for room's cheap out West in this country, if anything is; so we're going out West, far, far West, and I'm afraid I'll never see her again!'"

His foreboding was true; I have never seen or heard of him since; but still, through the dissolving years, my heart has ever remained faithful to the memory of my own Little Pilkins. S. M.

Everybody seems to think himself a moral half-bushel to measure the world's frailties.

INTAGLIOS.

Conscience.

I sat alone with my conscience
In a place where time had ceased;
And we talked of my former living,
In the land where the years increased.

And I felt I should have to answer
The questions if put to me;
And to face the answer and question
Throughout an eternity.

The ghosts of forgotten actions
Came floating before my sight,
And things that I thought were dead things
Were alive with a terrible might.

And the vision of all my past life
Was an awful thing to face—
Alone with my conscience sitting
In that solemnly silent place.

And I thought of a far away warning,
Of a sorrow that was to be mine;
In a land that then was the future,
But now in the present time.

And I thought of my former thinking,
Of the judgment I was to be;
But sitting alone with my conscience
Seemed judgment enough for me.

And I wondered if there was a future
To this land beyond the grave;
But no one gave me an answer,
And no one came to save.

Then I felt that the future was present,
And the present would never go by;
For it was the thought of my past life
Grown into an eternity.

Then I awoke from my timely dreaming,
And the vision passed away;
And I know the far away warning
Was a warning of yesterday.

And I pray I may not forget it,
In this land before the grave;
That I may not cry in the future,
And no one come to save.

And so I have learned a lesson,
Which I ought to have known before;
And which, though I learnt it dreaming,
I hope to forget no more.

So I get alone with my conscience,
In the place where the years increase,
And I try to remember the future
In the land where time will cease.

And I know of the future judgment,
How dreadful so ever it be,
That to sit alone with my conscience
Will be judgment enough for me.

An Autumn Violet.

I saw a miracle to-day!
Where the September sunshine lay
Languidly as a lost desire
Upon a sun-mach's fading fire,
Where calm some pallid asters trod,
Indifferent, past, to the road,
Beside a gray-haired thistle set—
A perfect purple violet.

I wonder what it were to miss
The life of youth, and like like this
To bloom so long, to bloom so late,
And were it worth the while to wait
So long for such a little day?
And were it not a better way
Never indeed (worse might befall)
To be a violet at all!

So comely when the spring was gone,
So calm when autumn splendors shone,
So peaceful midst the blazing flowers,
So blessed through the golden hours,
So might have bloomed my love for thee,
It is not, and it can not be—
It can not, must not be—and yet
I picked for thee the violet.

Secrets.

Not one could tell, for nobody knew,
How the dainty little blossom grew;
Or why it was pink, or why 'twas blue,
This child of the storm, the sun and dew.

Not one could tell, for nobody knew,
Why love was made to gladden a few,
And hearts that would forever be true,
Go lone and starved the whole way through.

Old Letters.

With rosy ribbon's faded ghost to bind them,
Long forgotten amid things we all forget,
In a chest of ancient souvenirs I find them,
Faintly scented from old crumpled muslinette
And as now I slowly read them, solemn-hearted,
I imagine, with a vague, phantasmal dread,
That among their yellowed pages I have parted
The inviolable cements of the dead!

Here are words that shine with sunny expectation
Of returning over seas to friends and home;
"When at last this gaudy Carnival's elation Discontinues, we shall tear ourselves from Rome."
Like a brook the merry language ripples brightly;
Well she loved, that happy sister, what life gave!
Let me think how many years it is that nightly
Stars have glimmered on her lonely Roman grave!

Here is writing that I almost held as holy;
He was such a light of learning, Brother Ned!
Equal gentleman to lofty or to lowly,
With his candid Saxon eyes and golden head.
Father chided him too sternly, always crying
At his boyish college love for cards and wines!
Ah, how often have I dreamed I saw him dying
Far away among those Oregonian mines!

Here are leaves where still the soul of slumber lingers:
"Come to-morrow, love; the country is so dull."
Oh, the perfume of those cottage-door syringas,
And the twilight of the meadow-land languid lull!
Oh, the fire-flies with their dizzy glitters woven
Through the boscage of the copses dark and damp!
Oh, the rapture while she gently played Beethoven
In the parlor where the moth was at the lamp!

It is lately as last August that I met her
At the crowded Newport ball, where I had strayed.
One a widower of sixty-two and better,
One a dowager with feathers and brocade.
Was it fancy that sometimes looked broadly
At her pretty daughter's partner in the waltz?
Could it happen that a meagre income yearly
Was conspicuous among his youthful faults?

Dear mementoes of these disannulled affections,
Like the rays from planets that no longer glow,
With your tidings that are ghostly resurrections,
It were wiser to have burned you years ago!
Yet, alas! what wasting flame's intenser flashes,
With the reddest greed destruction can endow,
Could have made you the irrevocable ashes
That annihilating time has made you now!

EDGAR FAWCETT.

The Wonderful Geysers!

THIS WONDERFUL SPOT OF CALIFORNIA

California should be visited by all residents and tourists. The Geysers of Iceland and the Geysers of the Yellowstone have their counterpart in the remarkable Canyon of the Pluton in Sonoma County. Wonderful as a curiosity of nature, wonderful as a health resort, and delightful as a resort of pleasure. By steamer, train, and coach, over a beautiful Bay, through beautiful valleys and romantic hills, the trip alone more than compensates for the cost and time. Leave San Francisco daily at 3 P. M., by steamer for Donahue; take train for Cloverdale; stay all night at Cloverdale, and leave in coach—four-in-hand—at 7 A. M. for the mountain drive over the hills to the Geysers. Returning passengers reach San Francisco in a day by the Calistoga way. A trip to the Geysers is the easiest, most inexpensive, and most delightful of any in California. The hotel accommodations, the trout fishing, the hunting, the walks and drives, the bathing, the everything, are perfection.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 11, 1878.

MY DEAR MADGE:—I have been to see the Octoroon. I have no excuse to offer for the circumstance save the force of habit. One gets into the habit of seeing Hamlet and the Octoroon periodically until it is impossible to help going when the manager gets his Octoroon spell on. I have seen it many times before played by more indifferent actors, but I do not think I ever before saw so much really bad acting with so much good scenery. I do not like to say anything that will give you a bad impression of Rose Wood, for she is a great favorite of mine, but as "Zoe" she reminds me irresistibly of a domesticated maniac. Miss Sylvester as "Dora Sunnyside," the heiress, appears in one of those little, simple, old-time lawn patterns which always look so deliciously cool, and clean, and fresh, and southern. Hannah Rothschild herself could not wear any prettier summer costume than a sheer fresh lawn. But Rose Wood wore a white garment that looked like a cast-off ball dress. I suppose it to be a princess, but it is cut with what we used to call the polka waist, and to the waist is attached a long, long skirt—so long in fact that the train lingered in full sight for several minutes after every disappearance—and it was made of one solid set of puffs. It is a dress which is not pretty, and which I can not fancy being of use to any one but a great laundress competing for a prize at an international exposition. To this costume Miss Wood saw fit to add an astonishing suit of hair, which first hanging in a mammoth braid, was afterward loosened to the willful wind and converted into a night wrap to protect her from the evening dews. It was long, and black, and thick, and straight, and there was enough of it to furnish material to Swinburne for many volumes of ardent poetry. It is but fair to say that the long white dress and the sweeping hair gave admirable effect to some very beautiful poses, for Rose Wood's long, little figure falls readily into graceful attitude. She does not play "Zoe" well; she is too thoroughly an adept in the light surface passion of society plays to deal with the deepest intensity of the "Octoroon's" sorrow. The play was written too long before Rose Wood's time to come into the new school, and she is not sufficiently melodramatic. She is also obliged to make love to, and to be made love to, by Marionette Robinson. This, of itself, must be a very discouraging process. I can fancy "Romeo" adorning the balcony and having the balcony yield, but I can not fancy Mr. Robinson responding to any of the softer emotions. Perhaps he is not old enough to have made love in real earnest—he looks to be a mere boy—and therefore can not make it on the stage. Perhaps he thinks he ought to be playing "Macbeth" instead of the juvenile lover. He will do it too some day, Madge, for there is good material in him notwithstanding his "George Peyton." Perhaps, alas, his spinal column is not vertebred, for he is as rigid as a bolt and as gestureless as an armless man. His good voice and his modest manner have carried him through the season hitherto, but as a Louisiana lover, and a returned Parisian at that, he decidedly needs something more. Mr. James O'Neill was a very uncomfortable looking red man—"Injun." I think he felt excessively foolish as well, under the exigencies of the text, which consists chiefly of a series of grunts. He also looked quite remarkable, for he is the first demi-blond Indian I have ever seen. Also the first moustachioed aboriginal of my acquaintance; but he has cultivated considerable facial expression, and looked vindictive and merciless to a most terrifying extent when he came at last upon "McClosky," dashing wildly through the cane-brake after the long chase. There was an impressive tableau as the curtain fell upon them. The scene itself, beautifully painted, represented one of the dank swamps of Louisiana, teeming with wild, tropical, poisonous luxuriance. You could almost see the blue damp of miasma rising through the waving cane, and the light was tempered to gray shadow. The vengeful Indian towered darkly above the prostrate form of his pale, tattered victim, and everything looked very awful indeed for a brief minute. I think when Mr. Lewis Morrison sits up aloft playing his little harp, he will not be so happy as he has been this week as "McClosky." I am inclined to think he must be rather a good fellow, he is so absurdly fond of playing the villain with such villainous unction. How he revels in it! How he made himself dark in the first act till there was sinister significance in his very look; how he made himself pale in the second act as if he had bleached himself with lime; how he grinned with malice till his white teeth shone again; how he swaggered, and swore, and snapped his whip, and made himself odious to the Peyton family. I believe he played "McClosky" so well that he has taken some of the individuality of the part, and that, henceforth and forever for me, the "McClosky" mark will be on all he undertakes. I can imagine that the Octoroon must have been a wildly exciting drama in its first days, when the abolition fires were just beginning to kindle and feeling ran high; but its leading incidents are of the things that were, and interest in them has passed away. I can fancy the auction scene in the days of its first run—the still excitement when the octoroon girl was bid for; the wild shouts when "Dora Sunnyside" offered her last dollar. But it all goes off quietly enough now, and even the dark African faces which flock the dress circle here and there appear stolid and unmoved, except by a passing gleam of interest when the plantation songs and dances begin. The Pickwickian Bishop of course played "Scudder"—his old part during the long run of the Octoroon in New York—and little Miss Coreoran played "Paul." She is both pretty and interesting, but her negro dialect would make you laugh. She will never be accused of being an ex-member of a variety show. You will think my taste thoroughly depraved when I tell you that I went to Tony Pastor's the other night and enjoyed myself exceedingly well. Jack glared dubiously at the line which announces that Tony himself will take part in each evening's entertainment, and managed to see a man somewhere on the outskirts of the dress circle with whom it was necessary to have a conversation on a matter of vital importance just at that critical juncture. He escaped Tony's serio-comic budget, but I did not. Once more I beheld the blithe and dapper Tony advance to the footlights with a dazzling smile, arrayed in a superlatively well-fitting suit of clothes, and flourishing the same opera hat. Tony, without that hat, would be like the ghost of Hamlet's father without his triletan overcoat. It is as essentially a part of the performance as the motto of one of his songs. Three several times have I beheld the redoubtable Tony on his first night in San Francisco, and each time he has advanced smilingly to the footlights with that bat as flat as a sheet of manuscript, given it an artistic little fling which shook out its full depths, clapped it playfully on the back of his head, crossed his hands on the lower button of his waistcoat, and smiled inanely. He thinks it awfully funny, and it is, but it is not funny the way he thinks it. My dear girl, if you can get at my meaning in that last sentence you will accomplish a feat, as I did, perhaps, when I found Mr. Tony Pastor amusing. We are all credited with a very considerable share of personal vanity, but it is an absolute treat to see any one so thoroughly appreciate the works of nature, as represented in himself, as does this variety son of song. What stuff he does sing, what clap-trap motes, what cheap sentimentality, and yet how it catches the gallery! There lies the secret of the man's success—in the gallery. He not only sings his songs to it, but he always consults it in collecting his talent. Anybody who can tell an Irish story, or sing a negro song, or shoot at a mark, or bathe like a fish, or play a tin whistle, or imitate an actor, or kick higher than somebody else, or do anything under the sun that will catch the gallery, may find a good engagement with Tony Pastor. I do not altogether mean the genuine up-stair gallery, Madge, but that bit of gallery element which we have all got in us, even though we sit in a higher-priced stage box which has been auctioned off for some special occasion to the highest bidder. I know that in our heart of hearts many of us have echoed the gallery applause when we did not dare to express it, and that few audiences ever question a gallery's disapproval. Tony Pastor's people rattle through a very lively and much mixed programme, and the audiences laugh with that intermitted accord which is observable at entertainments of this class. The female element has been largely increased, but it is a matter of taste as to whether this is an improvement or not. How exactly upon one pattern all these variety ladies are cut. Their noses and chins are all whitened to such a vivid ghastly white, their ears and cheeks are such an uncompromising red, their under lids are so deeply, darkly, beautifully black, and the spot of rouge on the upper lip is always so singularly obtrusive. They all sing in a strange squeak, and they have the same gestures, kicks, and winks. Perhaps I may except Miss Mattie Vickers, a young lady who "does an act," as the professional slang puts it, with a Mr. Charles Rogers, which is a modified Vokes affair. The gentleman gives some really excellent imitations, and the lady's "Pretty as a Peckture," after Almée, is really not half so bad as I have seen it done. She overdoes everything, and wears an abnormally large wig, but she has a fresh sweet voice and is pretty. There is a tiny midget with the double-barreled name of Fontainebleau, who ought to have her Winslow's soothing syrup and be put to bed hours before her act comes on. Poor little child—she is interesting extremely, but it is painful to hear the little thing try to fill the theatre with her tiny childish quaver. Her sister is a blithe, conscientious little girl, but does not attract even as a precocious child. That horrible little Jew-Dutchman has come who was here last year, and who jumped the classic heights of Dutch comedy into farivoritism with one single comical gesture. He has brought nothing new, and neither have the Kernell brothers, who soon become wearisome with repetition. Hoey, the versatile musician, has brought back his old red coat in so much worse condition than it was before that it is now tied together with bits of twine. The twine is the only thing new he has brought, but he is immensely funny. Kennedy, the ventriloquist, is really the feature of the novelties, being not only an excellent ventriloquist but considerable of a wag as well. But, pshaw! What is the use of picking a variety troupe to pieces for you. You know what they all are, and this is one of the very best—something that everybody must enjoy. And now let us consider the glorious prospect of next week at the California. I suppose New York gnashes her teeth with envy when she reflects that there are at this moment in this one little community, Maud Granger, Montague, and Rignold, the three "chronic mashers." That is a horrible expression, but it is an imported one, so I employ it, because no other term has yet been universally applied to these three people, and I do not think they justify me in soaring to the heights of rhetorical elegance till I know more about them. I do not believe San Francisco heads 'turn quite as easily as New York heads, for, although Maud Granger has been in the city at least twenty-four hours, there is yet no newspaper list of her conquests; and Rignold and Montague have both been as unmolested in their San Francisco seasons as John T. Raymond might be, and no one calls him an Adonis. It strikes me that with pretty Jeffry Lewis, Fred Warde, Montague, and Granger, Diplomacy should be something good. We shall see. Yours, expectantly,

BETSY B.

Alice Harrison in Boston.

BOSTON, July 2, 1878.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—That the American people take their pleasure sadly has often been asserted. No more convincing proof of the justice of this allegation could be wanted than the spectacle which was witnessed last night at the Museum, when Evangeline, the beloved of Boston, commenced its fourth consecutive season. The day had been one of the hottest ever known, and as there wasn't a breath of wind, the temperature had not become very much lower after nightfall. In spite of this, however, the house was crowded to its utmost capacity, and the majority of the audience sat throughout the entire performance and appeared to enjoy it hugely. They applauded every joke and every air, and, as in the case of Knight—who undertakes the part of "Captain Dietrich"—sometimes would scarcely allow the people to get off the stage at all. Alice Harrison made her first bow to a Boston audience in the character of "Gabriel," and in a ravissante costume (?) of green and gold, and clocked stockings, and the whole flora of the continent embroidered on her—her continuations, looked very enticing. She played her part with that peculiar sort of dash and bonhomie with which California theatre-goers are all familiar, and by which she has acquired the public regard in the West. However, the fastidious folks here (who by the way have lately been generously patronizing Mme. Renz's Female Minstrels, and the "Victoria" Loftus Troupe of British Blondes) didn't approve of the Pacific Slope importation on the score of her acting being "suggestive" (of what?) and one of the papers this morning said that she "exhibited a freedom of manner which savored a little too much of California!" This is good!—and Alice had better take warning and tone down her "California freedom." Laura Joyce, lately divorced from Mr. Taylor, made her reappearance as "Evangeline." She was the original representative of the character, and is a great favorite here. Her voice is amongst the "has beens," but she acts in a manner which is called "conscientious," and suits Boston audiences—though to an untrained outsider it appears rather expressionless and dull. Willie Edouin and George Knight are admirable as "Le Blanc" and "Captain Dietrich;" and George Fortesque, who weighs somewhere about 300 pounds, plays "Catherine" in a very droll kind of way. Everybody admits that it is the best cast that has ever appeared in the piece, and it will undoubtedly enjoy a big run; though even with the present people (Alice included) I don't think it would do much better in "Frisco than before. Some of the people in the "trial scene" tried to introduce some "gags" about A Celebrated Case and Family Matters, but the audience were down upon it instantly and hissed energetically.

Harry Edwards' benefit at the Grand Opera House next Tuesday evening promises to be a very successful affair. At the auction sale of boxes and seats at the Art Association rooms Thursday evening the bids figured up $1,037, two boxes selling for $100 each, one for $75, and the others declining in premium to $10 for front seats in dress circle. The programme for the evening is an interesting one, well arranged, and varied enough in its character to admit of the appearance of a small army of amateurs and professionals.

The chief attraction of Strakosch's next season will be Victor Masse's Paul and Virginia. Miss Kellogg will sing the role of "Virginia," and the new tenor, Rosnati, will assume the part of "Paul."

The Tour of the World has been reproduced in Paris, enhanced by the attraction of some lions in the forest scene. They are in an immense cage, the bars of which are concealed by trunks and boughs.

Joaquin Miller's drama, Vigilantes, has been rejected by the Williamsons.

STARS OF THE FRENCH STAGE.

The Peculiarities of Prominent Actresses.

The charity fête for the benefit of needy children, which took place in the Garden of the Tuilleries on Friday last, was greatly enjoyed by Americans who were present, as it gave them an opportunity to get a glimpse of many of the members of Parisian high life, as well as to see and hear some of the most noted dramatic artists of our times. Croizette and Mme. Favart, Got, and Delaunay, the two Coquellins, Judic and Theo, these and various others less celebrated, but perhaps not less accomplished, gave us a taste of their quality in two little outdoor theatres set up for the occasion. Sarah Bernhardt and little Mlle. Granier, the charming Petit Duc, were announced, but the latter failed to keep her appointment, and, if the former appeared with the other artists of the Comedie Francaise, it must have been either before I got into the little theatre or after I left it. I was sorry to miss Sarah Bernhardt, not on my own account, for I have seen her scores of times, but because the American ladies who were with me were so particularly anxious to see her. They had a little curiosity to see Croizette, none whatever to see Favart. As for Got, Delaunay, and the Coquellins, my good compatriots had never heard of them, and did not know whether they were men or women. Sarcey, in his delightful Sunday criticisms in Le Temps, said last week that of all the artists of the Comedie Francaise at the present time, no individual one exercises so great an influence on the receipts of the house as Sarah Bernhardt. He attributes this marked desire to see her less to her undeniably great talent as a dramatic artiste, than to the curiosity aroused concerning her by the gossip that has been circulated about her, and by the admiration her works of sculpture and drawing, publicly exhibited, has aroused. Be the cause what it may, it is certain that on the nights Bernhardt plays, the whole house is bought up beforehand, and a mere outsider like myself, who knows no other method of getting into a theatre than to go to the box office with my money in my hand, stands no chance whatever for a seat. Yet much as I admire Sarah Bernhardt's varied talents, Croizette, to my fancy, is by far the more fascinating artiste. Croizette's beauty is, to me, the most witching I ever saw. Beautiful faces are the rule, not the exception, on the Parisian stage. There is the baby face, the intellectual face, the Grecian profile, the petit minois chiffone, the face that once was superbly beautiful and has now but the remains of its former loveliness, and the face whose owner is so youthful that her beauty bids fair to blossom grandly in the course of time. Croizette's lineaments do not belong to any of these categories. Her face is not even highly intellectual, yet the subtle charm of her smile and the mysterious downward glance of her eyes possess a unique and altogether unexplainable fascination. One can not but wonder what on earth she is thinking of—a query which rarely presents itself to the mind of the observer of a Parisian actress' face. It is a great pity for Croizette that she is growing so stout. Her form is already almost ponderous, and this amplitude of physical proportions must necessarily eliminate from her repertoire all those roles d'ingenue, like the sweet girl in L'ete de la Saint Martin, which she plays with such witching grace. What a humoristic nebulosity it is who sails about our spheres and regulates this matter of obesity and leanness! Here is Croizette on the path of a fatal fatness, while Sarah Bernhardt is twin sister to Barnum's living skeleton, and Mme. Favart was never much more than skin and bone, and seems to get more and more emaciated as she gets older. At the performance of the fête she and Croizette acted a scene from one of the French classics, and Favart's stilted manner, her bony form, and her conventional comedy fan-play were in marked contrast to Croizette's rich and suggestive method, her easy grace, her plump figure, and her bewildering smile. Both were in ordinary carriage dress, wearing their bonnets, and even in this matter Croizette had the advantage, though Favart has long been noted for her superb costuming. When Jean de Thommeray was being played at the Francaise, Favart, as the reckless lady of fashion, used to say to her husband, "I owe 50,000 francs to my dressmaker," a statement which old Parisians averred to be very likely near the truth. On this occasion she wore an elaborate and pretentious dress of rich damase, in color somewhere between cardinal and maroon, with under-petticoat of lemon-colored silk, the whole befringed with triangular bows and Van Dyke points and lace frillings; while Croizette's navy blue foulard, with plainly-cut overskirt, underskirt and blouse basque, the whole richly embroidered by hand in contrasting colors, was simplicity and elegance combined. They were called out after their scene, and some of the most enthusiastic applause they got came from the Princess Metternich, who stood up in the aisle in her progress outward to testify, as noisily as her little hands could, her admiration of the renowned artistes. Yes, La Metternich is back again in the Paris where, during the Emperor's day, she was one of the most brilliant and noted personages. How changed she must find the once marvelous capital! She is still somewhat prominent in the circles of the beau monde, as her birth and fortune command a certain recognition, and she is always well received at Court in England.—Paris Correspondence.

SCHOOL BOOKS.

A. Roman & Co. are now fully prepared to meet the requirements of the school book trade. A large and well-assorted stock of the latest school and college text books is now displayed in their establishment awaiting the reopening of the schools. Especial attention will be given to all orders for school books and all other wants in school departments. New books and new styles of stationery are daily received and sold at wholesale and retail at the lowest market rates. Visiting, invitation, and wedding cards handsomely engraved and printed to order. A. Roman & Co., No. 11 Montgomery Street, Lick House block. During the reopening of the schools the store will be kept open evenings, for two weeks, from Monday, July 9th. The public are cordially invited.

GRAND SWIMMING MATCHES.

Ladies', gentlemen's, and boys' swimming matches for gold, silver, and bronze medals will take place at the Neptune and Mermaid Baths, foot of Hyde and Larkin Streets, North Beach, between the hours of 10 A. M. and 2 P. M., on Saturday and Sunday next.

As is the capital to the column, so is the hat to the man. To be topped with a good "tile" is the prime requisite of a gentleman, while "a shocking bad hat" is the unmistakable mark of ill-breeding or (which is worse) an empty pocket. With a good hat and good boots, a man may defy the strokes of criticism, and kick the critic, respectively. C. Herrmann, at 402 Kearny Street (and 9th Market, for it is a large establishment) keeps the best hats that are to be had. He is an artist, is Herrmann, and if you have the reverence that one artist feels for another, you will mention the price you can pay, and place your head in his hands without question or misgiving.

EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN JOSE AND RETURN. The Southern Pacific Railroad Co. have determined to issue excursion tickets to San Jose and return, the fare for the round trip being $3. The excursionist will have the benefit of two routes to return—either on the Central Pacific by the way of Niles and Oakland Point, or on the Southern Pacific Railroad. Tickets will be issued on Saturdays and Sundays, and will hold good until the following Monday, inclusive. These excursion tickets will be issued for the first time this Saturday.

A WIDE DIFFERENCE.—Agents for four-fifths of the Pianos for sale offer a guarantee which amounts to nothing more in reality than "take my word for it." Quite different with the Steinway Pianos; a guarantee is offered by a responsible house, who give proofs of eighteen years' trial of the article they offer.

Attention is respectfully called to the display of watches, diamonds, jewelry, and silverware at Anderson & Randolph's, Clock Tower Building, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

The attention of travelers desiring to make the Bodie trip is specially directed to card on this page as to the shortest and cheapest route.

LADIES—NUMEROUS GOOD GIRLS APPLY DAILY for positions at my office. Your orders are filled by my lady clerk, a competent housekeeper, who knows how to select your help. Zeehandelaar & Co., 627 Sacramento Street, above Montgomery.

PERSONS ADDICTED TO THE USE OF OPIUM are informed that a regular physician is prepared to receive a few such as patients in his own family, in the country, upon reasonable terms. Entire privacy, and cure guaranteed. Address P. O. Box 87, Alameda.

Fans, dolls, toys, and articles of vertu thoroughly repaired with GIANT CEMENT. Sold by all druggists, and at 477 Washington Street.

"Well, Mrs. Grumblio, what's the matter with your grandson?"
"Why, doctor, his throat's very bad. Mr. Parsons, the druggist, says as how there's something wrong with the borax, but you can see for yourself that he has three or four big ulsters in his throat."

MARBLEIZED IRON MANTELS

— AND —

ENAMELED GRATES.

The perfection which the manufacture of Marbleized
Iron Mantels has attained brings them in direct competition with the best qualities of slate for all purposes where mantels are used, and they are in a great measure taking the place of marble. The soft rich color in which these mantels are finished renders them a much more agreeable article of furniture to a room than the cold, repulsive-looking marble slab, and colors may be selected to harmonize with the furniture. In ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY OF FINISH,
AND DURABILITY OF POLISH, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

GOING FOR THE GOLDEN GOAL.

Incidents in the Voyage of the Pioneer Ship Tarolinta—1849.

BY DR. J. C. TUCKER.

Gradually we neared and crossed the "line," receiving the customary visit from "Father Neptune." The god of the sea came over the ship's bows exactly as eight bells announced meridian. The possibility of a visit had been mentioned by the older salts, but few were prepared for the really startling scene that occurred. Neptune was gotten up most elaborately; amid great shouts from the passengers he scrambled from the chains over the bows, trident in hand. Clad in a bearskin suit dripping with salt water, his long gray beard tangled with green seaweed, he really did look like the veritable sea god he announced himself! Through his trumpet he called for those who crossed the line for the first time, and commanded the old salts to bring them forth. A large tub and a pail of soap suds were at once produced, and two parties—who had been inveigled forward for that purpose—were suddenly seized, thrust into the tub, and thoroughly lathered with a large paint brush. Every time they opened their mouths to yell, or to remonstrate, the brush full of suds was poked into it. Then Neptune ordered them to be shaved, and they were strapped down with a huge wooden razor, and finally released, upon sending for a bottle of brandy in which to drink his godship's health. Fortunately for the victims, they were like all of us—troubled with but little clothing under an equatorial sun.

To make our sufferings greater at this time, we were put on an allowance of water. To save a miserable pittance of a few dollars, our worthy commander had jeopardized our lives by failing to renew his water supply at Valparaiso. A short distance from that port, it was announced that the captain had calculated upon a certain number of casks of water—which, it was now discovered, had leaked out! The dastardly trifling with our lives was but in keeping with the man's character, but it came nigh creating a mutiny that might have terminated badly for him. Just when we most needed water, we were put upon an allowance of one quart for each man a day!

These patient passengers, who had paid $350 apiece for good fare and transportation to California, were obliged to stand in a line, once a day, bottle in hand, waiting until their names were called, to receive their quota of stinking, rosy water! We were obliged to make it effervesce with soda and acid to get it down, 'twas so nauseating! How we ever kept from "keelhauling" that old cheat of a captain I cannot, to this time, understand. Roll, roll—it seemed as if we should roll our masts out upon that polished sea! The pitch oozed out of the deck-seams, while the wood and iron-work was too hot to place your hand upon. 'Twas like the horrid miseries of "ye ancient mariner." Not a vessel—not a cloud, in sight; nothing but the pitiless, brassy sky above, and the unrelieved, heaving sea beneath. Oh, for a gale—a rain-storm! How sweet, in comparison, seemed the fierce winds that went whistling through our ice-cased rigging off Cape Horn! At last our prayers were heard by Pluvius, and over the glazed sea came a faint but welcome ripple, that seemed to greet us like a smiling hope! From the edge of the horizon, there came rapidly across the sky a cloud, that grew larger and darker as it approached. Soon our idly flapping sails felt the freshening air and filled away. Then, with steerage-way, the glad keel was once more obediently turned northward amid a joyous shout from one hundred parched throats! The very waters seemed to seethe and whirl away from her burning sides, as if rejoicing in the renewed activity of the elements. The soft, refreshing rain came down in torrents—breaking the wind in its force. Stripped to our buckskin suits, we danced about the deck and rigging. Every device was brought into use to catch the water for drinking and washing. The standing rigging was covered with clothes, while a hundred pairs of hands soaped and rubbed, wrung and hung, like a gigantic laundry! Several casks of water were caught by means of sails, and all apprehensions of a water-famine were at an end. After several hours of rain, it cleared up with a fair wind that sent us bowling along on our course to the North and West.

About this time, the brutality of our captain found another opportunity to exhibit itself. One of the colored sailors fell and broke one of the bones (ulna) of his fore-arm. He had the temerity to ask me to examine the fracture. After it was dressed in splints and sling, he reported to the captain when he came out of his state-room. Although the man informed him that the arm had been examined and pronounced broken by both Dr. Phinney and myself, he damned the man for feigning injury, tore off the dressings, and ordered him forward to duty! And it was only after Dr. P. and myself energetically interviewed the unfeeling old wretch, that he consented to the man's going off duty and under treatment.

Most of the ships going out to California—all, with the number of passengers we carried—had a ship's surgeon on board, who, for his professional services rendered crew and passengers, in many instances, was well paid in addition to his passage. Phinney and myself thought of nothing of the kind, made no such arrangement with the owners, who, after we took passage, offered as inducements to others to do so, the fact of "having doctors on the ship." Although we very soon realized 'twas sharp, mean treatment of us, no one suffered in consequence, as neither of us ever refused to attend mates, crew, or passengers. It would have served them right, had the ship been compelled to pay well for the medical attendance furnished. There is a satisfaction in ventilating such meanness—even twenty-nine years after.

The moonlight nights on the Pacific are exceedingly beautiful. All through the tropics—on both oceans—I slept on deck. Time and again as I lay with the full moon shining broadly in my face, some good-hearted, superstitious sailor would awaken me with a "Beg pardon, sir, but the moon will twist your face if you sleep with it on you." Yet, in answer to my many inquiries, none had ever seen such results, but had "heard of a case." And yet the firm belief of the ignorant sailor in the strange influences of the moon were but natural. We gaze on that orb—cold, chafeful, mysterious—that for thousands of years has so strangely influenced this planet and every living thing upon it, and still fail to comprehend its power. Still science is groping for the solution.

In the absence of the moon, 'twas almost difficult to determine which was the more brilliant, the heavens or the ocean. The stars seem to come nearer to you on the Pacific, while the waves are teeming with phosphorescent life. The vessel appeared plunging through a sea of fire; her sharp bow divided the wave crests into long lines of iridescent gleams—blue, green, and purple, while myriads of sparkling anemones flashed in spangled trains down the foamy wake. Lying silent and alone upon the starlit sea, searching with aching eyes to look into eternal space, realizing the infinite majesty of creation, and in comparison the insignificant day-life of man, well may we ask ourselves, can He who created and maintained all this do more than assign us to the evolution of great established principles? Will He, personally, hear our prayers—number the hairs upon our heads? Do we not arrogate to ourselves too much importance?

"Latitude 12 deg. north of the equator, and still we are bounding along with the fairest of winds upon our quarter. If this continues we shall make a quick trip from Chile to California. All are hopeful and happy."

So reads an extract from an old letter. I was joyous, fresh, and crisp when it was indited by a young, careless hand twenty-nine years ago. The same hand unfolds it now, for the first time in nearly a third of a century. "All are hopeful and happy!" How truthfully the letter spoke. A band of young and enterprising men, impatient, and eager for the unparalleled adventures promising in the future; rapidly nearing the golden goal of their long and tedious race; almost in sight of the "promised land," with health and strength, and bright anticipations, why should they not be "hopeful and happy?" Louder, more vigorous than ever, ring out the chorus of our Negro Minstrel Band as all joined in "Oh, Susannah! don't you cry for me, I's gwine to California with my washbowl on my knee!" The choral discords would have disconcerted even the lachrymose Susannah had she occupied the place of the possible washbowl. The accordion man recalled himself, and encored his one tune, while the fourth-rate fiddlers, who had all been suppressed early in the trip, boldly sawed away again, rushing out sharps and flats in shrieking cadences.

Day by day our amiability increased. We even began to think that there might be meaner men in the world than our commander. Here-tofore, all who quareled were required to step into a rope ring on Saturday afternoon, and fight it out before referees. Now there were no difficulties to arbitrate. Another barrel of dried peas had been discovered in the hold, and the Captain ordered an extra allowance of raisins in our plum duff. It took but little then to make us hopeful and happy. We were busy now. Those who were not already associated formed companies, partnerships, or companionships for working in the mines. Some had brought along their small boats, in which they were to sail up the California bays and rivers direct to the mines. Others were building scow boats out of lumber bought at Valparaiso. All were making or airing their tents and clothing; and testing "peppercot" revolvers, that were to do formidable execution in the wilds.

About latitude 17 deg. north we experienced a very heavy gale, but still managed to run nearly on our course. July 1st, we sighted land toward afternoon, and our cautious captain at once headed her off for the west. Next morning we pointed for the East again, sighting land toward afternoon, when the ship was again run off the shore—beyond the Parallone Islands.

This exceeding caution was becoming so unbearable, that those passengers having boats were thinking to launch them to row into port (for we had neared the land close enough to make out the Golden Gate), when, at last, on the morning of July 6th, our bold captain sailed across the bar, before the wind, and anchored off Clark's Point. Near us lay the Greyhound, Grey Eagle, and Architect. Mr. William Coddington, to be the first man in California from our ship, got out on the extremity of the bowsprit. We were forty-nine days from Valparaiso, and one hundred and seventy-four days from New York. The light row boats of the passengers were into the water before her headway was stopped. I was one of the first to land—into mud thigh deep—on the shore, at a spot near the corner of Washington and Montgomery Streets.

Up the hill we ran for the Post Office—then a little wooden cottage house about the corner of Clay and Dupont Streets. There should be letters there for us by the Isthmus steamers. We didn't stop to scrape off the welcome mud—it felt so good to come in contact with soil again in any shape. The letters were there and our happiness made complete. Remember, we had heard nothing from home for nearly six months. Then a party of us went to a restaurant and ordered the best dinner obtainable, and over it endeavored to realize that the long voyage was at an end, and we at last had reached the golden goal.

We had encountered some discomforts, illness, vexation and delays, but when at four bells exactly, on the afternoon of July 6th, 1849, the staunch ship Tarolinta dropped her anchor off Clark's (North) Point, to the roll-call, one and all could answer "Here and well!" In the happy heartiness of the hour all the little enmities and misunderstandings of our shipboard association were wiped out with friendly congratulations and farewells! It seemed like again leaving home to part with the loyal old craft that had borne us so safely and so far. We had heard the ice-floes of the South Pole vainly crash against her sturdy oaken ribs; we had seen her tall masts quiver and bend beneath the "temperals" of the tropics; we knew the key-note of every line in her standing rigging, as Eolian like it had sung or shrieked its weird wail to the winds; our eyes and hearts were full as we at last left the good old ship. The many little stateroom ornaments and conveniences—the porous water-cooler, ship-chair and hammock—shall we leave or take them with us?

It all seems childish now, but only those who have safely terminated a long sea voyage can understand the breaking up of ship-board ties. Trunks were repacked to be left on shore while we went to the mines. Our best clothes, white shirts, pocket-bibles, and daguerreotypes went to the bottom, while peppercot revolvers, red flannel shirts, and long-legged boots came to the top. That prince of hosts, Knight, of Sacramento City—he whose sign, "Rest for the weary and storage for trunks," has gladdened many a weary miner's heart—could best tell how many trunks were redeemed a year after. Old partnerships and mining companies were dissolved, and new ones formed. Long legal contracts and obligations uselessly encumbered the associations formed in the East. Six months of intercourse at sea best developed congenialities and friendships. The ill-natured, lazy, or mean were dropped, and in pairs or small parties the more active combined for mining or other business.

On the day following our anchoring in this port the entire officers and crew of our ship deserted in a body. It almost seemed in retribution for the many mean things said and done to them and to us by the captain, but it left us as well in an awkward position. Our noble captain swore with many a briny oath he would never pay the then current rate of wages asked for stevedoring, viz.: one dollar an hour. If the passengers wanted their goods they must themselves unload the ship. At last he agreed to pay the passengers one-half those rates for the service, and the ship was speedily discharged. The crew had, during the voyage, managed to smuggle into the fore-castle a lot of canvas which, during their off watches, they had made into a large tent to use in the mines. This and a few stolen stores were about all they took with them, for they forfeited their pay by deserting. The owners, consequently, gained greatly by their leaving, and it was more than suspected that our worthy skipper was desirous of effecting just what occurred.

Our large company tent was quickly erected in the then rapidly growing canvas city yelped "Happy Valley," lying upon the sandy beach of Rincon Cove. This association—the Albany and California Mining and Trading Company—I had joined but a few days before we sailed from New York. It was composed of seventeen men, comprising artisans, agriculturists, artists, a geologist, and a doctor, and was heavily officered. We each contributed equally in creating a capital—judiciously expended in the purchase of everything conceivable in a country post-office grocery. There was a formidable-looking constitution and by-laws three yards long, bearing a sworn official seal that looked like the rising sun; a capacious cooking stove cast in Albany; and bearing the company's magnificent monogram upon every pot-lid and poker; a barrel of saleratus, a patent mining machine, a wooden churn and clothes' mangle, seeds, plows, sadirons, and a large assortment of hardware. From the sale of these—chiefly from the saleratus, stove, and boats—we realized a handsome sum; doubling our original investment. The stove was bought by my old New York friend, Dr. Arthur B. Stout, surgeon of the first steamship of the now Pacific Mail Steamship Company. Dr. Stout then had a large private hospital on Washington Street. He was the only permanent physician then in San Francisco, and was rapidly making money. The oldest practicing physician in this city to-day, the Doctor is still active in scientific and humanitarian matters. Saleratus was worth about sixteen dollars per pound; "drinks fifty cents each." Our carpenters put together the large scows we brought in sections. These proved very valuable in lightening ashore not only the cargo of our ship, but those of very many others. With members of our company as crews, they earned several hundred dollars before being sold for a large sum. Our small schooner-scow, completed, brought also from New York in pieces, sold for a great price. We were all good and affectionate, but we had been so long together on the water that we concluded it best not to test our amiability too far by sailing up the Sacramento in the schooner, as was originally intended. David Hawley, one of our passengers, and, when we providentially decided to dissolve, our arbitrator in settling up our company affairs, bought our hardware, agricultural implements, etc., and opened a store in San Francisco. His descendants are still in the hardware business here. After many days the large company tent was sold for a gambling saloon. The flaunting flag of the company was hauled down, the final division of funds was made, and the members of the great Albany and California Mining and Trading Company parted—few ever to meet again.

It was during our encampment in Happy Valley that the first Vigilance Committee formed. About July 10th, I, with a companion, was plodding over the sand-hills separating the valley from the city. Just ahead of us, going in the same direction, was another passenger. Directly a singular party, of a dozen or twenty men, appeared coming from the city. Some had on portions of soldier clothes, and all were armed. They had a drum and fife, and were apparently intoxicated. When they met the man in front of us they choked and kicked him, and finally threw him down the sand-bank! As this didn't seem auspicious for our reception, we quickly made a detour around the hills, and reached the city Plaza through the back ravines and brush. Here we found great excitement existing. Several of our passengers, myself included, armed and united with the citizens in that affair. Mr. Samuel Brannan, who took so leading a part in this first Vigilance Committee, is still living. He was at one time about the wealthiest man on the Pacific Coast—his income being over $30,000 per month. Misfortunes of many kinds have since been his. Friends, fortune, and family have in part left him, and yet he seems to-day young and vigorous enough to regain all!

The old maps of San Francisco show the survey of the city as extending south to Market Street only. In the summer of '49, the houses and stores were chiefly upon the blocks lying between Portsmouth Square and Clark's Point. Commercial Street was the first extended out into the bay, and was called Long Wharf. There the steamer passengers were for some time landed. Our fellow-passengers, Wm. S. O'Brien and Wm. C. Hoff, were partners there in the ship chandler business. Joe Eldridge—the ever-genial and still popular auctioneer—there drew his first audience, selling the first article he offered to the writer. Of course there were no paved streets then, and the thoroughfares muddy and cut up fearfully during the severe winter. Tobacco was so largely shipped here on speculation that it would not pay to store it. Much of it was spoiled in transit, and much more by exposure to the rains.

Hundreds of boxes of the spoiled weed were thrown out into the street, and used by passers as stepping-stones. After dark it was almost impossible to avoid stepping upon the swarms of rats. Cats brought an ounce apiece! A second Whittington, in the guise of the captain of a Chile bark, disposed of a small invoice very rapidly at that figure. Strangely enough, all of these Spanish cats had twisted or broken tails, and introduced that feline physical peculiarity still found among the cats here! Query: Are Chile cats' tails disjoined by shivering in fur-rin parts? And yet these were retailed!

Many of the old ships were dismantled, housed in, moored permanently close in shore at full-tide, and converted into store-houses. Few have moved since. Only a week since, the press reported an old unknown hulk in the line of a street sewer—quite up-town. Many of the memorable old oaken ships of the world converged here—seeking the Golden Goal. Nearly all are buried on our shore.

The ship Cadmus, that brought the Marquis-General Lafayette to America, was broken up in this port. She was built some time in the seventeenth century, and yet was quite sound in her frame timbers. The Brooklyn, Nautic, and many other old crafts, lie sleeping deep in the mud below the now city grades. Guarded each by a single keeper only, a fleet of noble vessels lay idly at anchor in this harbor during that year. Graceful as yachts, among the old square hulls, rode such full clipper-ships as the Grey Eagle, Architect, and Greyhound. Occasionally, some daring captain or owner would leave under short sail and three or four men, to pick up a crew at the Sandwich Islands, Mexico, or South America. Restaurants and hotels were numerous. The first were remarkably good for a new country, and it was surprising how elegant a dinner or breakfast could be obtained. The hotels were—questionable. B. flats, the size of a sadiron, overran every bedstead and cot, saying nothing of another parasite unnamed to polite ears!

[CONCLUDED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

A German has hit upon a plan by which a large number of girls can be courted at the same time in one room. The invention is based on the theory that "courtship requires a parlor, a sofa, subdued light, and seclusion." The inventor constructed in his house a retiring room styled "the lover's retreat." This apartment is exquisitely furnished. Soft velvet pile carpets cover the floor. Elegant couches are placed here and there, and as you sit down the soft swelling tones of a musical box ascend from below and agreeably startle you. At one end of the room is a bay window, filled with all kinds of plants, exhaling delicious odors, and presenting a rare picture of loveliness. Around the room are placed three statues—one of Psyche, one of Cupid, and one of Venus. Through a small window in one corner of the room, filled with pale pink glass, a flood of softly-tinted light falls upon the statues and gives them a life-like coloring. In the center of the ceiling, which is beautifully frescoed, is a magnificent bush scented odoriferous spray happens there is sub rosa. A silver fountain scents the odorous spray upon the air, a gold basin receiving it as it falls. Sentiments from Schiller, Goethe, Shakspeare, and other famous poets, are sentanced among the fresco work. These "thoughts that breathe and words that burn" are arranged according to their intensity. All bear on the subject of love. The negative sentiments are pointed on a background, the next in order on a purple, and so on, until the glowing utterances of intense affection are embedded in a setting of warm crimson. These sentiments are numbered. At one side of the door stands a statue of Venus, and at the other a statue of Adonis. On the extended right hand of each rests a plate, and on that plate are embossed card numbers to correspond with the sentiments on the walls. These cards and sentiments a dozen mute lovers may come and go, without disclosing their secret thoughts to strangers, or love-making of others.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORMS.

MESSENGERS, EDITORS:—The agony of electing members of the Convention to revise the State Constitution is over. It is ascertained that a majority of the members have been chosen on the Non-partisan ticket, and that many gentlemen of talent and legal culture will take part in the deliberations. The work of thinking out such changes in the fundamental law as will meet the requirements of our peculiar conditions as a State must now begin. Believing that every citizen, whether elected to the Convention or not, who has any ideas to advance should now utter them, in the hope of eliciting such discussion by the press as shall test public opinion before the assembling of the Convention, and thus furnish some guide to that body, I propose to advocate certain changes in the Constitution, which to me seem like reforms. I beg leave respectfully to challenge discussion of these points through your valuable columns.

Says Madison, in the Federalist, No. 47: "The founders of our Republic have so much merit for the wisdom they have displayed that no task can be less pleasing than that of pointing out the errors into which they have fallen. A respect for truth, however, obliges us to remark that they seem never for a moment to have turned their eyes from the danger to liberty from the overgrown and all-grasping prerogative of an hereditary magistrate. They seem never to have recollected the danger from legislative usurpations, which, by assembling all power in the same hands, must lead to the same tyranny as is threatened by Executive usurpations. * * * In a representative republic, where the executive magistracy is carefully limited both in the extent and duration of its power, and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly which is inspired by a supposed influence over the people, with an inspired confidence in its own strength—which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude, yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions by means which reason prescribes—it is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy and exhaust all their precautions."

If Madison had written the above retrospectively from a California standpoint in 1878, instead of prospectively from 1787, this quotation would have been as perspicuous a specimen of true history as it now is of political prophecy. The powers granted by our present Constitution to the Executive are few and perfunctory. The office has always been filled by respectable and competent men; hence no shadow of complaint has ever been cast upon its administration. And notwithstanding the elective character of our judiciary (so frequently complained of on theoretical principles) no old Californian need be reminded that our judicial administration has always compared favorably with those of the older States. But when we recall the history of our legislation our eyes are necessarily opened to the weakest spot in all our political system.

Fortunately for our State, especially in its younger days, certain constitutional limitations were imposed upon the powers of the Legislature. Who does not now see, in the light of past events, what untold mischief would have resulted had there been power in that body to contract unlimited debt, to grant special franchises, to create perpetuities, to charter banks of issue, to loan the State credit, or to authorize lotteries? True, nearly all of these prohibitions, few as they were, have been disregarded. For in 1857 the Supreme Court had to decide unconstitutional a large debt contracted in excess of $300,000, by the Legislature without the vote of the people (Nougues v. Douglass, Cal. Reports). In 1870 the Legislature expressly authorized the Mercantile Library lottery, and previously it loaned the State credit to the Central Pacific Railroad. But its principal usurpation has grown up, by a sort of custom, in a direction wherein the Constitution is silent, to-wit, in its constant intermeddling with the local affairs of counties, cities, and towns. All that the present Constitution prescribes on this point is found in Sections 4 and 5 of Article XI: "The Legislature shall establish a system of county and town governments, which shall be as nearly uniform as practicable throughout the State." "The Legislature shall have power to provide for the election of a board of supervisors in each county; and these supervisors shall jointly and individually perform such duties as may be prescribed by law."

It seems not a little remarkable that, notwithstanding the positive injunction in the Constitution, no uniform system of town government has ever been enacted by our Legislatures. Perhaps, notwithstanding the fact that the great majority of the early American immigration came from New England and other Northern States where the "town meeting" has ever been the most prominent political peculiarity, the absence of such legislation was due to the predominance of Southern men in our State politics from 1849 to 1861; for in the South automatic town government has never been known, at least in the New England sense. Perhaps the absence of a permanent country population in the pioneer days made the town system of government impracticable. Yet, under the language of the Constitution, it seems plain that had the principle of "local self-government" been thought of or respected by the early Legislatures, it was perfectly competent for them to have enacted it into law, so that all strictly local affairs would have been relegated to the people of the localities concerned, and thus the business of the Legislature reduced to the enactment of general laws only.

And I contend that this is the true American idea on this topic. "No taxation without representation" is a fundamental republican principle. The people of each county or town are the only persons interested in questions relating to roads, bridges, intercommunication, county taxation and debts, fences, and similar topics, for they alone must foot the bills, and their own people are those principally benefited. What right, theoretically or practically, have the representatives of all the counties to vote on the strictly internal affairs of each? What right, theoretically or practically, has the county to dictate to the city as to the streets it shall open, the bridges it shall build, the taxes it shall levy, the appropriation of its funds, the use of its credit, the erection of its public buildings, the bills it shall pay, etc.? It will somewhat surprise our readers to be told that since the passage of the San Francisco Bill in 1856-7, no less than 1,100 strictly local laws have been enacted for the government of the city of San Francisco alone have been passed by our successive Legislatures. A similar history must be told of nearly every county in the State. In fact, an enumeration of the Acts passed by the Legislature of 1875-76 shows the following proportions of general to local Acts:

General Acts—new statutes, . . . . .	79
Amendments to Codes, . . . . .	114
Local Acts, concerning counties, towns, school districts, cities, . . . . .	423
swamp and reclamation districts, . . . . .	613
Total, . . . . .	613

A glance at any previous volume of our statutes shows about the same proportion of local Acts.

It must be observed that these local laws embrace such a variety of topics, and extend to such trifling minutiae of legislation in such small political subdivisions, as to carry the idea that self-government in California is wholly exploded: Acts to prevent hogs running at large in the town of Sutter Creek; to authorize Stanislaus County to purchase a bridge; to allow Los Angeles to construct sewers; to enable Point Pleasant School District to pay its school-teacher; to fix the salary or fees of this or that town officer; to allow Wild Goose School District to build a school-house; to enable some county to pay the interest on its bonds, etc., etc. Surely it is necessary that such trifling local details should form the great bulk of legislation of the State, as if the people of the districts were unable to manage their own affairs? Is the Government of France any more centralized than ours? Is such a system of centralization in any sense American? Is it necessary—nay, is it not virtually injurious—to all patriotic feeling among the citizens, who are thereby bound hand and foot in the management of their own business, and delivered thus helpless into the power of the politicians? Do we not all know that such acts as those providing for the Second Street cut through Rincon Hill, and the redistricting of Oakland, so as to affect the political complexion of its vote, were acts of unmitigated tyranny by the Legislature—tyranny perpetrated in spite of the remonstrances of the people interested; tyranny of which those two acts are samples, for our statute books are full of like opprobrious legislation?

Now, though the silence of the Constitution leaves the door open to the ambition of the legislative department in this direction, so that the charge of unconstitutionality can not be proved against this whole mass of legislation, how does this system work in practice?

(1.) It transfers the legislative power on local affairs from the supervisors of cities and counties to their respective delegations in the Legislature—that is, from the county seat, where every local measure would be watched by the voters concerned, to the State capital where they are not present, and can know but little of what is going on.

(2.) It throws an immense power into the hands of a professional lobby, whose nefarious and unblushing bargain and sale of votes over every measure "that has money in it," has, for the past ten or twelve years, been the crowning disgrace of our State.

(3.) It leads to the constant tinkering of statutes having local application—the laws passed at one session being so often amended, repealed, and reenacted as to make it in some cases almost impossible to know what the law is. The condition of road laws in Alameda County and the numerous reincorporations of our principal cities are examples of this.

(4.) It induces all sorts of legislative jobs; it causes a fear of the Legislature in the minds of all property-owners, utterly disgraceful to a people calling themselves free; it produces a feeling of joy when the day of adjournment arrives akin only to that of an enslaved nation when told of the death of its tyrant.

(5.) It results in the biennial grinding out of the statute-book at Sacramento of eight hundred pages, more or less, of crude and superfluous legislation, the result of one hundred and twenty days unnecessary incubation—when, were its labors restricted to general laws, thirty days' time and a pamphlet would far better conduce for the good of the public.

(6.) It involves the abnegation of political rights by the citizens and their transfer to an irresponsible and fictitious "sovereignty" at Sacramento, for in what respect the Legislature while in session is not "sovereign" it would puzzle the average citizen to point out. The people are the real sovereigns under our system. That sovereignty can be maintained only by a jealous refusal to delegate power unnecessarily, and by such an arrangement of our institutions as shall reserve to the people the direct exercise of all power not unavoidably granted to a representative.

I respectfully suggest, therefore, to the members of the Convention the propriety of so amending the present Constitution as to compel the first Legislature assembled after its adoption to provide for a uniform system of county and town governments, having automatic power concerning roads, bridges, fences, franchises for wharves, ferries, and railroads within town or county; the care of the poor and sick, the full management of local finances, and such other matters as concern the people of all the county or town respectively, and them only. The three powers of government, the legislative, judicial, and executive, should be as distinctly defined and separated in these as in the State Government, the legislative department in towns being the people in town-meeting assembled. There should be a general restriction as to the powers of taxation, limiting the same to a maximum rate per annum. There should also be a restriction in the power of contracting debt, say to five per cent. on the grand list, the same to be used only for the construction of public buildings or works, and not then unless the indebtedness be ordered by a two-thirds vote of the people.

An elaborate and careful general law should also be enacted providing for the incorporation of cities, embracing legislation on all points wherein the State has a paramount interest. Under such a law the question of incorporating a city should be left to the vote of the people, instead of, as at the present time, being left to the manipulation of politicians. I believe the present charter of San Francisco to be the most elaborately confused and bungling contrivance of "how not to do it" that is to be found on record in any civilized country. The whole series of enactments relating to the city should be swept out of existence, and a plainly written scheme of a strong municipal government, with only a mayor and legislative council elected by the people, and all other officers appointed during good behavior, substituted in their place.

Moreover, the city government should be free to manage municipal affairs for the interest of the people of the city, checked only by the division of powers fundamental to the American system, with occasional recourse to the vote of the people. I have not time to discuss this topic fully here, for it is one on which a great deal may be pertinently said.

These general laws having been passed, the Legislature should have no power whatever to pass any law intermeddling in any manner with the local affairs of any city, county, town, school district, road district, swamp or reclamation district, but all their enactments should be restricted to general laws, in which the people of the whole State should be interested.

C. T. HOPKINS.

The Pagan Creed of Death.

There is nothing new under the sun. The philosophy of the present-day rationalists and skeptics was entirely anticipated by the old Roman, Lucretius, and Froude, in reproducing it, declares that it was also the creed of Cicero, Julius Cæsar, and Tacitus. We copy it as a historical curiosity, to show that, with all their ingenuity, modern materialists have not succeeded in giving us anything better or radically different: Death is nothing, for where death is we are not. Before we were begotten, empires were convulsed; provinces were wasted with fire and sword; nations were sunk in wretchedness. We knew nothing of these calamities. They touched not us. We could suffer nothing, for we were not. As it was before we began to live, so it will be again when we have ceased to live. Storms may roll over the earth, land may be mixed with sea, and sea with sky. We shall know nothing of it. The substance of our bodies will be in other forms, with other souls attached to them. New beings will have come into existence, to live and pass away as we did. But those beings will not be us. The continuity once broken is broken forever. We shudder when we look upon a corpse. We imagine that when our bodies are corrupting we shall be in some way present and conscious of our own decay. It is not so. Our bodies will decay, but we shall not be present. We shall not be any more. We shall not suffer any more. "Ah!" some one says, "must I leave my wife and children, and my pleasant home? Must all be taken from me?" They will be taken from you, for you will have no being. You will not miss them. You will know no regrets or vain longings for what is gone. Your friends will lament for you. You will not lament for them. You will be in peace. "Why, then, unhappy mortal," says Lucretius to the vain complainers, "why do you grieve? Why cry out on death? Has your life been happy, the banquet is over; you have taken your fill; depart and be thankful. Have you been unfortunate, has life brought you sorrow and pain, why wish for more of it? Life and sorrow end together. Would you live forever? The terms of human existence do not alter. Had you a thousand lives they could bring you nothing new. You would but tread again the same circle. As it has been with you, so it would be, though you could repeat the process to eternity. This is nature's sentence, and who shall gainsay her? Dry your tears. Peace with your idle whines. Use your time wisely while it is yours. A little space and it will be gone. The ages before you were born are a mirror in which you can read the ages to come. The past has no terrors in it. The future has none, unless you create them for yourself. Real, indeed, they are to you as long as you anticipate them. Tityus and Sisyphus, Cerberus and the furies! the thought of these will cause you agonies as long as you believe in them. Know these spectres for what they are, the offspring of your own fears, and be at rest. Who and what are you that you dream of immortality? Wiser and nobler men than you will ever be have lived, and are gone. Accept your fate. There is no remedy."

Why change the name of the McCloud River to the "Cloud?" asks a correspondent. We answer: (1.) Because "Cloud" is the true name. (2.) Because "McCloud" is a false name. (3.) Because "Cloud" is poetic, romantic, nice. (4.) Because "McCloud" is personal, vulgar, and uninteresting. In the very early time of California, in the days of Lassen, Reading, and other pioneers of the North, it was discovered that the waters of this beautiful stream came from Mount Shasta. Mount Shasta's snowy head was in the clouds, the waters were of the melting snow, and these old Pioneers named the river the "Cloud." It was poetic, romantic, and appropriate. Then a Scotchman by the name of MacTash came along and camped upon the head-waters of the stream, hunted deer, and fished, and had a squaw, and when the neighbors described the river they said "Down at Mack's"—"On the Cloud near Mack's." Then the "McCloud" and the "MacLeod," and the "McLeod." The Scotchman died, and the name got upon the maps as the "McCloud," and there it still remains. The name is wrong, and we invite the cooperation of all persons of æsthetic and literary taste who would like to preserve the true names of our mountain streams to remove that of the dead Scotchman from our most romantic and beautiful of northern rivers.

One of the features of the Exhibition is what is known as the American bar. On account of the trouble caused by an American bar at Vienna Governor McCormick refused to have such an institution in the section here. Some enterprising Englishmen have fitted up one end of the English section, where all the American drinks are built in the latest styles. Governor McCormick made no objection to its being called "American," as it was not in the American section, and he preferred to have nothing to say either for or against it. Americans who are here of course patronize it very liberally, as well as the English. The French, too, are getting rapidly initiated into the mysteries of American drinks. They come up and order something that looks nice, and the first thing they know they are what is commonly called drunk. One of the funniest sights in the whole Exhibition is a Frenchman "wrestling with American mystifiers." He is crazy enough when he is sober, but when he is drunk he awful.

Society is like the echoing hills. It gives back to the speaker his words—groan for groan, song for song. Wouldst thou have thy social scenes to resound with music? Then speak ever in the melodious strains of truth and love.

XXXIII.—THE BALLAD OF JUDAS ISCARIOT.

'Twas the body of Judas Iscariot
Lay in the Field of Blood;
'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Beside the body stood.
Black was the earth by night,
And black was the sky;
Black, black were the broken clouds,
Though the red moon went by.

'Twas the body of Judas Iscariot
Strangled and dead lay there;
'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Looked on it in despair.
The breath of the World came and went
Like a sick man's in rest;
Drop by drop on the World's eyes
The dews fell cool and blest.
Then the soul of Judas Iscariot
Did make a gentle moan:
'I will bury underneath the ground
My flesh and blood and bone.
I will bury deep beneath the soil,
Lest mortals look thereon,
And when the wolf and raven come
The body will be gone!
The stones of the field are sharp as steel,
And hard and cold, God wot;
And I must bear my body hence
Until I find a spot."

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot,
So grim and gaunt and gray,
Raised the body of Judas Iscariot
And carried it away.
And as he bare it from the field
Its touch was cold as ice,
And the ivory teeth within the jaw
Rattled aloud like dice.
As the soul of Judas Iscariot
Carried its load with pain,
The Eye of Heaven, like a lantern's eye,
Opened and shut again.
Half he walked, and half he seemed
Lifted on the cold wind;
He did not turn, for chilly hands
Were pushing from behind.
The first place that he came unto
It was the open world,
And underneath were prickly whins,
And a wind that blew so cold.
The next place that he came unto
It was a stagnant pool,
And when he threw the body in
It floated light as wool.
He drew the body on his back,
And it was dripping chill,
And the next place he came unto
Was a Cross upon a hill—
A Cross upon the windy hill,
And a cross on either side;
Three skeletons that swing thereon
Who had been crucified,
And on the middle cross-bar sat
A white Dove slumbering;
Dim it sat in the dim light,
With its head beneath its wing.
And underneath the middle Cross
A grave yawned wide and vast,
But the soul of Judas Iscariot
Shivered and glided past.
The fourth place that he came unto
It was the Brig of Dread,
And the great torrents rushing down
Were deep and swift and red.
He dared not fling the body in
For fear of faces dim,
And arms were waved in the wild water
To thrust it back to him.

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Turned from the Brig of Dread,
And the dreadful foam of the wild water
Had splashed the body red.
For days and nights he wandered on
Upon an open plain,
And the days went by like blinding mist,
And the nights like rushing rain.
For days and nights he wandered on
All through the Wood of Woe,
And the nights went by like moaning wind,
And the days like drifting snow.

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Came with a weary face—
Alone, alone, and all alone,
Alone in a lonely place.
He wandered east, he wandered west,
And heard no human sound;
For months and years, in grief and tears,
He wandered round and round;
For months and years, in grief and tears,
He walked the silent night.
Then the soul of Judas Iscariot
Perceived a far-off light—
A far-off light across the waste
As dim as dim might be,
That came and went like the lighthouse gleam
On a black night at sea.

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Crawled to the distant gleam,
And the rain came down, and the rain was blown
Against him with a scream.
For days and nights he wandered on,
Pushed on by hands behind,
And the days went by like black, black rain,
And the nights like rushing wind.

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot,
Strange, and sad, and tall,
Stood all alone at dead of night
Before a lighted hall;
And the world was white with snow,
And his footmarks black and damp,
And the ghost of the silver moon arose
Holding her yellow lamp;
And the icicles were on the eaves,
And the walls were deep with white,
And the shadows of the guests within
Passed on the window light.
The shadows of the wedding guests
Did strangely come and go,
And the body of Judas Iscariot
Lay stretched along the snow;

The body of Judas Iscariot
Lay stretched along the snow,
'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Ran swiftly to and fro;

To and fro, and up and down,
He ran so swiftly there,
As round and round the frozen pole
Glideth the lean white bear.

'Twas the Bridegroom sat at the table-head,
And the lights burnt bright and clear:
"Oh, who is that," the Bridegroom said,
Whose weary feet I hear?"
'Twas one looked from the lighted hall,
And answered soft and low:
"It is a wolf runs up and down,
With a black track in the snow."
The Bridegroom in his robe of white
Sat at the table-head:
"Oh, who is that who moans without?"
The blessed Bridegroom said,
'Twas one looked from the lighted hall,
And answered fierce and low:
"Tis the soul of Judas Iscariot Gliding to and fro."

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Did hush itself and stand,
And saw the Bridegroom at the door
With a light in his hand.
The Bridegroom stood in the open door,
And he was clad in white,
And far within the Lord's Supper
Was spread so broad and bright.
The Bridegroom shaded his eyes and looked,
And his face was bright to see:
"What dost thou here at the Lord's Supper
With thy body's sins?" said he.

'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Stood black, and sad, and bare:
"I have wandered many nights and days;
There is no light elsewhere."
'Twas the wedding guests cried out within,
And their eyes were fierce and bright:
"Scourge the soul of Judas Iscariot Away into the night!"
The Bridegroom stood in the open door,
And he waved hands still and slow,
And the third time that he waved his hands
The air was thick with snow;
And of every flake of falling snow,
Before it touched the ground,
There came a dove, and a thousand doves
Made sweet sound.

'Twas the body of Judas Iscariot
Floated away full fleet,
And the wings of the doves that bare it off
Were like its winding-sheet.
'Twas the Bridegroom stood at the open door,
And beckoned, smiling sweet;
'Twas the soul of Judas Iscariot
Stole in, and fell at his feet.
"The Holy Supper is spread within,
And the many candles shine,
And I have waited long for thee
Before I poured the wine!"
The supper-wine is poured at last,
The lights burn bright and fair,
Iscariot washes the Bridegroom's feet,
And dries them with his hair.

XXXIV.—SONG OF THE CLAY.

I lie in state,
Insensate clay,
And on me wait
A long array
That celebrate
My festal day.
Solemn and slow,
About they go,
And say, as they pace,
"What a smile on the face!"

Well may I smile with perfect peace,
To greet the hour of my release!
When the thing that vexed me fled,
The stricken mourners murmured, "Dead!"
Dead!—what is dead? I lie at rest,
No longer driven and distressed;
The tyrant will at last be still
That tortured me with good and ill.

Alive, they said, "Alas, how worn!
How sad the face! how full of scorn!"
That was from the soul within,
Tormenting me forever:
Restless, weary, sick with sin,
Mad with vain endeavor.

Now I shall turn to waving grass,
Bending to the airs that pass;
Upward mount in flickering flame;
Sleep in the dust from whence I came;
By warring waves be fiercely hurled;
On wandering winds blow round the world,
And fall again
To the earth in rain—
Soulless motion and soulless rest,
Rid of my soul, I now am blest.

XXXV.—SHE CAME AND WENT.

As a twig trembles, which a bird
Lights on to sing, then leaves unbent,
So is my memory thrilled and stirred—
I only know she came and went.

As clasps some lake, by gusts untriven,
The blue dome's measureless content,
So my soul held that moment's heaven
I only know she came and went.

As, at one bound, our swift Spring heaps
The orchards full of bloom and scent,
So clove her May my wintry sleeps;
I only know she came and went.

An angel stood and met my gaze
Through the low doorway of my tent;
The tent is struck, the vision stays—
I only know she came and went.

Oh, while the room grows slowly dim,
And when the oil is nearly spent,
One gust of light these eyes will brim
Only to think she came and went.

ABOUT WOMEN.

Paris belles object to the effect of the electric light in ball-rooms.

Not one man in a thousand marries the girl he most wanted.

Mrs. Jenks says she will not lecture; but Mr. Jenks says he knows better.

A man's will has got to be proved by the judge of probate. A woman's hasn't.

Lot's wife looked back because there was a woman behind her with a new bonnet on.

A young man broke off an engagement because his girl named her pet calf after him.

A young lady of Washington recently attempted suicide by taking a large dose of indigo. She had the blues.

A young lady being recommended to exercise for health, said she would jump at an offer and run her own risk.

The difference between a model woman and a woman model is: one is a bare possibility, and the other is a naked fact.

Nearly every woman who has attained intellectual eminence was a tom-boy in her childhood, and did not wear corsets.

A Piqua girl, who had had a quarrel with her lover, remarked to a friend that she wasn't on squeezing terms with that fraud any more.

Jennie June says a substitute for the corset is clumsily called the Emancipation waist. A young man's arm is another good substitute.

Two of Bismarck's nieces, who quitted Germany in disgust on account of some little domestic difficulty, are governesses in a very aristocratic family in London.

In the United States there are five hundred and thirty females practicing as doctors, four hundred and twenty as dentists, five as lawyers, and sixty-eight as preachers.

A young lady in Williamsburg has been sued for breach of promise. The discarded lover says he "noticed a coldness in her in January." What else could he expect in January?

Lady (giving an apple to a little boy): "Give this apple to the one of us three here, whom you think the handsomest." The boy looked for a moment at all three ladies, took the apple—and ate it.

An abbot once cured the habit of scandal in a woman by giving her the seeds of thistle-down to sow, one by one, and commanding her to gather them up. She could not, nor could she her evil words.

An African chief presented a water-cooler and fifty female slaves to Stanley, in exchange for a penny whistle. The chief had evidently not read B. Franklin's advice: "Don't pay too dear for your whistle."

Perhaps the greatest benefactor of the female sex on this continent is Judge Grant, of Davenport, Iowa. He has adopted seventeen girls, "raised them, and married most of them off with generous endowments."

A newly married lady, who, as in duty bound, was very fond of her husband, notwithstanding his extreme ugliness of person, once said to a witty friend, "What do you think? My husband has laid out fifty guineas for a large baboon on purpose to please me!" "The dear little man!" cried the other. "Well, it's just like him."

In Virginia City a high-toned Chinese couple, Ah Suee and Miss Ah Moy, were recently married. The ceremony being concluded, some of those present thought to joke Mr. Ah Suee by telling him of the American custom of kissing the bride. "Welly good," said he, "s'pose you likee kiss her, you pitch in. My tell you, she one welly good kissee."

Ladies' dresses of the princesses pattern appear not to be of modern origin, if we are to credit Thomas Moore's free translation of one of St. Chrysostom's homilies:

And homeliest garb bath oft been found,
When typed and moulded to the shape,
To deal such shafts of mischief round
As wisest men can scarce escape.

Russell Club, for ladies and gentlemen, will soon be opened in Regent Street, London. One of the new club's attractions is the possession of a box at the Royal Italian Opera, the tickets for which will be drawn free of charge. The club will be sumptuously fitted up with reading, dining, and chess rooms, etc.; also smoking and billiard rooms for gentlemen members.

The "woman in journalism" experiment tried by Miss Frances Willard, so well known in Western literary and educational circles, and her sister-in-law, Mrs. Mary Willard, has lasted not much more than a month, the Chicago Evening Post having been swallowed up by a penny contemporary, the Daily News. The price paid was $16,000. Less than seven years ago the Post was valued at nearly $200,000.

Sal Ary is the young lady that everybody wishes to secure. —Whitehall Times. Ann Uity is also much admired. —Boston Post. But the worst-bread girl is that brazen huzzy Sal Eratus. —Philadelphia Bulletin. Sal Ubrious isn't a bad girl to have around, but Sal Ivated is. —Wilmington Evening. But, after all, the best girl to pin your faith to is Sal Vation, unless it's the girl of the paragraph man, whose name is Sal Utary.

A French gentleman anxious to find a wife for a scapegrace nephew, went to a matrimonial agent, who handed him his list of lady clients. Running this through, he lighted upon his wife's name, entered as desirous of obtaining a husband between the ages of twenty-eight and thirty-five—a blonde preferred. Forgetting his nephew, he came home to announce his discovery to his wife. The next day he was all disturbed. "Oh, yes," said she; "that's the girl I married all disturbed. When you were so ill in the spring, I said we must prepare for the worst."

A VACATION TRIP TO HELLTOWN.

BY H. N. CLEMENT.

Bayard Taylor had a higher ambition than to be called "the famous American Traveler." He aspired to literature. He sought scholarship. He loved that rarely acquired sum of all accomplishments—culture. Traveling was merely going to school. To remain a traveler was simply to be known as one who was constantly attending school. He confesses to a deep feeling of disappointment when he first became aware that his name was being written down on the scroll of fame as "the great American Traveler," and he suffered untold anguish by the publication of a false story that the learned Humboldt had said of him that "he had traveled more and seen less than any man he ever met." He thenceforth solemnly resolved to put an end to mere sight-seeing, to writing descriptions of places, to establishing routes of travel, to making guide-books, and to set about convincing the world that he was more than a mere traveler, that he was a man of thought and culture, that his school days were ended. Henceforth he would be a teacher, and not a scholar. Having visited almost all the most noted scenes of history, battle-grounds, ruins, temples, palaces, and works of art, he now conceived the idea of taking a series of short runs to the more unfrequented and less noted places in Europe, where others had not worn away the charm of novelty—where he could once more enjoy that most delectable of sensations, the wondering awe of those who had never before beheld an American. The result was the last and most charming of his books of travel—"The By-ways of Europe."

The numberless conventional California tourists have visited and described over and over again the Geysers, the break-neck ride with Foss, the Petrified Forest, the Yosemite, the Big Trees, Lake Tahoe, Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, and the lesser attractions, but no one to my knowledge has ever visited and described Helltown. I therefore resolved this year to go to Helltown. For the benefit of the future tourist who may desire to reconnoitre that by no means dangerous locality, I will state that Helltown is on Butte Creek, but a few miles from "Paradise," on the "Dogtown" road, fourteen miles southeast of Chico, among the lava-capped buttes, in Butte County. "Bone-Yard Flat" is one of its noted suburbs, and "Whisky Flat" another. It is perhaps needless to explain that Helltown was once a populous and flourishing mining town, but that now it is a deserted and lonely village. It received its unseemly name from the circumstance of some reckless pioneer miners having engaged in an all-night "scance" at a game of poker, during which they drank large quantities of very poor whisky at "fifty cents a drink" of course, smoked "six-bit" cigars, and the next morning discovered that they had been striking their matches and laying their cigars stumps on a keg of powder, from which fact they all decided to call the camp "Helltown." Why the modern, harmless, tame, and quiet village should still retain so terrific a name is attributable, I suppose, to that perverse principle in human nature which has ever stubbornly refused to correct even misnomers.

Eric the Northman, whom I fondly believe was the first discoverer of this continent, has come down to us in history as "Eric the Red," for no other reason than that he had red hair, a by no means extraordinary circumstance among the Scandinavian races, while Charles II. of France is written down in history as "Charles the Bald," presumably on account of his having no hair at all. They carried nick-naming to excess during the middle ages. It is gravely asserted that "Charles the Simple," a French king, who was the posthumous son of "Louis the Stammerer," was excluded from the throne by "Charles the Fat," of Germany. James Crichton, a Scotch lad of three hundred years ago, is known to fame as "the Admirable Crichton," simply because, like Blind Tom, he was gifted with a sort of insanity of genius. A couple of richly robed kings and their gay court followers once met on an open plain, and the place of their meeting is known to this day as "the Field of the Cloth of Gold." Some rude miners met in a deep mountain cañon and played cards on a keg of powder, and that place will go down to future ages as "Helltown."

Butte Creek, on the banks of which Helltown is situated, is fairly entitled to be called a historic stream. Starting from its source, up in the Sierra, it has for ages heroically plunged, roared, and foamed away over those lava-capped Buttes until, inch by inch, it has furrowed out a deep and ample channel in the solid rock, through which it rushes impatiently down to join the Sacramento. It has actually cut mountain in two. Great perpendicular walls of rock rising up on either side, in places hundreds of feet, attest the grandeur of its task. Monstrous over-hanging arches of lava crumble and fall away with each returning season, to be swept away by the stream—that stream which, ages ago, proudly bathed the heads of the tallest of those Buttes, now humbly washes their feet, as if in penitence for the ruin it has wrought. Down, down, down that persevering little stream has burrowed its way until, at last, it has reached and crossed one of those ancient pre-historic river beds, in the gravel bottom of which is found pure flakes and nuggets of gold. These ancient rivers, which belonged to some former geologic period, seem to be wholly independent of the present system of mountains, valleys, and streams. Mountains have absolutely been deposited upon them, choking them up and burying them from sight for ages, until the streams which now bear down from the Sierra have split open the mountains and exposed their hidden treasures to view. At Helltown, where Butte Creek crosses one of these old river beds, the gravel had been washed away from the gold and the early miners had little else to do but search the channels and crevices of the rocks for the millions of dollars worth of gold which they found and carried away. But these early miners confined themselves to the beds and margins of the streams, or to such places as they could carry the water by means of cheap sluices. It remained for modern capitalists to penetrate the mountains and follow the ancient channels by the construction of expensive ditches and tunnels. The fall of the mountain to a point six hundred feet above the bed of the stream at Helltown, from whence the flood-gates will be opened upon the gold deposits that have not hitherto been reached.

Working on this ditch for wages of $1.50 to $2 a day I found the son of a wealthy Iowa banker, who had been reared in luxury; another gentleman of education who had carried on an extensive business on his own account in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania; a third, who possesses a fine classical education, and has spent five years in India studying oriental literature; and a fourth, the son of a San Francisco capitalist, who prefers to carve out his own fortune to depending upon his father's bounty. Tell me days of true heroism in California are past! These gentlemen nobly prefer the dignity of country labor to the degradation of city idleness.

In the introduction to his "English Traits," Ralph Waldo Emerson confesses that after his return from Europe in 1833, he found much less in his diary about places than persons. He was young, ambitious, and impressive then, and consequently was a hero-worshiper. He, naturally enough, had sought and obtained interviews with many famous authors and writers of that day, and his diary was filled with what they had said to him, and his own opinions of them. I may be pardoned, perhaps, for the liberty of expressing the opinion that Charles Warren Stoddard writes infinitely better reminiscences of persons whom he has met in his travels than he does of scenes which he witnessed; and this is not to be wondered at, for all of our brightest and most vivid recollections are of persons and not of places. A man whose soul is more deeply stirred by a landscape than a warm, congenial, responsive mind is a cold cynic, and I will have none of him. I, therefore, frankly admit that my pleasantest recollections of Helltown are of some choice spirits whom I met there.

I shall never forget a neat little cottage with wide verandas, shaded and hidden from view by full-bearing orange and broad-leaved fig trees, perfumed by rare flowers, among which were innumerable varieties of roses and three species of oleanders—white, pink, and buff—all in full bloom, in Helltown. This cottage was occupied. A quiet, modest little Presbyterian family have lived within its pleasant walls for twenty-two consecutive years. Three bright, intelligent young men have been reared and educated under that parental roof. Refinement, taste, intelligence, and (that rarest of all graces in these modern times) unostentatious piety, find their abode in that contented American home. The strangest part of the story remains to be told. The ever-busy queen of that little household has found time amid all her cares of state, and during a quarter of a century of senseless scramble for coin, to collect in a scrap-book the purer and better gems of poetry from the newspapers and periodicals that have steadfastly found their way to that secluded spot, and has from the same source secured more or less authentic likenesses of the principal authors, and has so arranged her book of books that the poems of each author shall follow his picture. The result is a large and complete volume of the best gems of poetry of the last quarter of a century. All this, remember, in Helltown—a rude, mountain mining camp.

Helltown has its notables not unknown to fame. Two out of the six or seven adult inhabitants of the village are poets of recognized reputation, a third is an "occasional contributor," and a fourth lives two miles out of town. The poet-slayer has not yet visited Helltown. It must not be supposed that these poets confine themselves strictly to the rules of prosody. When they sit down to compose a poem they do not stop to methodically consider whether it shall be an iambus, a trochee, or an anapaest. They are "inspirational" poets. No lingering doubts disturb their minds as to whether they are in fact "poets," or mere "versifiers." The fig-leaf has not as yet been rudely torn away from their understandings on this score by the savage Bierce, nor have they yet suffered the exquisite agony of his satire. Their versification may not always be strictly correct, but, after all, is not that the fault of their revisers and proof-readers? Should it be expected of the architect who plans and conceives a grand and beautiful structure in his brain that he shall hew the timber and fit the joints? Are not these details for the rude mechanic whose business it is to give form to the conception of the architect? Why not, then, make these versifiers, critics, and satirists subserve some useful purpose? Why should Adam Smith's law of "the division of labor" not be applied to literature as well as to commerce? Many a poet as well as tragedian has been "crushed" by a rude sneering word, who might have electrified the world if the heartless cynic who wrote it had been set to work with his severe taste to correct a few "paltry" errors of construction. But I digress.

"Pres" Longley, the leading poet of Helltown, whom I shall denominate "the bard of the Buttes," is a genuine forty-niner—the best specimen of the old type of Californian that I have ever met. Not one of the Bret Harte school of ruffians, who amuse themselves by carving each other to pieces with bowie-knives and talk like highway robbers, but a peaceable, jolly, fun-loving gentleman, who loves good-fellowship and a social convivial glass. The ideal Californian of Bret Harte was as much too vicious as the Fennimore Cooper tribe of Indians were too romantic. They each dwelt exclusively in the imaginations of the writers. "Pres" Longley, the bachelor poet of Helltown, dwells in his lonely cabin on the banks of Butte Creek. He calls it his "vale of seclusion." His claim is rich in gold, and a very little work now and then supplies him all the necessities of life. His leisure hours are devoted to the muse and to entertaining his friends. As a specimen of his verse, I quote the following, from a poem entitled "The Bachelor's Inquiry." In the first verse he asks the "winds" if they, "in all their wanderings," have "seen a maid"

—"in all the teeming lands,
Like some oasis sweet amid the desert sands," to "thrill" his "lonely heart." Receiving no reply, he appeals to the "hills," the "streams," and to the "glorious stars," in the following strain:

Tell me, ye mighty hills, that seem so gray and old,
That stand, like giants tall, guarding your beds of gold,
If you, in all the weary, lapsing years that laid
Their secrets at your feet, know such a loving maid?
But they were mute, like solemn statues o'er a tomb,
And frowned more sadly, with a dark portentous gloom:

Yet still the pines, by pity stirred, hummed sad and low:
"No longer seek the maid—she breathes not here below."

Tell me, ye streams that sweep the mountain side
And gully out your rocky channels deep and wide,
If you, perchance, might know of any such a maid,
Whose love would be the boon for which I've searched and prayed?
But onward in their madd'ning course they rushed and roared,
Down to their ocean home, and there their wealth outpoured;
But as they passed along by fields and meadows green,
They softly said in song, "That maid has not been seen."

I turned my wandering gaze up to the glorious stars—
To Venus, Jupiter, and to brilliant Mars—
And then I asked the pale-faced moon, the golden sun,
That had through space so many revolutions run,
If they in all their ceaseless vigils ever had Obtained a glimpse of that long-cherished maid;
But they all sadly, sweetly smiled, and told no tales
To any one within these sorrow-haunted vales.

Now, I do not think Mr. Bierce could have ever written the above poem. He is not the sort of a man to sadly mope around the world "longing for a maid." He is even strenuously opposed to "entering the bonds of matrimony." He would, in a business-like way, have simply "got married," and that would have dispersed the whole romance at once.

Another of the poets of Helltown is Miss Mary A. Foley, the daughter of an "honest miner" of Butte Creek. This young lady really possesses talent. The following extract of a poem from her pen is, perhaps, remotely similar to one recently written by Charles Warren Stoddard, and dedicated to the departing Harry Edwards, but it was written months previous to the Midsummer Jinks, and she could not, therefore, have taken her pattern from that:

To a Friend.

Farewell, dear friend:
The verdant leaves are drooping low,
Translucent in the evening glow,
Which casts o'er all a soft halo—
Farewell!

Farewell, dear friend:
How softly sounds your pulsing lake,
Where breeze-born dimples gently break
Its crystal surface, and awake
Sweet sounds.

Farewell, dear friend:
A lingering thought steals over me,
What might have been, and still might be.
Oh, canst thou solve this mystery
For me?

Farewell, dear friend:
Forgive! I should not for thy sake
The chains of friendship rudely break,
Nor my own slumbering thoughts awake—
Farewell!

Farewell, dear friend:
'Twas but a fancy, now 'tis past,
And dreams and hopes come quick and fast,
That lethe comes to us at last—
Farewell!

Farewell, dear friend:
How gently breathes the evening gale
While sighing through the dreamy vale,
Where peace and harmony prevail—
Farewell!

The following is an extract from a poem written by Mr. W. A. McCready, another poet who resides two miles from Helltown:

By Butte's fair banks and flowery dells,
Where nature's gems are all aglow,
A blue-eyed maiden rare does dwell,
As fair a flower as man could know.
The zephyrs fan her auburn hair,
And waft sweet perfumes from the glade.
She heeds not half their beauties rare,
This handsome, winning Butte Creek maid.

Something in the atmosphere of Helltown—perhaps its close proximity to Paradise—inspires the poetic muse. I was seized while there with an almost insane desire to write a "poem." I suppose I had a "fit" of the "divine afflatus." When I recovered my normal condition I found that I had produced a pure anapaest—the most difficult feat in English literature. Mr. Bierce, in commenting on this form of verse, says that "it is difficult to conceive anything more intolerable to the ear than an unbroken succession of anapaests," and he "solemnly abjures the 'rising young poets' to have as little to do with it as possible." But the genuine poet, as I have found under "inspiration," has no control over himself, and must simply write what his "soul" dictates. In proof of which, I appeal to my friends Gen. Foote, Harry Dam, Charles Warren Stoddard, and the hosts of others who have felt the "influence" and know how it is themselves:

To "Pres" Longley, the Bard of the Buttes.

I fell in with an old forty-niner,
Not one of the Bret Harte "galoots,"
But a gentleman, poet, and miner,
The recognized "bard of the Buttes."

He possesses a rich placer claim,
Which he mines whenever it suits;
Cares as little for wealth as for fame,
This philosopher "bard of the Buttes."

All alone in his "vale of seclusion"—
No wife, no domestic disputes,
No children, no noise or confusion—
Dwells this bachelor "bard of the Buttes."

Though uncultured, his nature is gentle,
He loves those old lava-capped Buttes
With a love that is almost parental,
This genuine "bard of the Buttes."

Those lava-capped mountains above him,
As dumb and as speechless as mutes,
Look down on their poet and love him—
Their poet, the "bard of the Buttes."

The mountain streams born of the rains
Leap down the dry gulches and chutes,
As if eager to catch the refrains
Of their poet, the "bard of the Buttes."

The beautiful green mountain pines
Softly whisper ten thousand salutes;
The flowers and sweet-scented vines
Cluster round their dear "bard of the Buttes."

Oh, thou poet, thou miner of gold,
The tree shall be known by its fruits;
Thy gold, it may rust, but thy name shall be told
To the future, "bard of the Buttes."

RETIRING FROM BUSINESS.

BY BRET HARTE.

What the Colonel's business was nobody knew, nor did anybody care, particularly. He purchased for cash only, and he never grumbled at the price of anything he wanted; who could ask more than that?

Curious people occasionally wondered how, when it had been fully two years since the Colonel, with every one else, abandoned Dutch Creek to the Chinese, he managed to spend money freely and to lose considerable at cards and horse races. In fact, the keeper of that one of the two Challenge Hill saloons which the Colonel did not patronize, was once heard to absent-mindedly wonder whether the Colonel hadn't a money mill somewhere where he turned out double eagles and "slugs" (the coast name for fifty-dollar gold pieces).

When so important a personage as a barkeeper indulged publicly in an idea, the inhabitants of Challenge Hill, like good Californians everywhere, considered themselves in duty bound to give it grave consideration; so for a few days certain industrious professional gentlemen, who won money of the Colonel, carefully weighed some of the brightest pieces, and tried them with acids, and tested them, and saved them up, and had the lumps assayed.

The result was a complete vindication of the Colonel, and a loss of considerable custom to the indiscreet barkeeper.

The Colonel was as good-natured a man as had ever been known at Challenge Hill, but, being mortal, the Colonel had his occasional times of despondency, and one of them occurred after a series of races in which he had staked his all on his own bay mare Tipsie, and had lost.

Looking reproachfully at his beloved animal he failed to heed the aching void of his pockets, and drinking deeply, swearing eloquently, and glaring defiantly at all mankind, were equally unproductive of coin.

The boys at the saloon sympathized most feelingly with the Colonel; they were unceasing in their invitations to drink, and they even exhibited considerable Christian forbearance, when the Colonel savagely dissented with every one who advanced any proposition, no matter how incontrovertible.

But unappreciated sympathy grows decidedly tiresome to the giver, and it was with a feeling of relief that the boys saw the Colonel stride out of the saloon, mount Tipsie, and gallop furiously away.

Riding on horseback has always been considered an excellent sort of exercise, and fast riding is universally admitted to be one of the most healthful and delightful means of exhilaration in the world.

But when a man is so absorbed in his exercise that he will not stop to speak to a friend, and when his exhilaration is so complete that he turns his eyes from well-meaning thumbs pointing significantly into doorways through which a man has often passed while seeking bracing influences, it is but natural that people should express some wonder.

The Colonel was well known at Toddy Flat, Lone Hand, Blazers, Murderer's Bar, and several other villages through which he passed. As no one had been seen to precede him, betting men were soon offering odds that the Colonel was running away from somebody.

Strictly speaking, they were wrong, but they won all the money that had been staked against them, for, within half an hour's time, there passed over the same road an anxious-looking individual, who reined up in front of the principal saloon of each place, and asked if the Colonel had passed.

Had the gallant Colonel known that he was followed, and by whom, there would have been an extra election held at the latter place very shortly after, for the pursuer was the constable of Challenge Hill; and for constables and all officers of the law the Colonel possessed hatred of unspeakable intensity.

On galloped the Colonel, following the stage road, which threaded the old mining camps on Duck Creek; but suddenly he turned abruptly out of the road and urged his horse through the young pines and bushes, which grew thickly by the road, while the constable galloped rapidly on to the next camp.

There seemed to be no path through the thicket into which the Colonel had turned, but Tipsie walked between the trees and shrubs as if they were the familiar objects of her own stable yard. Suddenly a voice from the bushes shouted:

"What's up?"

"Business—that's what," replied the Colonel.

"It's time," replied the voice, and its owner—a bearded six-footer—emerged from the bushes, and stroked Tipsie's nose with the freedom of an old acquaintance. "We ain't had a nip since last night, and thar ain't a cracker or a handful of flour in the shanty. The old gal go back on yer?"

"Yes," replied the Colonel, ruefully, "lost every blasted race. 'Twasn't her fault—bless her—she done her level best. Ev'rybody to home?"

"You bet," said the man. "All been a prayin' for yer to turn up with the rocks, an' somethin' with more color than spring water. Come on."

The man led the way and Tipsie and the Colonel followed, and the trio suddenly found themselves before a small log hut, but in front of which sat three solemn disconsolate individuals, who looked appealingly to the Colonel.

"Mac'll tell yer how 'twas, fellers," said the Colonel, meekly, "while I picket the mare."

The Colonel was absent but a very few moments, but when he returned each of the four was attired in pistols and knife, while Mac was distributing some dominoes, made from a rather dirty flour bag.

"Tain't so late ez all that, is it?" inquired the Colonel.

"Better be an hour ahead than miss it this 'ere night," said one of the four. "I ain't been so thirsty since I come round the Horn in '50, an' we run short of water. Somebody'll get hurt if ther ain't any bitters on the old concern—they will, or my name ain't Perkins."

"Don't count on your chickens 'fore they're hatched, Perk," said one of the party, as he adjusted the domino under the rim of his hat. "S'posin' ther' shud be too many for us?"

"Stiddy, stiddy, Cranks," remonstrated the Colonel. "Nobody ever gets along ef they 'low 'emselves to be skeered."

"Fact," chimed in the smallest and thinnest man in the party. "The Bible says somethin' mighty hot 'bout that; I disremember adzactly how it goes; but I've heerd Parson Buzzy, down in Maine, preach a rippin' old sermon maoy a time. The old man never thort whar a comfort them sermons was agoin' to be to a road agent, though. That time we stopped Slim Mike's stage, and he didn't hev no more manners than to draw on me, them sermons was a perfect blessing to me—the thought of 'em cleared my head as quick as a cocktail. An'—"

"I don't want to dispute Logroller's pious strain," interrupted the Colonel; "but ez it's Old Black that's drivin' today instead of Slim Mike, an' ez Old Black allers makes his time, hedn't we better vamoose?"

The door of the shanty was hastily closed, and the men filed through the thicket until near the road, when they marched rapidly on in parallel lines with it. After about half an hour, Perkins, who was leading, halted and wiped his perspiring brow with his shirt sleeve.

"Fur enough from home, now," said he. "Tain't no use bein' a gentleman ef yer have to work too hard."

"Safe enough, I reckon," replied the Colonel. "We'll do the usual; I'll halt 'em; Logroller 'tend to the driver, Cranks takes the boot, an' Mac an' Perk takes right an' left. An'—I know it's tough—but considerin' how everlastin' eternally hard up we are, I reckon we'll have to ask contributions from the ladies, too, ef thar's any aboard—eh, boys?"

"Reckon so," replied Logroller, with a chuckle that seemed to inspire even his black domino with a merry wrinkle or two. "What's the use of woman's rights ef they don't ever have a chance of exercisin' 'em? Hevin' their purses borrowed 'ud show 'em the hull doctrine in a bran new light."

"Come, come, boy," interposed the Colonel, "that's the crack of Old Black's whip! Pick yer bushes—quick! All jump when I whistle!"

Each man secreted himself near the roadside. The stage came swinging along handsomely, the insiders were laughing heartily about something; and Old Black was just giving a delicate touch to the flank of the off leader, when the Colonel gave a shrill quick whistle, and five men sprang into the road.

The horses stopped as suddenly as if it were a matter of common occurrence. Old Black dropped the reins, crossed his legs, and stared into the sky, and the passengers all put out their heads with a rapidity equaled only by that with which they withdrew them as they saw the dominoes and revolvers of the road agents.

"Seems to be something the matter, gentlemen," said the Colonel, blandly, as he opened the door. "Won't you please get out? Don't you trouble yourself to draw, 'cos my friend here's got his weapon cocked, an' his fingers is rather nervous. Ain't got a handkerchief, hev yer?" asked he of the first passenger who descended from the stage. "Hev? Well, now, that's lucky. Just put yer hands behind you, please—so—that's it." And the unfortunate man was securely bound in an instant.

The remaining passengers were treated with similar courtesy, and the Colonel and his friends examined the pockets of the captives. Old Black remained unmolested, for who ever heard of a stage-driver having money?

"Boys," said the Colonel, calling his brother agents aside, and comparing receipts, "tain't much of a haul; but there's only one woman, an' she's old enough to be a feller's grandmother. Better let her alone, eh?"

"Like enough she'll pan out more'n all the rest of the stage put together," growled Cranks, carefully testing the thickness of the case of a gold watch. "Just like the low-lived deceitfulness of some folks to hire an old woman to carry their money, so it'd go safer. Maybe what she's got ain't nothin' to some folks that's got hosses that kin win money at races, but—"

The Colonel abruptly ended the conversation and approached the stage. He was very chivalrous, but Cranks' sarcastic reference to Tipsie needed avenging, and as he could not consistently with business arrangements put an end to Cranks, the old lady would have to suffer.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," said the Colonel, raising his hat politely with one hand while he opened the coach door with the other, "but we're takin' up a collection for some deservin' object. We wuz agoin' to make the gentlemen fork over the full amount, but ez they ain't got enough, we will hev to bother you."

The old lady trembled, felt for her pocket-book, raised her veil. The Colonel looked into her face, slammed the stage door, and sitting on the hub of one of the wheels, stared vacantly into space.

"Nothin'?" queried Perkins in a whisper, and with a face full of genuine sympathy.

"No—yes," said the Colonel, dreamily. "That is, untie 'em and let the stage go ahead," he continued, springing to his feet. "I'll hurry back to the cabin." And the Colonel dashed into the bushes and left his followers so paralyzed that Old Black afterward remarked, that "ef there'd been anybody to the hosses he could hev cleaned the hull crowd with his whip."

The passengers, now relieved of their weapons, were unbound, allowed to enter the stage, and the door was slammed, upon which Old Black picked up his reins as coolly as if he had lain them down at a station while the horses were being changed; then he cracked his whip and the stage rolled off, while the Colonel's party hastened back to their hut, fondly inspecting as they went certain flasks they had obtained while transacting their business with the occupants of the stage.

Great was the surprise of the road agents as they entered their hut, for there stood the Colonel in a clean white shirt, and in a suit of clothing made from the limited, spare wardrobes of the other members of the gang.

But the suspicious Cranks speedily subordinated his wonder to his prudence, as laying on the table a watch, two pistols, a pocket-book, and a heavy purse, he exclaimed:

"Come, Colonel, business before pleasure; let's divide an' scatter. Ef anybody should hear about this robbery an' find our trail, an' ketch the traps in our possession, they might—"

"Divide yerselves," said the Colonel, with abruptness and a great oath; "I don't want none of it."

"Colonel," said Perkins, removing his own domino and looking anxiously into the leader's face, "be you sick? Here's some bully brandy which I found in one of the passenger's pockets."

"I hain't nothin'," replied the Colonel, with averted eyes.

"I'm goin', and I'm a retirin' from this business, forever."

"Ain't a-goin' to turn evidence?" cried Cranks, grasping the pistol on the table.

"I'm a-goin' to make a lead mine of you ef you don't take that back!" roared the Colonel, with a bound which caused Cranks to drop the pistol and retire precipitately, apologizing as he went: "I'm a-goin' to tend to my own business, an' that's enough to keep any man bizzzy. Somebody lend me fifty dollars till I see him agin'."

Perkins pressed the money into the Colonel's hand, and within two minutes the Colonel was on Tipsie's back and galloped off in the direction the stage had taken.

He overtook it, he passed it, and still he galloped on.

The people at Mad Gulch knew the Colonel well, and made a rule never to be astonished at anything he did; but they made an exception to the rule when the Colonel canvassed the principal bar-rooms for men who wished to purchase a horse; and when a gambler who was flush obtained Tipsie for twenty slugs—only a thousand dollars, when the Colonel had always said that there wasn't gold enough on top of ground to buy her—Mud Gulch experienced a decided sensation.

One or two enterprising persons soon discovered that the Colonel was not in a communicative mood; so every one retired to his favorite saloon to bet according to his own opinion of the Colonel's motives and actions.

But when the Colonel, after remaining in a barber shop for half an hour, emerged with his face clean shaved and hair neatly trimmed and parted, betting was so wild that a cool-headed sporting man speedily made a fortune by betting against every theory that was advanced.

Then the Colonel made a tour of the stores and fitting himself with a new suit of clothes, carefully eschewing all of the generous patterns and pronounced colors so dear to the average miner. He bought a new hat, and put on a pair of boots, and pruned his finger nails, and, stranger than all, he mildly declined all invitations to drink.

As the Colonel stood in the door of the principal saloon, where the stage always stopped, the Challenge Hill constable was seen to approach the Colonel and tap him on the shoulder, upon which all men who bet that the Colonel was dodging somebody claimed the stakes. But those who stood near the Colonel heard the constable say:

"Colonel, I take it all back. When I seed you get out of Challenge Hill it come to me that you might be in the road-agent business, so I follered you—duty, you know. But when I seed you sell Tipsie I knew I was on the wrong trail. I wouldn't suspect you now if all the stages in the State wuz robbed; and I'll give you satisfaction any way you want it."

"It's all right," said the Colonel, with a smile. The constable afterward said that nobody had any idea of how curiously the Colonel smiled when his beard was off.

Suddenly the stage pulled up at the door with a crash, and the male passengers buried into the saloon in a state of utter indignation and impecuniosity.

The story of the robbery attracted everybody, and during the excitement the Colonel quietly slipped out and opened the door of the stage. The old lady started, and cried:

"George!"

And the Colonel jumped into the stage and put his arms tenderly around the trembling form of the old lady, exclaiming:

"Mother!"

It is not evidence on the part of a Supervisor, that he possesses integrity, business capacity, nor an honest desire to serve the city, because he grumbles over the payment of an honest municipal debt and squirms at the fulfillment of a legal contract entered into by the city. The application of this moral maxim is to the payment of the claim of John F. Swift by the city of San Francisco of the sum of $20,000. He has earned the money, is entitled to it under a written contract, and any attempt to defeat or delay its payment is an evasion of duty.

One of the exhibits attracting much attention at the Trocadéro, according to the London World, is that of Thomas B. Oakley, an American, who contributes three works of art from the private collection of Mrs. Sunderland of San Francisco—a portemonnaie, a powder box and puff, and a jewel casket, all made of solid gold and quartz rock, beautifully interspersed with mosaic.

Although French is the language of diplomacy, there was more English than French spoken at the Berlin Congress. Prince Bismarck, Herr Von Bulow, Count Andrassy, Count Schouvaloff, and M. Waddington speak English fluently. It happened that of the seventeen plenipotentiaries only five besides the two representatives from Paris spoke French to perfection.

It is stated that life-size portraits of Anderson and Mrs. Jenks have been ordered by the Sazer.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

MY DEAR EM.:—Of all the many products of human hands, I think lace is the most beautiful. It is a vision of the hoarfrost made fast, a dream of summer's blossoms imprisoned in gossamer thread—anything that is airy, unsubstantial, and unearthly. Wrought by the patient fingers of human spiders that burrow and hide from the light of day, it has a pathos that no other handicraft has—no, not even the grimy, pitiful life of the coal mines. I think I never told you of that strange life I came across when I was last in Europe? It was that of a woman, not yet twenty-five years old, her home the darkest and poorest cellar in all Brussels. There she had toiled for years, beginning her apprenticeship when only five years old, to support a sister, a fair-haired child, and save her from the grim fate that dedicates whole families and generations to her pitiless trade, the schools of West Flanders alone containing 30,000 apprentices. To engage heaven on her side, she had made a vow to offer a certain number of yards of lace of her own make as a votive offering, if the child might be spared. To accomplish it, she had to forego the usual summer's work in the fields, and devote every moment of her working life to the task. Each day the single stream of light that was permitted to enter her damp chamber through the tiny opening in the window grew dimmer and dimmer to her failing sight—for, you know, these workers seldom retain their eyesight after thirty—and the work still unfinished. I heard the end of her sad story the other day. Some time I will write it out for you. It all came back to me this morning, while I was looking over some of the new laces at the Lace House, and chatting with Mr. Samuels, who has just returned from the Paris Exposition, where he has purchased some of the notable articles from the Belgian exhibit, among them a flounce and shawl of Brussels point of rare beauty. There are some beautiful things already here—a scarf, for instance, in the three choicest styles: the Valenciennes, Duchesse, and Point de Venise; or if you like it better in the liquid Italian syllables, punto tagliato e foliani, or rose-point, and some new designs in Valenciennes. It is only of late years that there has been any variation of the original and very simple design in this lace, so "set" in their own way are the exponents of its particular school. It seems very absurd, but is a fact nevertheless, that the products of Ghent and Bruges are both inferior to those of Ypres, where the finest are made, but nothing will induce the makers of the first two places to make the only change needed to improve their work, to twist the bobbins four and five times, as at Ypres, instead of only twice. Moreover, Valenciennes is not made at Valenciennes at all. Mr. Samuels tells me that the Mecklin lace, made at Malines, is coming into fashion again, and that the Duchesse will be more sought after than ever. There is a new candidate in the shape of a hand-made lace, similar in appearance to the Spanish, and a black lace called "Engheim," made in Belgium, that is an imitation of Chantilly. Mr. Samuels proposes to make a fine exhibit at the coming Mechanics' Fair, and hopes to have his new goods on time for it. He is making strong efforts to induce some other leading houses to take a part in the Fair, as well. It is refreshing in these days to see real public spirit, and a lack of it is one of the greatest faults always found with San Francisco; so I hope that there may be a great many who will be willing to demonstrate that there is something more than a desire for individual gain among us. Such houses as Sullivan's, Davidson's, Shreve's, The White House, Lille de Paris, Diamond Palace and a dozen others, can surely make a creditable display, and do something towards reviving trade at the same time. While you are enjoying the summer days among the flowers of Southern California, I am, perforce, still lingering amid sharp winds and too frequent fogs. Do you wonder then that I solace myself by seeking the beautiful wherever I can find it? One of my pet haunts is the different flower stores, for there I can almost fancy I am once more in sweet Santa Rosa, where, a year ago, I dreamed away the rose-scented hours. Funny, isn't it, that fancies should change, even in flowers? Sievers, on Post Street, who is my floral oracle, says they do, and so it must be true. Just now, the fashion is for Stephanotis, the fragrant white blossoms of the Clerodendron and the Pythianus, and the always lovely Cape Jessamine, of which he showed me flowers as large as dahlias. Two strange looking Australian flowers, both nameless, are a cactus plant with a star-shaped blossom of deep, brownish purple and yellow, and a still stranger one, the three leaves that form the petals of rose color, joined at the base, from which spring, inside, perfectly formed little yellow blooms, each on a dainty green stem. Isolepis, Lobelia, Smilax, Ferns, and Lycopodium are the greens most used in his hanging baskets. I have always fancied I would like to be a florist and lay out gardens, or, as the French signs have it: "General entreprise of gardens." All this, somehow, brings me to perfumes and all manner of toilet dainties, in which I know your aesthetic soul delights. A dear old English friend, as fanciful as Queen Mab, and withal as thoroughly British as Magna Charta itself, begged of me to hunt up for her some of Old-ling's face-powder the other day. Of course I went to Wakelee's, as we have done for everything, lo! these fifteen years, and equally "of course" found the desired article, together with so many more that I should despair of telling you half in my present letter. There were all the old favorites, Lubin's, the genuine Farina colognes, from the firm now over a hundred years old, and bearing the dashing signature of Johann Maria as the trade mark, and a whole garden full of the newer but familiar Atkinson's extracts, whose exquisite coloring alone would make them my favorites: Wild Hyacinth, Gardenia, Heliotrope. That reminds me; do you know "the secret mystery of the Jessamine," or the story of "Frangipani," the great and beloved alchemist of Rome, who made from flowers a wonderful cure for the plague, a "perfumed powder in a velvet bag,"

—a cast of
Odors rare—of orris mixed with spice,
Sandal and violet, with musk and rose,
Combined in due proportion?

Leland tells the story prettily in verse. I doubt, however, that even Frangipani himself could make a better poudre sachet than Wakelee does from our own California flowers. In fact, his shelves bear nearly as many articles of his own make as of foreign manufacture. Half the blonde locks you see, ma chère, are the results of his "Aureoline," which has quite superseded all other preparations on this slope, and the number of teeth that are daily brushed with his "Odonto" and Oriental Tooth Wash, and weary heads refreshed with the delicious Verbena Water, are something beyond my arithmetical powers to compute. New and very delicious are the Eickalaer soaps from Brussels. I shall send you some to try this week, a cup of Guerlain's English shaving soap for your good man, and a box of the Lilien Puder—the German face powder—that has had such a run here ever since it came out a year and a half ago. Perhaps if you are, like the little girl in the song, "very, very good," I may add one of those "Ballarat" toilet bottles you have been coveting so long. A pretty little convenience is a chased tin box for soap, and one to match to hold the nail-brush, in traveling. Like the hundred and one other toilet conceits, these are Parisian. The "Raphael," a scarlet pencil for the lips—although a misnomer, for it was Rubens, and not Raphael, who laid on the reds in compliment to his ruddy-haired wife—is a handy trifle for those who use rouge. As for medical preparations, I wonder Mistress Pandora ever dares to show her ugly face again while Wakelee remains on this side of Shadow Land, so various are the remedies he keeps for her every ill. Stationery is more beautiful than ever. Some samples of a new invoice not yet opened at Bancroft's show everything decidedly new, both in shape and colors. Visiting cards all have gold, silver, or colored edges, and the plainest of script is the regulation lettering. Entirely new is the turn-down corner, on which are written Felicitation, Congé, Condolence, Visite, as the case may require. They will also be square in form and large in size, which will necessitate a revolution in card-cases. Menu cards are as fanciful as ever, and correspondingly expensive—four dollars for fifty—but then they are hand-painted, which makes all the difference. Oakley Hall's daughters, I hear, do the most of those used in New York, as they are accomplished artists, and—well, the ex-Mayor's family have felt more than one of the "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune" of late. I must confess, I do not see that those imported from Tiffany's are one bit handsomer than those made at Bancroft's own printing office. The "Napkin" card is stamped to look like a fringed napkin, and the menu is printed diagonally instead of straight across. The "Windsor" is the newest in envelopes. The flap is the particular innovation, and is run down to a rounded point, on the end of which, and in the corner of the envelope, is the monogram. It is to be used for both invitations and correspondence. Wedding cards and other invitations will be either severely square or decidedly oblong. "Shell rose," "moss green," "Verona cream," or "macaroni," "new lilac," and "clouded sky," are the new tints in paper, which comes in all shapes and sizes, the most popular being the medium square for ladies and extra long for gentlemen. Both the matted or rough surface, so suited to soft pens, and the satin finish, are used, but I believe the first is considered the more distingué. You are so enthusiastic a Californian that you will like the new tint "shell rose," the best, I know, because of its origin, which is the pretty abalone shell of the San Diego coast. It comes to me from the best authority that Tiffany himself, desiring a new shade, and seeing one of them, sent it as a model to the mills, with orders not to give up until the exact shade should be obtained. The result is one of the loveliest tints you can imagine. Just here let me tell you of a cheap table in mosaic made entirely of abalone that is on exhibition at Plum's. For your chair ties you will do better to get the Germantown wool, which is almost excluding the German worsteds from the market; it is only ten cents an ounce and washes like cotton, in all colors. Mrs. Deppen uses it almost altogether. The bur-laps rugs are something beautiful and she tells me she has so many orders from the country or those about going out of town, to design and begin this particular kind of work, that she finds it difficult to find time to finish up those designed for the Fair, besides some heavy orders from San Franciscans now sojourning in Paris. I like the new departure the White House has taken this week. The window on Post Street corner has been made an exclusively mourning department, which not only calls attention to a fine choice of black goods, and makes a selection very much easier for purchasers, but shows to advantage the brilliant colors in the adjoining ones. Long may it be, however, before you are called to need any of its sombre contents, my friend. I wait a letter from you with fresh commissions and new questions.

As ever, LILIAS DUBOIS.

How many men have worked themselves into a brain fever chasing a slippery piece of soap around a full bathtub?

Glory is well enough for a rich man; but it is of very little consequence to a poor man with a large family.

FLOWER VOICES.

Once in the night I heard
The heart of summer stirred
By words with music laden,
Adrift, the shadows through,
As if each flower maiden
Were singing in the dew,
And telling all the twilight
Of some new added grace,
Some gift of stars and silence.

I leaned with longing face,
Half sad, for music troubles so
The one who hardly reads
Its swaying undertone,
But yet hears sobbing needs
That in his soul have grown!

Then, rising, I stepped down
The narrow oaken stair,
And breathed a broader air
Than my low dusty room;
The nightly courts of gloom
Were full of love and cheer,

A faint wind past me blew,
All music crept more near,
I shut the door behind,
Outreaching hands to find
The voices that came through
My window cooled with vines—

Rhythmical beat of oars
Dipt in an ether sea,
Infinite chant of song,
Passionate, pure, and free,
Musical voices low,
And bits of blossom talk,

Airily come and go,
Dreamily rise and fall,
Happily laugh, and call
Over the garden walk!

So through the fairy bowers
I pass, to search for three
Flower faces pure and wee,
Three souls that comfort me
In the still daytime hours.

Down by the westward gate
There sits Campanula,
And nods her tinted bells,
And sings as one elate
That hath an inner star,
And heart with love deep freighted,

That long indeed hath waited,
And hears a step, not far;
Then, with a sudden singing
From tiny bells outstringing,
I saw Campanula—
She bent so sweetly over,
And kissed her fairy lover,
Behind a slender bar
Of netted scarlet clover!

Wavy, and tall, and fair,
Bright in the shining air,
Binding her yellow tresses
Over her scarlet lips,
Lost in a swift eclipse
Then gleaming out again,
As after misty rain

The sun with keener lances!
Who is the beauty there,
Wild as a forest queen,
With robe of glossy green,
And tendrils in her hair?
O my airy Clematis,
Half entreating for a kiss

The tree that bends above you;
How you tossed your playful head,
By the dew-drops diamonded,
Then grew tender with, "I love you!"

Underneath the hollow night
Was a tiny circle white,
And a little maiden simple,
Clad in fairy cloak and wimple,
Never a word of love had she,
Never lover kempt to her,
But her eyes were a sea
Sleeping in Italian skies,
Fragrant with a wisp of myrrh,
And with color music wise;
Yet across her eyes were blest
Something that was half content,
And half eager wonderment.

Ob! the simple Violet,
Spotless in her maiden grace,
Oh! the weird quaint faces
That the darlings daily lift
In the old remembered places,
In our childhood's haunted valleys,
Where the deathless sunlight dallies,
And memorial hills are white!

A faint far trumpet blown,
An eager sweet farewell,
And the happy fairy spell
From all the land has flown!
Only the moonlight silvers
Each weeping bloom and tree,
The stars with lifted faces
Are weeping silently.

Then, while the earth is dreaming
Of dawn with golden hair,
I tread the curving pathway,
And climb the narrow stair.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, July 21, 1878.

Tomato Soup.
Cloud River Dolly Varden Trout.
Sheep's Trotters, White Sauce.
Green Peas. Succotash.
Roast Beef. Fried Potatoes.
Sliced Tomatoes, Mayonnaise Dressing.
Frozen Peaches and Cream.

Fruit-bowl of Peaches, Cherries, Plums, Apples, Figs, Grapes, Pears.

TO COOK SHEEP'S TROTTERS WITH WHITE SAUCE.—Take eight trotters, cut lengthwise; boil until tender in some good stock; season with salt, pepper, and a finely minced onion and parsley. When nearly done, add a spoonful of butter, rubbed in flour sufficient to thicken the gravy. When ready to dish, add yolk of one egg well beaten, and one small cup of cream. Mind you do not let it boil after this added, as it might curdle.

"John," said a cockney solicitor to his son, "I see you'll never do for an attorney, you have no energy." "Skuse me, father," said John, "what I want is some of your chikanary."

With love the heart becomes a fair and fertile garden, glowing with sunshine and warm hues, and exhaling sweet odors; but without it, it is a bleak desert covered with ashes.

Wen I ast Uncle Ned, wich has been in Injy and evry were, wot for was them Injins bein so crewel to the Orregon fokes, he said, Uncle Ned did: "Wel, Johnny, you see its this way: the Injins dont mean um any harm, but fact is taint a very easy thing for to stake a feller down and make a fire onto his skummuck, and then git all the skin off of him, no holes in it, without hurtin, pertickler if he aint wel. With the appliances of our superior civilize mebbly we might do it, but sabbages has got to work accordeon to their lights and with sech rood insterments as they poces, and natrly they inflick pain."

Then Uncle Ned he thot a long wile, and then he said a other time: "I spose, too, Johnny, it ain't ol to gather greable to a man to giv up to the wandrin Demmicrats of the forst and plain a scalp wich he has ben a tendin and a greasin, and a cobmin of his livelong, even if it didnt hurtim for to hav it took."

But wen I ast Uncle Ned wot did the Injins want with the Orri gone fokeses skins and scallips, and wot for do thay bild kitchen fires onto their bellies, he shuke his had, and he said, Uncle Ned said: "Ive ben thinkn bout that a goodeel my ownself, Johnny, and taint quite clear; praps its jest cos they are Injins."

Then I said mebbe twas cos the Orry gone fokes was wites, and he said: "By golly, Johnny, I bleeve you hav hit it, I doo in deed! Yes, yes, I think that's the troo slution, after all, an Ime a goin for to write to the Guvment this minnit. It will be a big thing for you, my boy, if you hav solv this Injen question wich has flored the statesmen of so many gennirations and is jest worryin the life out of Briggy dear Genl John McCobm and ole Howerd. The President will make you Secerterry of the Exterior, an give you all the mlasses candy wich you can eat, an wen you die I shudent wunder if you wude git a monument as big as the steeple on a hidrollick mine."

Fokes wich lives in Orrygone is web feets cos they got lethers tween their tose like geeses, but they dont lay eggs.

One Sundy wen Mister Pitchel, thats the preacher, was to our hous he was a tellin a bible story bout some body see some angels flyin up in heven, and jest when he tole it Billy he come in, and he thot thay was tockin bout the swallers, so Billy he bust out and said: "Me and Johnny, we looked up the chimby and see one lay a egg."

Wen Franky, thats the baby, was had Billy he was tole that the angils brot him to the hous, wich aint so cos it was Missis Doppy, wich has got the red hed, jest like fire, you never see sech a red hed! So one day Billy he went to my sister, wich was tockin to her yung man in the garden, and he said, Billy did: "Missy, first thing you know there will be a other baby in this family;" and wen Missy had run away for to see if that ole woman at the gate was the milk man her yung man he said: "You impident little duffer, wot do you mean?" Then Billy said them angels had ben round last nite, cos he had see their trax in the mud. But wen we went to look thay was nothin but jest turky trax.

Angels is ol very nice, I spose, and so is Injins, but giants and pirsits is the fellers for me. You ot to see me and Sammy Doppy a playin pirtet. Sammy pots me on a board, and he gets on a other long side, and then he says that Ime a merchen man an he is a pirtet, and he hollers: "Lay 2 an be destroid or Ile send you to the botom, and blo you out of the woter, and skuttle you binnickle, and hang you to the yard-arm, an make you wock the plank, cos Ime Reynard the Red Revenger, an the ship wich crosses my whake gits licked!"

Then Sammy bords me, and gose throo my pockets, and takes my kanife, and my marbils, and my top, and my kite string, and my chock, and my wip lash, and my buckel tung, an evry thing I got. Nex day wen I want um back he says he saild unto Santy Crews and the lawyers arested him and made him restore evry singel thing, and of cors if they are restored I cant git um. But Sammy says when Reynard had his trile and is hung in chains there will be ninety bars of gole for to die vide up amougus his depoziters.

Jack Brily, the sailer, he says that 2 or 3 weeks ago he was on a ship tween bere and Portland, and one evenin there was a long lo black skuner, painted to look like a passenger steamer, ran long side, and a frocius feller on the 4 deck, ol over cutlishes, and pistles, and daggers, hollerd "Ship a hoy," and Jack he hollerd "ship a hoy," too, back. Then the pirsits all cum aboard his ship, arm to their teetths, sech friteflek black lukin fellers he never see! And wen thay was on thay droo their cutlishes, and pistles, and blunderbushes, and bras kanuckles, and slung shots, and brod axes, and made Jack and his mates buy Consolidated Virginny, and Collar, and Sabbidge, and Opher, and Day, and ol the stocks wich was on the list. And then Jack says thay saild a way into the dark, and their feendish gle wrang out over the wottery waste like lafure in a toobm.

Mister Jonnice, wich has got the wooden leg, he blongs to a seerit society wich apes the Ingens, and thats how he come to git the wooden leg, cos his meat leg was broke the night he jined, and it had to be cut of. One day him and Uncle Ned was tockin, and there was a squaw Ingen leadin a little haf-breed poppoos, and Uncle Ned he pinte at it and said: "Wy dont you go and giv that little Incobony the grip, dont you see he is a other member of the Improoved Order of Red Men?"

Speakn of haughf breeds my father says there was a mewl, and it was lent to Bitiop Blank so he cude continue his go, cos his buggy had broke down. The Bitiop he rode the mewl a long time in pious think, but ol of a suden the mewl, wich mebbly was a Methody, it jest kanelt down in the rode with out so much as sayin "Let us pra," and the good Bitiop was flang over its hed in to a slew. Wen he had pull hisself out, furious mad like wet cats, he said: "You inslent commoner, how dare you treat a man that way wich his father was a lord!"

Then the mewl it tost its hed, and spoke rite up, and said: "You never see a feller wich had sech little respect as Ive got for that kind of wanity."

One time wen our fokes was crossin the planes, thats fore my time, and Billy wasent a long neether, nor Bildad, thats the new dog, nor Mose, wich is the cat, the teems had stop for nite, and some Ingens come round for to beg cos thay cudent steel. And one old buck, wich was jest nothin but skin an bones, cos he was so starf to deth, nothin to eat for six weeks, he come a scufflin up to were my mother was clearin a way the dinner things, and pinte to his mouth, and then took of all his close for to sho how his skummuck was cave in. So my mother she giv him some meat wich was lef, and he et it so quick like it had fel down a wel. Then mother she giv him a grate big lofe of bred, but he didnt eat it, jest put it under his horse blanket wich he wore, and said: "Me family man, heap poppooses to home," and stagerd of. Then my mother she said: "Wot a noble sabbidge; wot tutchin divvotion!" But my father he wotched, and that Ingen went behine the whaggens and histed the lofe in to the air, and wen it come down he giv it a kick wich basted it into sody biskits.

ONE OF THE WAYS.

A young man, with eyes of the sort described by a distinguished novelist as "soulful," stood on the threshold of Dr. Austin's front door coaxing the moustache of the future into the light of day.

On one hand was the Doctor's study, redolent of Tanner's Practice and Gray's Anatomy: on the other, the Doctor's daughter, fresh and fair, like the breath of the May day morning—like the beauty of the clustered roses that barred the sunshine.

Ruth Austin was not a beauty. Correct people who gauge good looks by compass and straight-edge spoke of her as "plain"; the less rigid of the school yielding the counterclaim "mentally interesting," for sake of argument. But to Ned Stockton Ruth was beautiful, and "love is enough."

"Mentally interesting" was an ultra tame definition. The young girl had the conversational brilliancy of twenty-six, plus the freshness and minus the simper of sweet sixteen.

"Will you ride?"

"No."

"Shall we take a drive?"

"No."

"Won't you go fishing?"

"No."

"What will you do?"

"Sit here, of course, and study the History of European Morals, while you play at medicine."

"That isn't a fit book for you to read."

"Why? Have you read it?"

"No; I judge by the title."

"You shouldn't judge by the title, neither of men nor of books. It's a shallow way unworthy a doctor."

"Well, then, what am I to do all this morning?"

"Study, of course. I said so I believe. Isn't that what you came here for? It's a good morning for study. At least, I think I should find it so if I were given the chance."

Ned turned into the office, took up a volume, and settled down to good, honest plodding. And that mysterious but unerring premonition which announced lunch hour in advance of the bell recalled the soulful Edward to his sense of hunger with something like a shock of regret.

At lunch Ruth was gracious.

"You have been a good boy all the morning; we will ride toward —, and meet the folks if you like," she said.

"Guess I'll study," said Ned.

"I guess you will do nothing of the sort. I want Tom Cobb, remember."

At two, this badly introduced couple were winding Sorrel Lane at a canter.

Ned's horsemanship was little short of perfect, and his Black Maggie had enough mustang blood in her veins to lend a spice of viciousness to her elastic gayety.

A rabbit jumps up from the roadside.

"Ah," says Ned, "a chase."

Ruth's answer is to Tom Cobb a cut of the tingling whalebone. It is uncalled for and unwise, the great roan gelding has put forty yards of daylight between himself and the black mare, before she or her rider knows what's up, and see, he has the bit in his teeth!

"Blue blazes," snaps Ned, "he's running away."

Running away he was, in the terrible, businesslike style of which only the thoroughbred is capable. For a rod or more Ruth tugged at the snaffle, but the old boy shook his splendid head and minded not. She ceased pulling, and keeping his head well up, braced herself for a run. The odds lie with the gelding, the feather-weight he carries, the start he has, and the slightly rising ground are all in his favor. If only Dodson's gate be open.

One, two, three miles of winding lane and hardly any change in their relative positions. Neither rider has said a word. Ruth has not even looked back. The gelding's stride has not perceptibly slackened, but the pace is evidently telling on him.

Black Maggie is good for thrice the distance.

Ned detects the gelding's sudden wheeze and touches the mare with his spurred heel for the first time. But ah! as they round that last turn this side of Dodson's, and the road narrows and straightens, the gate is shut!

The black mare feels the spur and quickens her stride—nearer, nearer, nearer, they are almost side by side. Ned leans forward in his saddle to grasp the gelding's bridle, when with a sudden swerve the mare flashes ahead, and before he can even turn his wrist they are upon the gate. It is a low affair, and the horses rise to take it almost by instinct, for even to Ned it is a queer first sensation. They never knew how it happened, but the mare's hind foot caught, and she fell; the gelding was just as clumsy, and both horses, pitching their riders over their heads, rolled in the dust. Ned was on his feet in an instant, and in another his strong arms were around the dizzy Ruth, and he was carrying her toward screaming little Mrs. Dodson, who palpitated in the doorway.

"Let me walk, Ned, please," said Ruth, after a wriggling half-moment of quiescence.

But Ned marched on, unheeding, and made his royal entry into the Dodson kitchen through a barricade of hysterical mother and gaping, big-eyed little ones. He put her in a large rocking-chair, as if she had been a baby, and added to Mrs. Dodson's fright by calling for "water, and arnica, and whisky, quick!"

"O, no, Mrs. Dodson, I'm all right; really, I'm not hurt, not a bit. Don't cry and look so frightened, or I shall cry, too. We came to see little Dave, and were in a hurry, that's all."

And Ruth captured the saucer-eyed David and kissed him. So Mrs. Dodson dried her eyes, and Ned went to see about the horses.

Tom Cobb, having had his fun and learned his lesson, was easily caught, and Ned drove Black Maggie limping into a corner and caught her too. The mare's only injury was a strain of her off hind leg; the gelding wasn't hurt in the least, and a little dusting was all that the riders needed, and so they mounted and rode home, after having mutually kissed the Dodson fledglings, from the heir-apparent, aged six, down to baby Nora—"seven months, two weeks and four days, sir."

"What a brute you are, Tom Cobb, to run away with a lady," said Ned.

"What a goose you are, Ruth Austin, to whip him," said the Doctor's daughter. "I should think you might have caught him, though," she added, "you are so positive that black vixen is the 'fastest thing in the valley.'"

The young man's "soulful" eyes grew even more soulful, his earnest tones swelled to deeper earnestness:

"I should like to ride by your side always, dear Ruth, to protect you from every danger, to share your pleasures, perhaps—to share your sorrows, certainly; I would work hard, Ruth, to try and deserve you."

"That sounds like a Sunday-school hero's wooing, Ned. I ought to make sport of your serious, silly face, but I won't. I, too, think it would be nice to ride together always, Ned, only I want to be sure you have the better horse"—and she laughed softly above her blushes.

Was it the mare's strained tendon that made their homeward pace so laggard? Why did the dusk creep up to the Doctor's door before them? I do not know, but I remember the comment of a philosophic juvenile friend of mine, who watched them pass along Sorrel Lane, which was: "I said to myself, them fellars don't care if school are late or not." And that is about what Dr. Austin said when he examined Ned in "Therapeutics" that evening.

De votre vie aussi la page est blanche encore,

Je voudrais la remplir d'un seul mot, le bonheur.

Le livre de la vie est un livre suprême

Que l'on ne peut ouvrir ni fermer à son choix,

Où le feuillet fatal se tourne de lui-même,

Le passage adoré ne s'y lit qu'une fois.

On voudrait s'arrêter à la page où l'on aime.

Et la page où l'on meurt est déjà sous les doigts.

Ever since the death of Ralston the Bulletin and Call have been waging a war against the Spring Valley Water Works Co. It is a part of San Francisco journalism to have something to war against. It is ever couching its barbed bloody lance against something. It is a veritable Don Quixote. Now it is some harmless flock of sheep that arouses its chivalrous ire, and anon it is a windmill whose arms are, by its diseased imagination, distorted to assume giant forms. The press of San Francisco is, like Don Quixote, the self-appointed knight-errant of chivalry charged with clearing the land of all abuses. Its Dulcinea, whose peerless virtues it is ever ready to proclaim, is its own virtue, disinterestedness, and purity—as entirely imaginative as was the lady to whom the Knight of la Mancha had pledged his life and consecrated his chivalrous actions. The Call and Bulletin are knight and squire—which rides the Rozinante and which the ass we leave our readers to choose. The Bulletin has been destroying dragons, killing giants, and delivering the people from enchantments so long, that it would seem to have no occupation if it could not conjure up some fearful ghost to combat. The phantoms it has fought, the plots it has defeated, and the conspiracies it has exposed, are something truly wonderful. There has been—in the imagination of its proprietors—some horrible mine hidden beneath us for the past twenty years; some dreadful Guy Fawkes has been sitting by it, match in hand, to blow us to eternal smash. As we first remember, "Palmer, Cook & Co.," bankers, were the death's head and bloody bones. The "city front extension," the "bulkhead," the "Peter Smith titles," "Levi Parsons," "Mayor Garrison," "Hiram Pearson," "outside lands," "Broderick," the "early Republicans," the railroads, "Stanford & Co.," "Goat Island," the "Board of Supervisors," officials generally, and politicians without exception, are only a fractional part of the horrible forms that have been conjured up to affright our souls and continue our subscriptions. We have heard this cry of "wolf, wolf," so long that we are impatient to be eaten. We had rather be blown up and done with it, than to longer sit shivering with fear upon the municipal powder keg. We think we see the end of this long jeremiad. We are hopeful that the Pandora's box of evils is now nearly exhausted. The Bulletin and Call begin to show signs of weariness; the Spring Valley Water Company seems to be the last note of this long, doleful wail of lugubrious mournful prophecy of evil. Ever since Ralston's death the tune has been played upon this one string. The railroad has made its peace, and Stanford & Co. have lain down with the lamb. Indignation has cooled off against the ice company. The gas monopoly finds, in these twin relics of journalism, resolute defenders. The slaughter-house and beef monopoly of Lux, Miller & Dunphy is looked upon as a legitimate business. Everything is serene and lovely, except the Spring Valley Water Company. It is the only surviving monster with which the Bulletin-Call has not made peace. Of all the questions that have ever disturbed the popular mind, this seems to us to be the easiest of solution. There is one, and only one, honest way for San Francisco to acquire this water property, and that is by purchase. There is only one honest rule to measure its value, and that is to estimate its worth by its revenue. The claim of authority to fix its rates is the claim of the highwayman and the road agent. To say that it should be sold for what it cost is to establish a false rule. It may be too much or too little. The land upon which the Palace Hotel is erected once sold for sixteen dollars. The structure cost by a million of dollars more than it is now worth. The Call was once purchased for ten thousand dollars. If San Francisco needed it for a municipal organ, and should proceed to condemn it for that amount and interest, it would be criminal, because the Call is now worth $200,000. If the water company has increased in value because of an increase in population, so has the Call; and if the company has been watered, so has that of the Call. The water company property is as absolutely the property of its stockholders as are the private accumulations of any individual. The elements of time, increase of population, and enlarged demand, which have given value to its stock, are the same elements that have contributed to the value of the San Francisco Call and all other property. To endeavor to condemn this property for less than it is worth to its owners, or to secure its waters for less than a remunerative price, is absolute dishonesty, and would be a disgraceful policy for any municipal government to adopt. Because politicians would extravagantly administer water works, is no excuse for stealing them. Because our seasons are dry and this peninsular system is the only one available, furnishes us no pretext for a dishonest condemnation. There are two honest ways out of the water dilemma. One is to purchase the works at an honest valuation. The other is to agree upon remunerative rates, and so legislate that consumers shall pay a just proportion of the tax, and devolve the balance upon the city treasury as one of the general burdens of government. To tax the householder with stable, garden, lawn, and bath tub, with the water to sprinkle streets, flush sewers, adorn parks, supply public buildings, and guard against conflagrations, and to except from this burden the Hibernia Bank, Michael Reese, and the Nevada Block, is a manifest injustice. Seventeen thousand consumers are paying water taxes that should be divided equally among 300,000 people, and be equally distributed to $300,000,000 of taxable wealth. When the Bulletin and Call realize the fact that Ralston is dead, and that the owners of Spring Valley water stock have the same rights as other individuals—as they have themselves to their own property—they will write more rationally upon the water question, and cease to longer ride it as a political hobby.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

IN CAMP ON CLOUD RIVER.

The Pit River heads at Goose Lake, in the northeast corner of California, and not far from the Oregon line. It is margined for many miles by broad meadow lands, producing nutritious grasses, and affording abundant pasturage for stock. The Cloud River rises at the foot of Shasta, and of all our northern streams is the one of coolest, purest water. The Sacramento bursts from a spring among the foot-hills of Mount Shasta, and is at once a strong, rapid mountain stream. The Cloud River empties into the Pit, and the Pit into the Sacramento. The Pit is the largest of the upper Sacramento branches, the longest, and ought by right to bear the name "Sacramento" to its source. Along the upper Pit and its many tributaries there is a magnificent grazing country, hundreds of miles in extent, sparsely populated, government land, unoccupied, and open to preëmption, homestead, and settlement. The land is rich, and under cultivation will produce vegetables, grain, and all the hardier fruits. The climate is not as severe as that of New England, New York, or the Western States. The snow is not deep in winter, and does not linger as late in the spring as it does in the Eastern country named. Outside of these meadows and the beautiful valleys that margin the streams, the country is densely wooded with pine, cedar, and spruce. All through the northern counties, embracing Shasta, Trinity, Siskiyou, Humboldt, Modoc, and Lassen, there are valleys, some larger and some smaller, many of them entirely unoccupied, where homes may be obtained without cost or the expenditure of any other capital than that of labor. There are level lands bordering the streams, the timber growing upon them indicating a rich soil. The waters abound in fish; the hills abound in game. During the season all along the upper Sacramento and beyond Shasta the streams that empty into the ocean are filled with salmon. The expert with rod and line can catch a barrel of salmon a day from the Cloud River; with a seine there is no limit to the possibilities of a salmon catch. The diligent hunter need not content himself with a single buck in a morning's hunt. The law now and for four years protects the doe and fawn; by the end of that time the hills will be swarming with antlered game. Grouse is common, but not over-abundant. Quail are plentiful. The jackass rabbit and the gray squirrel are more than plentiful. The hills are sometimes abrupt and sometimes stretch away in gentle slopes, bearing evidence of their strength and depth of soil in the splendid forests that climb to their very peaks. All these hill and mountain sides are watered with streams, rivulets, and springs, so that irrigation is cheap and practicable. The rainfall, as indicated by the exuberant and almost tropical vegetation, is abundant. If these mountains were Alps or Apennines they would be cultivated to their summits, and the region be thronged with a hardy and industrious population. It is in such mountain fastnesses that religion and liberty have made their grandest struggles. And yet this splendid reach of mountain and meadow, this broad breadth of hill and valley, these margins of splendid rivers, this great wealth of land and water, of wood and soil, lie almost unoccupied and almost undiscovered. Here and there, scattered through the wide domain, is the hut of the hunter or herdsman, and along the highways and centres of travel the more comfortable cottage of the farmer and home of the innkeeper. There are homes and farms here in our northern counties for a million of families. There is affluence, plenty, and abundance, grain, fruit, and vegetables, comfort, ease, and independence, awaiting the industrious toiler. Our fathers, half a century ago, would yoke their cattle, cover their wagons with cotton canvas, load them with wife, children, hams, bacon, maple sugar, take axes, guns, and dogs, plunge out into the wilderness, and by their labor carve out for themselves homes, lay broad and deep the foundation of States, build up civilization around them, and from barbarism create society. Our sons and our foreign immigrants in these degenerate days have no nerve for this pioneer work, no muscle to swing the ax, no courage to confront the forest, no daring to brave the dangers, and no patience to endure the hardships of a life of adventurous toil. Our boys are milk-sops—educated, nerveless, cowardly, hangers-on upon their mothers' apron-strings, petted, fondled, foolish, ruined darlings—who expect to live upon their fathers' earnings. They would be lawyers, doctors, politicians, adventurers, gamblers, thieves, anything but honest workingmen. Our girls are a worthless set—becoming each year more worthless—and it is not their fault. We are educating them to become wives of rich men, playthings and ornaments of luxurious homes; and if they fail, and we fail, then God help them. Society is strewn with the wrecks, and the tempest has just begun. In another generation or two the American-born will, be a pitiable, helpless thing. The sons of our sons, and the daughters of our daughters, will become objects of sympathy. If our nation has ever a peasantry, it will be from the American stock. The intellectual and over-educated can not conquer in the struggle against numbers and brute force. Our immigrant population no longer goes out to the hills and mountains, but throngs the cities; prefers to live in squalid pauperism, in sickly tenement houses, to be hungry, ill clad, ignorant, and dirty, than to carve out a country home by toil. The Catholic Church, the whisky deadfall, the lager saloon with its sawdust floor, has attractions greater than God's pine cathedrals, his flowing streams, his flower-clad meadows. The trouble is (and these remarks are intended only to apply to California), Bob Ingersoll is right. The climate enervates; life is too easy, and the new generation and the new immigration won't work. Our boys and girls prefer the opera and the theatre. Our immigrants prefer to grumble at the sand-lots, to riot, to prate of the oppressions of the poor man, to envy the rich, and denounce the fortunate, forgetting that those whom they now threaten to despoil of their fortunes have gained them by toilsome labor and bold adventure, from which their timid souls shrink. One question now challenging our attention in California is, who is to do the work? The son of the hod-carrier no longer carries the hod; the daughter of the washerwoman no longer washes; the son of the mechanic no longer succeeds to his father's trade; the daughter of the industrious mother no longer toils. Girls and boys are rarely apprenticed to a trade; boys of American parents no longer run away that they may go to sea. Not three per cent. of the American merchant marine are American-born. Our work-shops and factories are filled with foreigners. Our farmers' boys all come to the city; anything is better than farm labor. Servant-girls are insolent, idle, and will not go beyond the sound of the church-bell for wages. And when we ask what is the remedy for this condition of things, the preacher answers, "more piety," and the school-master, "more learning." Latin, Greek, German, and French, calisthenics, mental philosophy, and natural history, and music, drawing, rhetoric, and word-analysis, is suggested by the Dutch school-master from Berlin and the Yankee pedagogue from Boston, as the panacea for this disease that is destroying our young people, debauching our foreign population, and threatening the very life of society, civilization, and government. We are quite conscious that we are indulging the luxury of diagnosing the disease without suggesting a remedy. We think of no practical way to induce the over-crowding population of our cities to go out to the country. We know of no way of making the idle work. We would, however, modestly suggest to the statesmen of this coast the propriety of spending less money in the direction of education. We would also suggest, as an inducement to country life, that it be made attractive; and in this direction why not, at the expense of the State treasury, build Catholic churches, German Turn Halls, erect theatres and opera houses, in all the principal villages of the State; establish breweries and distilleries in all the counties, and open lager beer saloons and whisky mills in all the townships; give every idle Irishman and German, and every worthless American, a farm; let it be worked by Chinamen at the expense of the State, and thus, by making the country attractive and labor easy, we might induce the vicious, worthless rabble of the sand-lots to do us the favor of remaining in the State? There is one other way out of this difficulty, and that is for everybody to go to work, and not feel that they are demeaned by honest toil; for every son and daughter of American parents should recognize the fact that a life of honest labor is more manly and respectable than one of humiliating dependence. There is occupation upon this coast for all, opportunity for all, room and labor for all, remunerative compensation for all. All that is demanded to secure ease, plenty, and independence, is for the laboring poor to push out into the country and go to work.

PRATTLE.

Livingston, the Crow Creek Indian Agent, whose immatchable thieving drove to suicide not only the sensitive accomplices whom he excelled but the savages whom he starved, is described as an Episcopalian in good standing who had the pious habit of giving to chapels such "testimonials" as stained windows. It is to be hoped these various windows may be all collected in a memorial chapel dedicated to St. Mammon, with an officiating priesthood of American statesmen supported by the Government. It should be erected over the mouth of the Mammoth Cave, which it is believed would serve as a sufficiently roomy crypt for the burial of such eminent official thieves as have given imperishable lustre to the annals and institutions of this country. In the "dim, religious light" of this monumental edifice there should be continual prayer for the "active participation" of clean-hearted gentlemen in the political affairs of a nation in which they form the one-onehundredth part of the voting population.

The treaty of Berlin assures the independence of Montenegro, forbidding her at the same time to have a navy and a flag. Montenegro should be the happiest of nations—independence without a Fourth of July, politics without a Robeson, poetry without a Drake!

Kearny explains that he goes East "to set the working-men thinking."

O Denis, Denis, you are mad!
What is it you would do?
The more they're taught to think, my lad,
The less they'll think of you.

It is rumored in newspaper circles that the Call's obituary poet is to have his pay raised to ten dollars a week, and will be immediately laid on in the "Produce Arrivals" department, in which the announcements of importers who can afford to pay will be made alluring, somewhat as follows:

"JOHN SMITH & Co.—335 sks. New Potatoes.
"Dearest tubers, you've arriuen,
On your substance we will meal;
You to us, by G—, are given,
You for us the cook will peel.
Eat, 19."

This, the bard's maiden attempt in his new "sphere," is under consideration by the editor, who regards it as ambiguous; he being unable to determine whether the third line of the poetry is gratefully reverent or shockingly profane. Nor from the fourth does it appear with sufficient clearness whether the cook is to peel the potatoes or the potatoes are to peel the cook. The concluding word (with appended numerals) seems to be either descriptive or mandatory, according as it may happen to be bad Latin or good English. If there is anything more impenetrable to the Pickeringian understanding than Latin it is English.

Here is another and rather better sample of the work of the commercial muse, the lines having received unreserved editorial approval:

"ROBINSON & BROWN—400 doz. ears Green Corn.
"Open wider the pearly gates,
That lead to the stomach's floor;
The cobs will suffer in passing through,
But their sufferings can be bore.
Going to join the Lima beans."

"If the jurisdiction of the Justices' Court is materially enlarged," says a morning journal, "a higher standard of qualification should be required for candidates." Certainly; instead of knowing but one "working politician" they should be required to know two.

We are to have great things in photography. Mr. Murybridge photographs the whirling wheels of a sulky so instantaneously that the spokes are sharply defined: they have not perceptibly moved during the operation. He shows us the flying horse, clear, distinct, its feet all in the air. It is wonderful, it promises. Shall we not have, O brethren, faithful pictures of faithful women—of "Madge, and Lou, and Bella, too," as they looked while true to us? Ah! the devil! it requires electric light, and how shall it shine in the superior radiance of a flash of constancy?

A hat-rack sneak thief whom necessity has compelled to accept an engagement as a reporter on the Chronicle gives an elaborate description of the inside of a private dwelling, and boasts of his enterprise in obtaining admission against the wishes of the owner, a lady recently widowed. It would be useless to tell this fellow he is a blackguard, for that he already knows; equally futile to ask him not to be, for he likes to be. It is impossible to disclose his name until it is disclosed to me, and would then be unadvisable for he would call it fame, consider me his benefactor, and enjoy the satisfaction of ingratitude. Blackguards are society's dead, of whom we speak no evil because they do not mind it.

"Rutherford," said Mrs. Hayes, looking across a pile of official documents to where her consort sat knitting in the chimney corner, "is it true that our son Webb is going to marry that Ohio girl?" "I—I—believe so—that is, if you are willing," was the propitiating reply. "I do not know that it will affect me; I am not the President of a party, particularly a wedding party. The question is, can you, with your inexperience in the direction of affairs, afford to assume the responsibility of a mother-in-law?"

The popular negro melody, "The Old Folks at Home," was written by a brother of Mr. Jo. Murphy, the no actor. This interesting statement is made on the authority of the latter gentleman, who has not, however, pointed out the numerous, albeit unimportant, verbal changes the great work has undergone since it left the fraternal hand, as, for example, in the lines:

"One little hut among the bushes—
One that I love—
Still fondly to my mem'ry rushes,
No matter where I rove."

As originally written these lines were far finer. They read thus:

"In me mimicry green is the lovely shabeen
In the bog that's beneath the hill,
Where I shmaeked me dudheen, and drank me potecn
From Larry O'Faherty's shill.
And me eye-wathers flow as me brother Jo
Is perfermin' his barn-door jig,
Wid his illigant grace and intilligent face
Recallin' me father's pig."

I am sorry to observe that Mr. Lynch, of this city, a gentleman aged sixty-three, has committed the happily not very common error of killing his wife, with whom he had lived for forty years, but whom he must, of course, henceforth live without. Mrs. Lynch's offense consisted in declining to drink a glass of beer when requested; perhaps it would be more accurate to say refusing when commanded. For this the husband deemed it expedient to cut her fatally in the abdomen, though few will agree with him that such a course was either necessary or humane. On the other hand, if the beer was good there is no obvious reason why the lady should have refused it. It is to be hoped a sample has been preserved for the use of the jury.

It is a matter of taste, and even the most exacting criticism must allow something for the sentimentality inseparable from such occasions, but in a purely artistic sense Mr. O'Connell's farewell verses to Mr. Edwards would have been better without the "dears" and the "Harrys." If it is true, as Mr. O'Connell says, that "the love of man for man" is a greater blessing than "the cooling mist that freshens all the glade" (and I do not doubt that it is true), still, that is not the way it is preferably expressed. That method is rather unpleasantly suggestive of the love of gent for gent.

It has been warm beyond the mountains—the Southerner larded the lean earth with his fragrant fats and oils; the Easterner navigated his own perspiration, occasionally endeavoring to effect a landing to bury his melted neighbor in a rat-hole. In St. Louis twenty perished in a single day. This is gratifying. It accentuates the advantages of "the finest climate in the world, sir"—our climate. On Saturday last Sacramento simmered at 94 degrees; Calistoga gently stewed at 96; Chico was crisp at 98; Marysville broiled at 99; Woodland was grilled at 108; and at 110, Davisville, Rocklin, and Sheridan were done to a delicate and appetizing brown. There were no deaths; Californians do not die from heat. They are accustomed to it. Still there were many who feared the weather might take a turn and be fatally hot. They had not lived as piously as they ought. They made ready their blankets.

The efforts of the Widow Van Cott to snatch the San Francisco sinner like a brand from the burning seem to have commanded but indifferent success. To-morrow will be the last day of her mission, and the harvest of immortal souls is still unreaped, and the Adversary knocketh together his header for the garnering thereof.

O, Widow Van Cott, though your zeal is too hot
To measure with any pyrometer,
It is wasting its blaze in attempting to raise
Our spiritual thermometer.
If 'twere orthodox
It would send up stocks.

Ah! those ambitious, war-loving, bloodthirsty despots of Europe, what is it they would be at with their expensive Congress, their long subtle machinations, their tedious "mediation," and "mutual concessions?" What is this so-called "Treaty of Peace." Do they think they can throw dust in the eyes of "forty millions of American freemen?"—do they? All this trouble and worry to save the "down-trodden masses" from the "horrors of war?" Bah! it is not credible. It is not of the nature of "tottering despotisms" to mean mischief and murder? Are we to suppose that "effete monarchies" are grown averse to shedding blood and not wiping it up? Shall not trembling tyrants ("Thy banner-r-r-rs make tyranny ter-remble"—sing) practice its immemorial prank upon "pop'lar liberty" as heretofore? Suffer not, Columbia, thine eyes to be obscured by pulled wool, but with hand on sword be thou vigilant to compel the peace of Europe. Meanwhile, O daughter of the gods, it is to be remarked that you are doing your evil best to provoke a war for territorial aggrandizement with the "Sister Republic."

If some one will kindly ascertain who is Mr. Ben. Butler's political agent on this coast, and quietly brain, eviscerate, or otherwise admonish him, he will "do the State some service." Kearney openly favors the Butler person for President, and goes East to arrange the terms for his support. The Post publishes with paraded approval the mischievous fellow's old speeches on the Chinese-must-go question. The Call in its characteristically sneaking manner hides away in its editorial columns (for future display to prove that it has been right from the start) a commendatory article on his grave opinion that no man who works for the Presidency can get it—a dictum that from him has the temperature and quality of a sigh uttered across a dish of ice-cream with a brass spoon in it.

Col. Jackson, of the Post, has imported a poet, one Col. Richard Realf, "whose already achieved and honorable reputation," says the consignee, "entitles him to a hearty welcome in this State." Turning to his work—"a charming poem," Col. Jackson says—my eyes light upon these two lines:

"In the concert halls, where the lyric air
In palpitant billows swims and swoons."

It is enough; I welcome the warrior-critic's warrior-poet to a seat amongst the local bards. Make room there, you vagabonds. Mah'ny, shtop twirlin' that shillaly; ye'll be hittin' the gentleman's nose. Dam, you Dam, uncross your legs, sir, this minute; and you, Captain Stuart, stop inflating, and turn your edge to the front. There, Colonel, squeeze in—somewhere. No kissing Theresa.

A colored witness before the Branch Potter Committee at New Orleans justified his perjury on a former occasion by explaining that he did not kiss the Bible. How does he know? The good book may have been lying around on his lip somewhere all the time he was testifying.

There are seventy-two postmistresses in this country, and what they don't know about the relations between the men and women who seal their letters to one another with ingenious care could be painted in Roman capitals on a dog-fight without compromising any lady in the land.

"Them Christians"—dear disinterested souls—are urging Lord Beaconsfield to wrest the Holy Land from the grasp of Islam. No, no; the time is gone by. The Crusader sovereigns were right enough; they wanted the Holy Land, and offered payment in the lives of their subjects—like the grand gentlemen and kings that they were. Their rascally following of knights and knaves were better dead than alive, and the expense of getting them off their hands these provident princes defrayed by plundering their allies. But the Holy Land now would cost money, good, hard, useful money—and no lives. The thought is revolting.

Of the late Col. Lawrence, journalist and patron of genius, Mr. Pickering avers that he "brought out" that luminous humorist and delectable lecturer, Mr. Prentice Mulford.

When Lawrence cried: "I've brought great Mulford out,"
And set him 'fore the people to beguile 'em,
They said: "On corpus habebis, no doubt,"
Then—when they'd heard him: "Pray from what asylum?"

"Missis isn't to home, sir," said the carefully instructed parlor-maid to the pastor when he called. "My child," said the good man sadly, having in mind the divine ordinance, "do you know what it is that people who tell falsehoods do not keep?" "No hired girl," was the sententious answer.

Really the press is a great convenience. There is not a daily paper in the city but has informed its readers that those evicted cyprians have resumed business in — Street.

"The Russians must go."—Mohemet Ali. "Ah! but the English must come."—Caratheodora. "Everything comes to him who waits."—Andrassy. "See what a just division: Turkey gets as much as any of them."—Bismarck. "The war was undertaken to ameliorate the condition of Christian peoples; look at England and say if we have not succeeded."—Gortschakoff. "La Belle France emerges with glory undimmed."—Waddington. "There seemed less hazard in establishing a Turkish protectorate after than before the war."—Beaconsfield.

There is considerable appreciation of "the problem" in this item from an Eastern journal: "A California law forbids the purchase of bricks made by Chinamen for public buildings, although they are much cheaper than others; but the contractors get all the benefit intended for white laborers, for they slyly buy the Chinamen's bricks."

New York has a Society, and is to have an Institute, for the preservation of the Irish language. This is the first evidence that the Americanized Irishman means to hold his tongue.

LAURA.

A True Story of the Sierra.

Lottie Sylvester was leaning over the low gate, looking down the road. The round moon, just rising beyond the tall, dark stems of the pines, touched her brown rippling hair with silver light, and threw her gray eyes deeper into shadow beneath their long-lashed lids. She had a pure, white face, not remarkably pretty, but very fair to look upon. She was leaning in an attitude of expectation, which displayed a graceful, finely developed form. Just now there was a shadow upon the broad, low brow, from which the hair was swept away and gathered into a coil behind, and her firm mouth had an undeniable poise as she exclaimed to herself:

"It's time Theodore was here. I don't believe he cares how long he keeps me waiting, or whether he comes or not. I wonder if that isn't his step? I won't go to meet him. I'll wait till he gets to the gate to-night."

The man whom she had termed "Theodore" sauntered up to the gate in an easy fashion peculiarly his own, and remarked carelessly:

"Good evening, Lottie."

His evident indifference stung the girl, for she answered coldly, "Good evening." He laughed:

"Why didn't you say 'Good evening, Mr. Russell?' Then I should have had no difficulty in determining your mood to-night."

"It seems you had none anyway," she answered, shortly.

He put a white hand over one of hers which lay on the gate-post, and noted the involuntary quiver it gave at contact with his own.

"We have no time to quarrel to-night, Lottie. I am going away to-morrow," pausing to notice the effect of his words. Lottie turned a startled face toward him and exclaimed:

"Going away to-morrow, Theodore! Where?"

"Down to the Bay City, my dear, for a vacation. Run into the house and get your shawl, and come for a walk with me. I want to talk with you before I go."

She turned away and went into the house. This man whom she left standing there by the gate, the district school-teacher with his blonde moustache, blue eyes, and handsome face, with his indescribable air as of one who had seen much of the world and was tired of it, was not the man whom Laura Sylvester ought to have loved. If she had an innate perception of the truth of this fact, she crushed it out of her heart through loyalty to him. Her life in the wild Sierra was one everlasting monotony, and the arrival of Theodore Russell furnished an element hitherto lacking, viz: diversion. Loyalty was a predominant trait of Lottie's character; a misanthrope might have called it obstinacy. She had heard vague rumors that he had been seen on the stage of a theatre in this same city of San Francisco whither he was now bound; moreover, that his divine qualities as a dancer on the floor of a ball-room where Lottie first met him were due to that fact; then he had been known to gamble to a small extent in the town of Montezuma, near which Lottie resided; also, it was pretty well known that he had been seen under the influence of liquor once since teaching school there; all of which Lottie styled base fabrications and clung to her idol closer than ever, well knowing there were others of her sex ready to tear him from her arms, and attributed the rumors mainly to that knowledge. More than all else, she dreaded the blank monotony of her life if she shut out the only adventure which had come within its limits thus far.

She came back to the gate wrapped in a scarlet shawl, one corner of it thrown over her dark hair. She took his arm in silence and they strolled down the road together. She broke the silence first with the hesitant question:

"Why must you leave here, Theodore?"

"To tell you the truth," said he, lightly, "I am most deucedly tired of teaching brats all day and I'm pining for a change. Haven't you noticed my decrease in size lately?" The tears rose to Lottie's eyes, but she made no answer. He looked down at the fair face in the moonlight, so close to his shoulder, attentively for a moment, and then asked half-tenderly:

"Do you care, Lottie? Shall you miss me very much?"

You see that the shallow nature of this man could draw no response from the depth of Laura's earnest one; that at his triumph in securing her love he was tempted to be cruel; that, in fact, he was very little in love with her himself, but since it was a novelty to ruin a pure woman's heart, he made pretense of being pure. So when the girl lifting her large gray eyes answered with a sigh, "You know I can, Theodore," he put his arm around her and drew her close to him, laying his lips against her forehead for an instant. That Laura was young you may have imagined. It was not that altogether which made her so innocent and confiding, so truthful and tender. She had been reared in these mountains among the mines, since she was a child, by a careful, scholarly, quiet father, for whom she was a housekeeper, and of whom she was the willful idol. It is a curious fact that one's nearest and dearest of kin are sometimes blind to what is in progress under their noses, and it proved to be so in this case, for Laura's studious father was strangely obtuse to the tragedy enacted almost in his presence.

"Lottie," said Russell, with evident sincerity, "you are my good angel. If I am ever tempted to go astray on a thought of you I will hold me back. Come, dear, you oak tree is our trusting place, and I have not run much longer to stay. I must be off early to-morrow. It will be hard to say good-bye, won't it, little girl?"

Lottie suddenly noticed the omission of any allusion to the time of his return. Did he not then intend to come back at all? Was his tender flattery a prelude to his final farewell? The thought startled her into a sudden exclamation:

"Theodore, are you never coming back?"

He gave a slight but unmistakable start, which sent a chill to Lottie's heart. But he answered almost immediately with a surprised air:

"Why whatever put that into your head, Lottie? Not come back when my term is not half out! I wish, indeed, that you and I were going away never to come back. I should not care if you were with me, dear," he said, with his arm around her shoulder.

It is curious how a man who will commit a crime will hesitate to tell an outright lie. He will put a direct question off with ingenious evasions rather than answer by a convincing yes or no, even though the concealed purpose be steeped in sin's dye. Lottie was reassured.

"It will be hard to say good-bye," she murmured, more to herself than to him. They heard the whirr of wheels coming down the road, and Lottie drew back. Russell's arm and took her station by his side. The moonlight falling through the leaves of the oak beneath which they stood flecked Lottie's scarlet shawl and Russell's light coat. The tree stood at one side of the road and they waited for the carriage to pass. It was a light buggy containing two men, one of whom, catching sight of the couple under the tree, drew up the horses with a jerk, and handing the reins to his companion, jumped out and approached them. Russell drew back into deeper shadow as the stranger paused, asking in a fine, commanding voice:

"Russel, is that you?"

Russel did not answer, but Lottie said with a vague alarm in her tones:

"Yes, Mr. Russel is here."

"Then, Russel, I want to see you a minute. I have business with you."

Russel came forward slowly to Lottie's side.

"I am engaged, Gerome. Some other time—wait till I get back to town—won't you?"

There was an abjectness in Russel's manner that annoyed the stately Laura. She hated the suspicion of cowardice in any one. She whispered him sharply:

"What does he want, Theodore? Why don't you say at once you must go, and have done with it?"

Gerome's keen ears caught the defiant whisper, for he turned toward Lottie and said gravely:

"He must come now, Miss Sylvester. It is very important."

"But I tell you I'm engaged, Gerome. What do you want with me?" asked Russel, impatiently.

"I had rather not speak before this lady, unless you compel me to. Will you come quickly, or shall I call my companion?"

Even in the shadow Laura could see Russel's face blanch. A terrible fear had taken possession of him, for he gasped hoarsely:

"I'll go; but, for God's sake, don't make any fuss about it. Lottie, I must go. No, no—don't ask me what's the matter! I—I can't tell you."

He shook her clinging hand off his arm and strode out in the moonlight toward the buggy. Gerome followed him, and said a few words to his companion while untying a horse, ready saddled, which stood behind the buggy.

"I'll follow you up directly," he said, as Russel sat down beside the other occupant of the buggy, who turned the horses and prepared to retrace their steps. Then Russel was driven away, without casting one backward glance at the girl standing in the moonlight, whom Gerome now approached, leading his horse by the halter.

"Miss Sylvester," he said, gently, looking down at her white face, "if you will permit me I will see you safely up the road to your father's gate."

Laura moved onward as if in a dream. Gerome, man of experience though he was, began to feel a little uncomfortable at this conduct. He would even have preferred the explanations he had been afraid would be asked. It was not too late for that yet, it would seem, for Laura turned toward him, lifting her long-lashed lids and looking direct at him with an intense concentration of force, and said in a voice of controlled power and resolution:

"Will you be good enough to tell me the meaning of the singular scene I have just witnessed?"

Derrick Gerome could not look into the clear eyes of the girl by his side and tell her the truth. He groaned in spirit and temporized with her; anything to gain time. Yet he was a brave man, as Laura knew, for she had heard of him before that night. After a little he answered:

"It may not be hardly fair to tell you yet. Pray, don't ask it. I would rather you should not know from me."

I have said Laura was what might be termed obstinate. She stopped by the roadside, and Gerome stopped, also, with a "now or never" feeling in his mind. She said to him, calmly, deliberately, every word falling into the night silence with startling distinctness:

"Mr. Gerome, if you would spare me the pain of finding Mr. Russel to-night and learning from his own lips the cause of his sudden departure, you will tell me the nature of your business with him."

"On my soul, she will do that thing if I don't tell her," thought Gerome.

He stood with bent head before her, that he might not see her face, and said:

"Theodore Russel is a forger. He has forged the names of his school trustees to a note for five hundred dollars, and presented it at the bank for payment yesterday. He intended to leave this place to-morrow morning, and I was compelled to arrest him to-night. That was my business with him, and the meaning of the scene you have been so unfortunate as to witness."

To Gerome's relief, Laura did not utter any exclamation, nor did she faint away. This chivalrous sheriff would have spared her the knowledge, if possible, of her lover's crime. She said not another word, however, but walked on swiftly till she reached the gate. She turned a frozen face to him then, and said briefly:

"Good-night."

"Good-night, and God be with you!" was his earnest reply.

Then he sprang into his saddle, lifted his hat to her, and galloped up the road, leaving a light trail of dust behind him in the moonlight. The girl leaning over the gate was a very different girl from the one who stood there half an hour before. Her large eyes were brimful of despair and defiance. As the recollection of the things he had said to her that evening rose up before her, she clenched her hands in sudden detestation of herself for being the dupe of such a man as Theodore Russel.

"He said he was going away," she thought; "but he did not say he was coming back—and now I know he never meant to! If I were to go with him—when he knew it would be the last time we would ever meet! Hard to say good-bye—oh, my God, what a blind trusting fool I have been! I deserve it all. I was warned, but I would not heed it. And he called me his good angel—told me that one thought of me would help him from going astray! I shall never be able to wash the stain of this night from my soul. Oh, what a shameful memory I shall have to carry all my life—that I have loved a forger—a forger!—such a weak, contemptible criminal! And all the world will know—will point the finger of scorn at me and say, 'There is Laura Sylvester, whose lover is a convict in San Quentin!' I wish I were dead. The atmosphere of this night will cling around and about me forever, as the scent of a chameleon-house to a shroud!"

There was a terrible volcano in this girl's soul, and not the least poignant pang of her remorse was the fact that the man's character had been revealed to her and that she had shut her eyes to his defects. In the silence of the night she fought the bitter battle through, and came out of it a changed woman.

Meanwhile Gerome galloped steadily on, his thoughts on the white face of the girl he left standing by the gate, until he overtook the buggy containing Russel and his deputy. The news had spread through the mining town of Montezuma, and the long street was lined with a crowd of roughs and spectators, awaiting his arrival. Some hated him for the fascination he exerted over certain of the fair sex when he chose; some had lost by his means various small sums at the game known as "draw poker," and among them all, now that his downfall was assured, he had not a friend.

Russel was lodged in the jail attached to the courthouse to await his trial, which came off in a few days. As he admitted his guilt, there was no trouble in convicting him; and he was sentenced to two years in San Quentin.

The evening of his sentence he sent word by the jailer for Gerome to come to him. It was dusk when Gerome entered the cell. Russel sat near the grated window with his head on his hand. He looked up as Gerome came in, and motioned him to a seat on the bed. For some time neither spoke. At last Gerome said kindly, for the narrow cell stifled him:

"Did you send for me, Russel? Can I do anything for you?"

Russel answered without moving:

"I suppose you took my traps into your possession in the search for proof before I was arrested?"

"Yes," said Gerome; "but no one else has touched them."

"Then," said Russel, slowly, "there's one favor I'd like to have you do for me. Down in the bottom of my trunk there's a little painting, tied up and addressed to Miss Lottie Sylvester. It contains some notes, a picture, and some little trifles. I meant to send it to her the morning after I was arrested—before I went away. I wish she had never seen me."

"So do I," thought Gerome, "with all my heart!"

Russel continued:

"I've been bad enough, without breaking her heart. I'd be glad to hear she hated me. Would it do any good to tell her I had a wife, do you suppose?"

"Have you?" inquired Gerome.

"No—but she thinks as badly of me as she can, unless there should be another woman concerned. Well, do as you like. But about the package. Will you take it from the trunk and give it to Lottie with your own hands?"

"Yes, Russel, I will promise to do this for you."

"Thank you, Gerome. You're a man worth knowing. And say—couldn't you try to comfort Lottie yourself? You're the right sort for her. Well, good-bye, Gerome," as the latter rose to go. It was too dark to see the red flush that rose to Derrick Gerome's strong, dark face at those last chance words of Russel. He said farewell kindly enough to the miserable convict, but once outside the cell, under the golden stars, he walked as though the fiends were after him. The conclusion of his meditations led him to the determination to comfort Miss Sylvester if possible.

So about a week after Russel's departure for San Quentin Derrick Gerome put the little package in his pocket and rode to see Miss Sylvester. He tied his horse by the gate and went into the house, but Laura was not there.

"She told me she would cross the wood and go up on your hill to watch till the night-fires were lit in the Manzanita diggings just opposite," explained Mr. Sylvester, adding kindly, for he was busy just then with a scientific problem and did not care to be disturbed, "you will probably find her there now, Gerome. She has a curious fancy for odd scenic effects. It is not more than a quarter of a mile away. Tell her not to stay out late. By the way, rather sad affair that is about young Russel. Didn't know much about him; have only seen him a few times; but his career has come to an end rather suddenly. May be all for the best, though, all for the best. Good night, Gerome."

It would be "all for the best" with Mr. Sylvester, if anything happened short of the world turning upside down, and it might have been so in any event if he could climb to the upper side with his spectacles and geological hammer.

Gerome left his horse fast at the gate and walked across the wood, wondering if the kindly old man was really as ignorant of his daughter's connection with Theodore Russel as he seemed. The sun had not been set but a few minutes, and the soft summer twilight was filling the earth with shadows. Fold on fold of the far mountain ranges rose into view veiled in purple haze. A few pale stars were just coming into view over against the east.

Gerome with rapid step walked on till a white figure, wrapped in a scarlet shawl, sitting on a low pine stump near the edge of the diggings, arrested his attention. She had heard his footfall and turned her face toward him with a faint blush burning through its paleness. The blush was not at his presence, but at memory of the circumstances under which he had seen her last. She did not rise nor speak till he came close to her side; then, in response to his "good evening," Miss Sylvester, she answered, calmly, "Good evening, Mr. Gerome."

There was a minute's pause, in which Gerome did not know what to say. His admiration for the pale-faced girl by his side was very sincere, and he hesitated to explain the nature of his business lest it should cut their interview short. He attempted a little financiering instead.

"I have been to the house to see you, and your father directed me to find you here. I am not intruding upon your solitude, am I, Miss Laura?"

"No," in the same calm tone.

"Your father commissioned me to tell you not to remain out too late," Gerome went on.

"Perhaps I had better return now," said Laura, drawing her shawl up around her shoulders. Gerome was nonplussed. He had made a mistake in the beginning and hardly knew how to rectify it. He put out his hand, saying hastily:

"No, don't go yet; it is early. Do you come here often?"

"Quite often," said Laura, quietly.

"Are you fond of watching the diggings after the fires are lit at night?"

"Yes," as evenly as before.

The indifference was beginning to be a little exasperating to Gerome. She appeared to care no more for his presence than for one of the pine stumps around her. She was looking from under her long lashes at the play of the waters against the yellow earth-wall on the opposite side of the mine, and the flaring pitch-pine fire threw fitful shadows over her white face. He caught the gleam of a faint smile around her mouth after a little, which made him feel decidedly uncomfortable. He thought, "now she is making fun of me." He sat down on a log close by and stubbornly resolved to be as dumb as herself, since that seemed to be her humor. After a long silence she turned to him, saying gravely:

"It's my belief that the Persian Ghebers were not far astray in their form of worship, after all."

Gerome gave a sigh of relief, exclaiming:

"I had thought you would never have spoken again! You put me in mind of Tennyson's Maud, whose deportment was 'iceily regular, splendidly null.' I was so relieved to hear your voice again that I don't believe I took in the full force of your remark. What was it—something about 'Fire Worshipers,' I think?"

"Yes," said Laura, with an amused smile. "I was thinking of that peculiar piece of versification in Lalla Rookh called by that name."

"Of what particular passage, Miss Laura! Pray repeat it to me," said Gerome, gently.

Laura flushed a little at the interpretation he might put upon the lines, but repeated evenly:

"And ne'er did Saint of Issa gaze
On the red wreath for martyrs twined,
More fondly than the youth surveys
That pile, which through the gloom behind,
Half lighted by the altar's fire,
Glimmers—his destined funeral pyre!"

Heaped by his own, his comrades' hands,
Of every wood of odorous breath,
Then by the Fire-God's shrine it stands,
Ready to fold in radiant death
The few still left of those who swore
To perish there when hope was o'er."

Gerome watched her closely, but she was unembarrassed. As she concluded she turned to him, saying:

"Do you like Moore's poetry?"

"Not very well," he answered, rather brusquely for him. He was disturbed by the vague application of the lines she had just quoted.

"Why not?" she persisted, looking intently at the fire.

"It is too glittering; it is as coruscant as the dew-drops in the morning, and, in many instances, fully as evanescent. Then there is a questionable morality in it in some cases, also."

Laura was a little aroused from her apathy. She spoke rather sharply:

"Your criticism sounds slightly superficial. Instance some of the defects of which you speak, if you please, sir."

"Well, to what do the lines you have just quoted lead? Suicide, simply. That is what Hafid did in the end. You can make nothing else out of it. Isn't it questionable morality that leads one to escape from the troubles of this life by ending one's own life? Here is an oft-quoted couplet:

"I know not—I care not—if guilt's in that heart,
I but know that I love thee whatever thou art!"

Can you approve of that sentiment, Miss Laura?"

Even through the dusk that had fallen around them Gerome could see the hot red stain which rose to Laura's face at the lines he quoted. He accused himself of being the most wretched blunderer on the face of the earth. Surely some evil genius must be leading him on to destroy his hope. But Laura answered quietly enough, after an instant's pause as if for thought:

"You are severe, but just. I am disposed to agree with you." Then rising from the pine stump whereon she had been sitting she bent to pick up her hat from the ground where it had lain, adding: "I think it is time we should return. Father would probably call dark late enough."

She turned down the path leading toward home, Gerome walking beside her. He had an insane desire to drop the packet he had brought into the first ditch they crossed and let the water whirl it away, rather than that this girl should suffer another start at his hands. But his promise held him, and he was an honorable man. They were both nearly silent going through the wood. Laura had some faint fancy flitting through her mind that if it had been this man instead of Russel she had met six months ago, her life would have been very different. But now—who would want the girl Russel had discarded? She felt herself unworthy of any true man's love, yet all the while seeing no escape from the universal scorn and slander of her life except in marriage. But at that point in her reflections she gave herself a mental shake, and felt her face grow warm again in the darkness at the recollection of her thoughts. After all, there is nothing harder for a high-spirited woman to endure than the strictures of society, deserved or otherwise.

When they finally reached the gate, which Laura was about to open, Gerome put out a strong white hand, which trembled a little, and stayed her.

"Wait a moment, Miss Laura." His voice was very tender when he spoke her name. She showed no surprise—merely inquiring:

"Won't you come indoors? Father will be pleased to see you."

"Not to night, thank you. My business is with you."

"With me?" There was an undertone of alarm in her low voice. She had not thought there was any special meaning attached to Gerome's visit, and she began to fear now that there was some new trouble in store for her. Gerome drew the package from the breast pocket of his coat.

"Miss Laura, the night before Russel was—taken away, he sent for me. When I went to see him he asked me to take from his trunk this packet, addressed to you, and deliver it to you with my own hands. I have done this because he desired my promise that I would do so. It is not a very pleasant duty for either of us. I will leave you now, but some other time I may hope to avail myself of your invitation to enter your father's house. Good night." He put the package into her hand, which he caught and pressed tenderly, then mounted his horse and rode hastily away without another word from Laura.

An hour afterward Mr. Sylvester came into the dining-room. There was a bright blaze in the grate, beside which Laura was standing, with her head on her arm which lay on the mantel-piece.

"Why, Lottie, what a crazy notion to have a fire such a warm June night as this! Are you sick, my dear?" inquired her father, anxiously. Laura answered in an odd muffled voice, without raising her head:

"I've only been burning some waste paper, father."

During the next three months Derrick Gerome became a frequent visitor at Sylvester's house. Even Mr. Sylvester himself had begun to see which way these visits were tending, and, having great respect and liking for Gerome, he favored his inclinations most agreeably. With both these coadjutors arrayed against her, Laura, who did not care much whether she was drifting, seeing the chasm which lay between her soul and Russel's growing wider every day, was fain to yield to their entreaties, and name a day which would bring to pass the event they both desired. So, in the last days of September, Laura saw her wedding-day approaching with an apathy she strove in vain to cooed. She could not be as interested as they desired; it seemed to her continually as though it was some one else's wedding-day instead of her own; or else that the ghost of Laura Sylvester, a pale, spirit-like woman, was about to plight her troth to Derrick. Of her future husband's worth and goodness she had no doubt whatever; nay, she even anticipated a quiet sort of satisfaction at thought of the devotion with which he regarded her. She could be content all her life with him, but it was not exactly the passionate, self-sacrificing love she had thought herself capable of before she wasted it on an unworthy object. You will perceive that Laura regarded herself somewhat in the light of a martyr. It is true, her sensitive nature had received a shock which she could not easily forget; but her actions conveyed, though she had never put the thought into words, even to herself, that since one man had made her suffer all men should atone. Gerome felt this lack of responsive affection on her part, but hoped time would win a more fervent return of his own warm regards. So, one bright September morning, Laura was robed in white trailing garments and the traditional veil and orange-blossoms. When she looked to the glass her own reflection startled her, it was so wraith-like.

"White is so becoming to brides," said her gratified attendant. Laura looked down at her ghostly robes.

"And they lay out dead people in white," was all she said. Her horrified attendant saw her depart without another word. There was no tremor in Laura's voice during the performance of the solemn marriage ceremony, though that of Gerome was almost inaudible. It was concluded, and Laura Sylvester was no more; but a pale, quiet woman stood in her place, whom friends called "Laura Gerome." Her husband took her to San Francisco, but, in spite of the quietness of her girlhood, the busy city life soon palled upon her taste. She was not in harmony with its rush and struggle; so, after spending a month or two of it, she said to her husband:

"Derrick, I want to go home. I believe I like the mountains best after all. It is so quiet there, and this life tires me."

"My dearest, we will go to-morrow. You do look tired! Why didn't you mention it before, Laura?" said her husband, tenderly stroking her brown banded hair. It was noticeable that he never called her "Lottie"—the name which Russell's lips had profaned—nothing but the stately "Laura," which he spoke so tenderly, did she ever hear from him.

So in a few days they were back in their own home, a picturesque house out of town, whose sitting-room windows commanded a view of the Manzanita diggings, of which Gerome was now superintendent and part owner. The house was handsomely furnished, and not far distant from her girlhood's home. Here she passed the first winter of her married life, quietly enough, happy to all appearances, and no one but Gerome felt the full force and grimness of the skeleton in the closet. Laura was most willing to please him, read and talked about his favorite books, took pains to prepare such epicurean dishes as he expressed a fancy for, wore his favorite amethyst ribbons at her throat and in her hair, and always addressed him gently but with unvarying calmness. The soul of the strong man was hungry for the signs of love, which he did not exhibit; he would have given all he owned if she had come to the door to meet him with ripe lips uplifted for a kiss; he would have showered caresses on her which would have made some women the happiest wives in the world; but the fear that they would weary her restrained him. Russell's name was never mentioned between them—never approached save once, when Gerome found Laura sitting on a low foot-stool, before a fire flickering in the grate, and the rest of the room in shadow. He saw tears on her lashes, and the sight rent his great heart; he spoke without stopping to think, out of the depths of his misery:

"Oh, Laura! can't you forget and be happy?" And she had answered, sadly enough:

"I wish to Heaven I could!" and went away with her trouble, leaving him to bear his alone.

One day in May Laura sat by the window open to the soft South air, with some sewing lying in her lap. Over in the mines, whither Gerome had gone half an hour before, all was activity. The cascade of water pouring over the top of the bank caught the eye; its ribbon-like stream was swaying in the breeze. By the pipes at the foot of the bank several men were standing, Gerome among the number, she thought idly. She reached an opera-glass from a small table near her and leveled it toward the bank. Yes, the bank was going to cave before long, evident from the watchful positions of the miners at the foot of it. Even while she looked the earth started to slide, and the men left their pipes and ran for safe places. Gerome was among the number, but, being a strong, active man, Laura had no fear for him. But while the thought was in her mind, she saw a man stumble and fall, and the next instant the sliding avalanche of earth had swept over and around him, burying him from sight. The glass dropped from Laura's shaking hand. She was white to the very lips with the dreadful, pitiful pallor of fear. In that instant of horror the long frozen current of her heart was broken up, and, with one wild cry of "O Derrick, my husband!" she sprang out of the door, and flew with the speed of the wind down the steep, rocky path which led into the mines. In that supreme hour of crucial test she remembered, nothing but that she loved him whom she had lost—who had lacked through her the bliss of knowing himself beloved. She sped as if winged over the rough rocks and huge boulders which lay in her way. She scaled cliffs and leaped chasms which, at another time, she would not have dared attempt; but she had only one thought in her mind, to save her husband or to die with him. Ghostly and panting she appeared on the scene. One of the men suddenly darted from the crowd and caught her arm, interposing himself between her and the scene beyond.

"Good God! Mrs. Gerome, how came you here?" But Laura struck at him with her clenched hand, crying wildly:

"Where is my husband? Let me go to him! Let me go, I tell you!" and, breaking away from him, she sprang forward to the group of men who, with hands and shovels, were removing the earth from the spot where Derrick Gerome had fallen.

Laura dropped on her knees, and with feverish anxiety began to throw the loose earth away with her own white hands. The man who had stayed her first—the foreman, Rolfe—took hold of them gently, but firmly.

"Come with me. Don't you see that you hinder the men from working?" he said.

That was enough. Laura drew back a few paces, watching with maddening anxiety the movements of the workers. Swiftly, but carefully, they worked; and after the lapse of what seemed hours to Laura, a something was slowly brought to view. Gerome had fallen forward, with one arm crushed under him, and his face to the ground. They turned it to the light as Laura darted forward and fell on her knees beside him. The face was bruised about the temples, and the yellow mud was clotted in his dark curling hair. Some one brought water from a pool near by, and with a wet handkerchief gently bathed his face. Laura lifted her head from his heart.

"He isn't dead! He isn't dead! His heart beats! I hear it!" she cried, excitedly. "Oh, for the love of heaven, send some one for a doctor!"

"Page has gone long ago," said one of the men. "If we could go long home, it would be better."

A litter was hastily improvised, and laying their unconscious burden on it, the men proceeded slowly and steadily to bear him home, where they laid him on a sofa in the cheerful sitting-room, and all but Rolfe withdrew.

"That woman's white face will haunt me as long as I live," said one of them in a subdued tone.

"She looks as if she had been struck with death herself," was the answer.

Gerome was struggling for breath now, watched by Laura's agonized eyes. Rolfe was moistening his lips with brandy and holding Laura's crystal and silver fagon of smelling-salts to his nostrils. She had caught up the fagon as she opened the doors to let them enter, and held it to her husband with nervous haste; but Rolfe put out a quiet hand and took it from her. Gerome gasped, and the brown eyes opened slowly, gazing full into his wife's face. After an instant, he said in a dazed, feeble way:

"What is it, dear? You look frightened."

Her heart gave a great bound.

"Me, always me," she thought; "he never thinks of himself. How blind I have been, and O heaven, how cruel!"

She put her face down against his carelessly as she answered, suppressing her emotion to speak quietly:

"The cave overtook you, Derrick, and you were buried in it. But, thank God, you are still alive!"

The unwonted tenderness of her manner touched him. As Rolfe withdrew to the window, Gerome whispered:

"And you were frightened, dear? Did you think I was killed?"

She raised her face and let him look into her eyes, saying, with a great throb of thankfulness at her heart because that he had lived to hear it:

"Derrick, until I thought you might be dead, I never knew how dearly I loved you, how wholly my heart was yours. You must live so that I may have years in which to prove my words true, dearest."

Then she laid her lips lightly on his in the first voluntary kiss she had ever given him. There was time for her to see the great joy shining from his dark eyes ere the fringed lids swept over them, hiding their light in unconsciousness again. Laura sprang to her feet in alarm as Rolfe turned, saying: "He has fainted again. The Doctor is here now, thank God!"

When Gerome was restored to consciousness a second time, under the Doctor's manipulations, his first glance was around the room in search of his wife's face, resting thereon with an expression of absolute content.

"This man's hurt!" said Doctor Hamilton, bluntly; "his left arm is completely mangled," gently cutting the muddy slum away from it. After a careful examination of the injured member, the Doctor laid it back by the man's side and looked at him thoughtfully, jamming his hands into his coat pockets as he did so.

The brusque Doctor had a heart, which so many members of his profession seem to lack, and he hesitated to tell the stricken man the truth. But Gerome spared him the pain by asking:

"Will I have to lose it, Doctor?"

Laura drew close and slipped her hand in her husband's uninjured right one, which closed round it with a tender pressure. The Doctor answered slowly:

"I am afraid so, my friend. The bone is so splintered and broken that it is impossible to restore it. You must have struck your elbow on a rock as you fell; and, after all, that may have saved your life, as that was the primary cause of your unconsciousness."

With a look of agony, which went straight to Laura's heart, Gerome exclaimed:

"Then don't wait! Take it off at once, before I have had time to think of it, Doctor!"

"That won't do. I will send for Dr. Collins, and consult with him. We shall not be able to perform the operation for an hour yet, nor will your strength at present admit of it. I want you to take this cordial I am mixing four times during this hour; and Mrs. Gerome, I am satisfied to leave my patient in your hands for comfort and consolation!"

He left the room, Rolfe following him, to dispatch a messenger for Dr. Collins, and Laura and her husband were left alone. The innate force and loyalty of her nature were aroused now. She felt herself to be the fountain whence her husband was to draw strength and support for the coming trial, and she rose equal to the occasion. She leaned over him, saying quietly, but oh! so tenderly:

"I am glad it is no worse, Derrick."

"But a glip, Laura! A husband with only one arm when you married a stalwart man!" he groaned.

"For better or for worse till death us do part," she quoted softly, remembering her wedding vow. "And it is not your heart that is crippled, my own; nor the light of reason that has left you, for you can hear me say 'I love you,' and you know what that means; and it is not speech that you are deprived of, for you can assure me of your love in return; and the light of your eyes is now the light of my heart, for you can see the face of the wife who loves you better than all the world besides."

Gerome's dark face was radiant.

"My angel," he murmured. "I would be willing to suffer any penalty that the blessing of your affection may be revealed to me."

"Derrick, a little while ago I said my heart was wholly yours, and that you must live years yet in which to prove my words true. Ought I not to feel a little thrill of thankfulness that I will have the opportunity of proving the helpmate I promised to be? I am only concerned for the suffering you will undergo, dear heart."

"That will be nothing if you can stay by me, Laura."

"I will not leave you, dearest."

So when, at the expiration of the hour, the two doctors entered the room together, Laura said gravely, though with white lips:

"My husband wishes me to stay by him, gentlemen. I will be very quiet, I assure you, and not interfere with you in the performance of your duties."

Dr. Hamilton looked at Gerome's pleading face and answered briefly:

"Very well, madam."

When the cruel shining steel instruments were laid out on the table, Laura went and knelt beside the sofa which had been drawn beside it. Gerome's arm, bared to the shoulder, bruised, nerveless, and shattered lay on the table. He refused the help of anesthetics, saying bravely:

"I want to keep my brain clear."

When all was ready Laura lifted the head and laid it against her bosom, holding it close while the work was done. When he winced once with the pain, she pressed her lips to his forehead, his closed eyes, and white lips. At last it was over, and he looked up at her with pathetic smile.

"This is your husband, dear, all that's left of him."

"Don't t, Derrick, don't!" was all Laura could say, for her own strength began to fail under the awful strain it had borne. But Gerome, now that the worst over, began to recall some of his old cheerfulness under the potent spell of Laura's love. As the medical men withdrew a great tear fell on his face.

"My darling, don't grieve for me. Indeed, I am happier than in all my life before," he said, anxiously. But down went Laura's head on his breast, and for a few minutes she sobbed violently, while Gerome held her close in the circle of his right arm, whispering fond and endearing words in her ear. But the brusque Doctor entered just then, and taking in the situation at a glance, exclaimed hastily:

"Tut, tut, madam, this will never do! It won't, upon my soul! Why, I left you to comfort your husband, and from the appearance of things at present I should say he is comforting you."

But he was not very cross, for Gerome's face reassured him, and as Laura lifted her head indignantly, with her sobs checked, Gerome replied steadily:

"Now, don't you interfere, Hamilton! Laura is as brave as a soldier you admitted yourself. God bless her! Comfort! Why, I could spare some of my spirits to you. I'm not as low-spirited as you fancy."

"That's a fact, Gerome; you do bear up well. I couldn't in your place."

Gerome looked up at him with a mischievous smile as he answered:

"You could if you had my wife to help you."

"There may be something in that, Gerome. Believe I will get married. Don't know, women are so fussy. Good hands in sickness, though, I'll see about it," and he went bustling out of the house.

This happened some years ago. The last time I saw Gerome and his wife was behind a handsome span of horses, which Laura was driving. The dark face of her husband glowed with pride or gleamed with amusement at her animated talk, and it was plain that Laura's promise had been well and faithfully kept, that she was in every sense of the word her husband's helpmate, and that his tower of strength lay in the fullness of her love.

INTAGLIOS.

Not Yet.

Not yet, O friend, not yet
The patient stars
Lean from their lattices content to wait.
All is illusion till the morning bars
Slip from the levee of the Eastern gate.
Night is too young, O friend, day is too near,
Wait for the day that maketh all things clear.
Not yet, O friend, not yet.
Not yet, O friend, not yet.
All is not true;
All is not ever as seemeth now;
Soon shall the river take another blue,
Soon dies yon light upon the mountain brow.
What fiend dark, O love, bright day will fill.
Wait for the morning, be it good or ill.
Not yet, O love, not yet. BRET HARTE.

The Mysteries.

Once on my mother's breast, a child, I crept,
Holding my breath;
There, safe and sad, lay shuddering, and wept
At the dark mystery of Death.
Weary and weak, and worn with all unrest,
Spent with the strife—
O mother, let me weep upon thy breast
At the sad mystery of Life. W. D. HOWELLS.

Three Kisses of Farewell.

Three—only three, my darling—
Separate, solemn, slow;
Not like the swift and joyous ones
We used to know
When we kissed because we loved each other,
Simply to taste love's sweet,
And lavished our kisses as the summer
Lavishes heat;
But as they kiss whose hearts are wrung
When hope and fear are spent,
And nothing is left to give except
A sacrament!

First of the three, my darling,
Is sacred unto pain:
We have hurt each other often;
We shall again.
When we pine because we miss each other,
And do not understand
How the written words are so much colder
Than eye and hand,

I kiss thee, dear, for all such pain
Which we may give or take;
Buried, forgiven before it comes,
For our love's sake!

The second kiss, my darling,
Is full of joy's sweet thrill:
We have blessed each other always;
We always will.

We shall reach until we feel each other
Past all time and space;
We shall listen till we hear each other
In every place;

The earth is full of messengers
Which love sends to and fro;
I kiss thee, darling, for all joy
Which we shall know!

The last kiss, O my darling,
My love—I cannot see
Through my tears as I remember
What it may be.

We may die and never see each other,
Die with no time to give
Any sign that our hearts are faithful
To die as live.

Taken with my tears will not see
Who see our parting breath,
This one last kiss, my darling, seals
The seal of death!

Nature.

As a fond mother when the day is o'er,
Leads by the hand her little child to bed,
Half willing, half reluctant to be led,
And leave his broken playthings on the floor,
Still gazing at them through the open door,
Nar wailing, reassured and comforted
By promises of others in their stead,
Which though more splendid may not please him more;
So nature deals with us, and takes away
Our playthings one by one, and by the hand
Leads us so gently, that we go,
Scarce knowing if we wish to go or stay,
Being too full of sleep to understand
How far the unknown transcends the what we know. LONGFELLOW.

The Wonderful Geysers!

THIS WONDERFUL SPOT OF CALIFORNIA

ifornia should be visited by all residents and tourists. The Geysers of Iceland and the Geysers of the Yellowstone have their counterpart in the remarkable Canyon of the Pluton in Sonoma County. Wonderful as a curiosity of nature, wonderful as a health resort, and delightful as a resort of pleasure. By steamer, train, and coach, over a beautiful Bay, through beautiful valleys and romantic hills, the trip alone more than compensates for the cost and time. Leave San Francisco daily at 3 p. m., by steamer for Donahue; take train for Cloverdale; stay all night at Cloverdale, and leave in coach—four-in-hand—at 7 A. M. for the mountain drive over the hills to the Geysers. Returning passengers reach San Francisco in a day by the Calistoga way. A trip to the Geysers is the easiest, most inexpensive, and most delightful of any in California. The hotel accommodations, the trout fishing, the hunting, the walks and drives, the bathing, the everything, are perfection.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 16, 1878.

MY DEAR MADGE:—I wish you could have been with us on Monday night at the California. It was so like the old times—the old times, I mean, not only before the era of economy set in, but before the beginning of the decline. Everything in the way of mountings was lavish, and the cast contained not a single stick. Think upon that, Madge, and think also what a long, long time it has been since it was possible to say it of a performance in that theatre. Diplomacy is a charming play, and, perhaps, owes something of its interest in these times to the wondrous amount of state-craft which those old fellows over the water are employing just now. In short, diplomacy is the fashion, and diplomats are greater men than generals. Of course, in the play, everything diplomatic is delightfully vague, and we only know of the dispatches, which cause all the trouble, that they are important and that they are Russian. This latter is a very strong recommendation. It would appear that no playwright can with impunity give a play over to a critical public unless in contains the Russian element, as popular taste runs nowadays; and it does help to make a play picturesque, both because the Russians are born sycophants and born schemers. In Diplomacy there is just enough Russia introduced to make the necessary mischief, for the "Peauclerc" brothers are Englishmen and members of the British Embassy, while the heroine and her mother hail from Paraguay. That is rather an odd fancy, is it not, Madge, to bring a heroine from Paraguay of all countries? But whenever those foreign dramatists introduce to fiction a lady whose habits of life are more luxurious than her known bank account would seem to warrant, they locate her either in the United States or South America. The plot of Diplomacy is as delicate as a spider's web, but woven of that strongest thing in nature—the jealousy of a woman baffled in love. Miss Jeffreys-Lewis as the "Comtesse Zieka" quite froze me with horror in the first act. Such concentrated malignity of hate is quite terrifying even in fiction. You have no idea, Madge, how Miss Lewis has improved, ever since she was here last playing in Phyge. An indefinable change has passed over her. She has lost her affections. She is stronger, more thorough, and more finished. She has an immensely strong part. She is a female Russian spy, a woman with a history, an adventuresome who has been overtaken by a genuine passion, and finds a rival in a young girl whose charms consist of a fresh heart and a pretty face. Altogether, she is a "very bad sort," as the novels say, but she pleaded her case so strongly, she was so inexpressibly touching in her interview with "Baron Stein"—where she tells her story in the second act after her return from the wedding of her rival—that my sympathies perforce went out to her, so that her humiliations actually hurt me, my interest was so real. But how subtly she wove the toils around "Dora," how she wrung the heart of the man she loved; how cleverly she seconded the schemes of the wily Baron, and how thoroughly she mixed affairs up generally! I never saw so labyrinthine a plot whose incidents were so naturally brought about, and, in the end, so neatly unbound. You will remember, Madge, my impressions of Maud Granger, derived partly from her photographs and partly from the reports of those who had seen her. I thought her tall and Junoesque, large, exceedingly in fact, with a pair of big flashing coal-black eyes, and a big stage voice with a presence altogether to which the term magnificent would be most applicable. Judge of my amazement when a pretty little creature swept out, who quite upset all my preconceived ideas. She is short, quite short, with a petite, lithe figure, and eyes which may be black or blue or gray, I could not tell, but large and round and full. They neither flash nor dance as I expected, but are soft and pleading, and taken altogether she is quite a delicious little woman. And what a dresser, Madge! Jeffreys-Lewis, as the "Comtesse," is a picture in her magnificent costumes, but there is something out of the common in Maud Granger's style. The costumes may be Worth's, but they are not Worthian. She inclines to the neglige, and wore à la carte des chemises, both of white and gold, but the second of white satin, and a little more elaborate than the first, a natural circumstance perhaps, since it was an article of the trousseau. She must be fond of gold, for her second toilet had some yellow drapery—an over-dress I suppose it to be—and her bridal traveling-dress of purple and golden bronze. Madge all over with little golden jigamares of sort. The effect was quite enchanting, I assure you. I do not fancy Maud Granger to be an extraordinary actress. In a round of characters she could not approach Jeffreys-Lewis; but "Dora"—how in the world did a Paraguayan ever come to be named Dora?—is a part which fits her well, and she plays it very prettily. There is a charming scene between husband and wife, in which both she and Montague are delightfully natural. Poor fellow! he was suffering from a terrible cold, and was as hoarse as a crow. It must be very discouraging to make even stage love when the croup comes struggling up in the throat with one's feelings; but Montague, as you know, in this line, always depended quite as much upon pose as upon his lines. In point of fact, he attitudinizes too much, a weakness which was observable in the famous scene between the three men at the close of the second act. It is the thing to run Montague down, because he is so well liked by the ladies, something which the poor man can not help. I can not fancy him as "Spartacus," or "Samson," or "Jibbenamosay," but a more graceful, manly, and gentlemanly performance than his "Julian Beauclerc" I should not ask, nor do I soon again expect, to see. The stiffness in the theatre was intense when "Count Orloff" unwittingly accused the wife of his friend, and the repressed feeling with which all three gentlemen played the scene was very strong in its effect. It was uncomfortably like a bit of real life and every one was very glad to see them appear amicably together before the curtain. It is rarely, alas how rarely, that one sees so many good actors together. Mr. F. B. Warde, who plays the brother, is enough like Montague to be his brother, but in the play they are so exceedingly friendly as to almost make the idea of relationship incompatible. They speak in same manner, dress in the same style, and have the same regard for all the minor courtesies of the drawing-room. Warde has a bright, open face, and a twinkling eye, is, in fact, a better looking man than Montague, but not quite so good an actor, in this line at least, though an able second. In fact, Madge, they both have such awfully nice parts that they can't help making themselves liked in them. "Count Orloff" has a very correct and dignified manner, and was an admirable third in this remarkable scene. As for "Baron Stein"—I believe the man's name is Shannon, but I can not think of him as anything but "Stein"—his make-up is so thorough that I heard many people disclaim the idea of its being a make-up at all. He has a pair of keen, glittering eyes, under white pent brows, a mere soupçon of accent and a bland suavity which is quite exasperating when you know what a grand old rascal he is. It is an admirably drawn character and admirably played. There, Madge! Four good actors all together in one theatre in one play! Add to these two excellent actresses, a couple of artistic interiors, unexampled care in costuming both on the part of the ladies and gentlemen, an audience almost as brilliant as in the opera season, and you will not be astonished that I found nothing to growl about. I enjoyed myself thoroughly, as I always do when they give anything worth enjoying. I can not say as much for Tuesday evening, when a very large circle of personal friends assisted at the benefit of Harry Edwards. The occasion was interesting, but, for an hour or two there was a perfect carnival of amateurism. I am sorry he is going, but the fates be thanked that when he does go he goes to Boston. They say W. A. Mestayer is going there also, and I should not like to have the fastidious Hubert Judge of California taste, as they would do should Mr. Mestayer bill himself as a "California favorite." Mr. Harry Edwards will offset anything of that kind I hope, or else Boston will regard us as a band of wild lunatics. The programme for the benefit was necessarily made up of what material could be made available, and was therefore too fragmentary to be thoroughly enjoyable. However, it was just as well. Jack says we had no business to be enjoying ourselves at such a parting. There were some redeeming features, one of which was the singing of Madame Varian—mother of vain, pretty Nina—a lady who, under a long Italian name, is said to have once entranced audiences. Her voice is jangled by time, but she is an artist. Another was Grismer's recitation of the soliloquy in Enoch Arden: "A shipwrecked sailor waiting for a sail; no sail from day to day." Of course he said "but no sail." They all offend metrical symmetry with that little conjunction. Yet he gave the pretty fragment with feeling and taste, and in a deep, sonorous voice, which called up memories of poor Edwin Adams, who is always identified with "Enoch Arden." Rogers, of Tony Pastor's troupe, has been giving an imitation of Edwin Adams in this same bit during the week, but it is not so happy as some others of his acts. They have changed the bill at Tony's just enough to call it changed, and the crowds are still flocking there to laugh and be gay. It is a comfortable place to go, for there is never any of the tedium of delay. Every one is sharply on time, no one dawdles, and there is nothing of the endless repetitions of encores, which become such a nuisance. Patience here is never worn, at least with waiting—a lesson which some of the other managers could advantageously learn from "America's own vocalist." A striking name, is it not? But not nearly so funny as an advertisement I saw the other day, where Harrigan and Hart's entertainment is called the "Genesis of Vaudeville." Adieu! Come down and see Diplomacy if you can, and enjoy it as much as did Yours, BETSY B.

The Power of Love.

But love, first learned in a lady's eyes,
Lives not alone immured in the brain;
But, with the motion of all elements,
Courses as swift as thought in every power,
And gives to every power a greater power—
A sort of double-teared block and tackle arrangement,
That will, among other things, keep a man
Chained to the sofa in her father's parlor
Till half-past one o'clock next day.
Love adds a precious seeing to the eye,
Which enables base, deceiving men to pay
Two dollars and a half for a paste diamond
Set in a brass ring, and palm it off
On his best girl for one of Tiffany's best stones,
And the dear, confiding creature, extending
Her taper finger to receive the gift,
Exclaims, "O George, and falling into his arms
Sole his white vest with tears of joy!
A lover's ear will hear the lowest sound,
And there are few cases on record
Where the old man succeeded in stealing
From the bed-room to the parlor door
Without surprising at least one of the young people.
Love's tongue proves thimble Euechus gross in taste;
And for valor, is not love a Hercules,
Packing enough confectionery in his coat-tail pockets
To sink a ship of a hundred tons burden?
Sulute as Sphinx, as sweet and musical
As bright Apollo's lute string with hair
Hucked from the bright and golden butter
Which cometh from the Western Reserve,
Never durst poet touch a pen to write
Until his ink were tempered with love's sighs;
O then his lines would ravish savage ears—
But what does an Indian know about poetry?
—Old City Derrick.

The New York Graphic says: The marriage of Miss Mary Anderson, the actress, to Lieutenant Fremont, a son of General John C. Fremont, is announced by the Louisville Argus, on the authority of Mrs. Fremont, who wrote the fact to General William Preston. It appears from the statement that Miss Anderson was married on the 30th of May, the day she sailed for Europe, and that on that date the Lieutenant boarded his own ship, it being arranged that they should meet in Paris and pass the honeymoon there. That the fair young tragedienne is now acting "Juliet" to the fortunate Lieutenant's "Romeo," there would seem every reason to believe; and this contrary to the advice of no less a mentor than Mr. Boucicault, whose sage remarks in an interview published in the Graphic are recalled by this revelation of "perfect bliss." "I was telling Miss Anderson," said Mr. Boucicault (we quote him from the interview), "that a young actress should avoid marriage. The priestesses of our art should be devoted to celibacy. The audience is a husband that is never out of temper—always a lover, liberal, faithful, and always at home. She cannot serve two masters. An actress should live among the illusions of life as long as she can. Marriage and its consequences are realities of the realist kind." "But is it time that you speculate," asked the lady, with pertinacious curiosity, "that you are wise in stocks and shares?" No wonder Miss Anderson, on the verge of "realities of the realist kind," changed the subject, although we doubt, in light of later events, the "pertinacious curiosity" in regard to stocks and shares. To hear, and yet not to obey! We would remind the giver of such woe counsel, however, that the priestess of art is apt to be the gainer by loving and living, and that when Miss Anderson carries out his project of playing "Parthena" to Mr. McCullough's "Ingomar," there will be a "new-found meaning in those stupid words"—
"Two souls with but a single thought,
Two hearts that beat as one!"

Miss Genevieve Ward has arrived in New York from Europe, but left almost immediately for Marshfield, where she will remain until September. Miss Ward is said to be the greatest tragedienne now upon the stage, and her appearance at Booth's, under the auspices of Messrs. Jarrett & Palmer, will be an occasion of great interest. Miss Ward will be remembered as Mme. Guerrabella, whose beautiful voice promised so much for a fine artistic career some years ago. She is American by birth, belonging to one of the best old New York families, though she has won her theatrical triumphs abroad. It was to the loss of her voice while pursuing operatic studies, and to the despair which that loss created, that we owe the acquisition to the stage of one more great artist. Miss Ward has had the most distinguished success in London during the past season, and comes back to us in the zenith of her fame, with a reputation as woman and actress of which her countrywomen may be proud.

The dramatic amusements for this country this season, out of New York, will be entirely by traveling companies. The Dramatic News says that only eight cities in the United States will have stock companies, and of these only three cities will have resident companies—New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. McVicker, who will have the only stock company in Chicago, reserves the privilege of sending it out through the country at odd times. Spaulding of St. Louis, and Miles of Cincinnati, employ one company in conjunction. New Orleans will have no company, San Francisco but two, Louisville none, Baltimore one, Albany none, Portland none, Detroit none, Pittsburgh none, Cleveland one (which will mainly be on the road, however). A rough estimate gives sixty-five as the number of combinations that will travel about the country.

A risky experiment was tried in a Paris theatre. In the ballet the leading danseuse came forward waving an olive branch. Then all the flags of the world were waived by the corps, except that of Germany. Then the premiere danseuse displayed the German flag. The reception given it was very cordial.

The plash of fountains in the moonlit courts of the Alhambra; the tinkle of a lover's lute beneath the window of Beauty; the swooning of "the languid air" tangled in the strings of an Æolian harp; "the horns of Elfrand faintly blowing;" the "sweet jargon" of "all little birds that are"—all these, and more, are mixed and mingled, and anon clearly individualized, in the strains of the modern musical box. At M. J. Paillard & Co.'s, 120 Sutter Street, every variety of this magical instrument can be heard, and from hearing to buying the transition is almost inevitable. Some of these angels in the household will perform you more than one hundred airs, and the prices of all kinds are ridiculously low.

Mr. George J. Gee, the well-known organist at Trinity Church, has just returned from a business trip to Boston, New York, and other Eastern cities, where he has been studying the latest and most approved methods and styles under instruction from the best organists and teachers in the country. Mr. Gee resumes the giving of lessons to organ and piano pupils at his residence, and to them the experience of his recent trip will be invaluable.

MR. C. F. CHICKERING, senior member of the celebrated piano manufacturing firm of Chickering & Sons, New York and Boston, is now paying his first visit to this city, with a view of extending the business interests of the firm on this coast. The Chickering pianos have a world-wide reputation.

The Government of Wurtemberg, upon the petition of the Piano manufacturers of the kingdom, has purchased one of Steinway's Grands and one Upright Piano, to serve as models in this branch of industry, and as such to be publicly exhibited in the Chamber of Commerce at Stuttgart.

Ben. Wade, when he was traveling westward, interviewed a lank countryman peddling cakes at a small station in the alkali region.

"Wall, yas, stranger, I 'low we've got jest as good a patch o' country as can be fetched in Ameriky. Ther ain't but two things we lack; if we had them we'd be all right. I calculate all we need is water and good society."

"Humph!" grunted the crusty Senator, "that's all hell needs."

GOING FOR THE GOLDEN GOAL.

Incidents in the Voyage of the Pioneer Ship Tarolinta—1849.

BY DR. J. C. TUCKER.

Every hotel, restaurant, auction and gambling house in San Francisco in 1849 had a fiend employed to ring a great bell, or more infernal gong, in front of its door. The din at meal times and in the evening was almost unbearable. Later a municipal ordinance stopped the mad-dening clatter. Let me recall an evening scene in these exciting days. Turn the corner, and step into the old Parker House, and you with difficulty convince yourself you are in America—in so new and so distant a country! In a lofty saloon 50 by 100 feet, you find a convention of the world's people strangely attired and more strangely occupied. The walls are handsomely papered; rich, massive chandeliers hang from the ceiling, throwing from their many cut-glass astral lamps a flood of light upon the bewildering scene. A band of superior musicians are playing at one end of the saloon; while a magnificent bar, glittering with burnished metal, wood, and glass, is again and again reproduced by the many high mirrors on every side. Billiard tables are in the centre, while ranged around the room are games of every kind. At the roulette table, the rouge et noir, and others of mere chance, are gathered the greatest throng. Beautiful women, chiefly French and Spanish, richly decked in dress and jewels, sit behind the table with the dealers. "Make your game—all set—roll. The red wins; the black loses," and the lynx-eyed croupier rakes in the coin and dust. Faro, monte, vingt-un, and a dozen others bid for your money. Long lines of men are drinking there. The air is thick with tobacco smoke and the fumes of liquor. There is a confusing jargon of sounds—the clashing of glasses and jingling of coin; the calls of the dealers; the click of the billiard balls; the popping of corks; the hum of human voices, and, above all the ringing tones of bugle, harp, and viol. Nearly every man is dressed in flannel shirt and long boots, while in his waist or boots he carries knife and pistols. The dealers are much better dressed. Upon the inner ledge of the table, just under the dealer's hand, lies a brace of pistols. Slouched hats generally prevail. There are many Mexicans and natives in their rich national dress of slashed leather pants, with silver buttons and embroidery down the outer side of the leg; short jacket, similarly ornamented, coming down to the sash gracefully wound round the waist, and holding the long knife; the broad Peruvian hat and the great jingling spurs complete the costume. Monte is the favorite game. The "Kanaka"—just returned from the mines—dashes down his buckskin bag of gold dust on the "Jack, Jack and a Jack" game. Few win—all lose. But there is very general good-nature, and none seem to complain. Hark! Bang, bang goes a pistol! It is at the monte table. The crowd press together there, then suddenly open as the proprietors superintend the carrying out of a limp figure. He attempted to withdraw his money after betting, and the dealer shot him. That was all. "On with the dance!"

The old cemetery was at the north end of Stockton Street. There are still some of the signs of graves remaining. Cases of adipocere were said to have been found there upon removing the bodies, years after. The gambling houses were everywhere, and going night and day, but the "Parker" was the most magnificent. For those who had no stores there was no place in which to pass the long evenings except the saloons. Free lunches were bounteous banquets, and "drinks fifty cents each!" The genus bummer existed at that early day, and none went hungry. If a man by the roadside was ill, or met with an accident, some stranger would mount a box, and, appealing to "the crowd," pass around his hat and obtain enough to pay the sufferer's board and lodging for a month, or perhaps pay his fare back East. Pearson, of Troy, N. Y., a talented lawyer, and a courteous gentleman ever, was among the first called by death from the Tarolinta's passenger list. George Vail followed shortly after; he was a general favorite, but none could keep him from self-destruction. As his family were very wealthy, and as he was the only son, the body was preserved in a cask of brandy—stored in a warehouse. His family were several times notified of the fact, but never replied nor desired the body shipped home. In the first great fire the warehouse was burned with its contents, including the remains of our esteemed friend, Vail. The arrival of the Isthmus steamer—every month—was the great event in those days. When the uncouth giant arms of the wooden telegraph, upon the summit of Telegraph Hill, began to fling themselves about, the word ran from street to street "The steamer's coming in!" Then a stream of humanity poured down Long Wharf, and eagerly sought for friends among the new-comers. Hours before the mails reached the Post-office, lines—blocks long—of men were formed from the delivery windows. Places were sold therein, at high prices sometimes. Eastern newspapers brought a dollar apiece. The Government postage upon a letter amounted to about twenty cents.

The following is an alphabetically arranged list of the passengers of the ship Tarolinta, correct as to former and present residence, or condition, so far only as the memory or knowledge of the remaining little band of a dozen, upon this coast, extends. The "Tarolinta Association" numbered eight old members at its last anniversary celebration, July 6, 1878; but descendants of its members are numerous and promise to perpetuate it.

Nearly all of the above names have done the "State some service." In the political and legislative councils, upon the judicial seat, wielding the editorial pen, developing vast mining resources, upon the commercial mart, in the fields of humanity, science, exploration, and invention—everywhere have the passengers of the Tarolinta been found honorably and honestly toiling—still toiling onward to the Golden Goal. Honors have fallen upon many—wealth upon few. The remarkable fortune of our late companion, William S. O'Brien, is the exception. Warm-hearted and unchanged by his acquisition of millions, he ever took pleasure in meeting his compagnons de voyage, and in recalling the incidents and friendships of our trip. None among those upon whom fortune smiled had a heartier hand and word for his fellow-passengers than the late William C. Hoff. In many instances he more materially aided them when overtaken by calamity or sickness. The memory of that noble old Roman lives ever green in the hearts of the few survivors. The blight of dishonor, crime, or fraud has never fallen upon a single name of the list, and the many descendants of the Tarolinta Pioneers may proudly perpetuate the association of that name, as they continue to fly the ship's checkered flag on the occasions of the anniversary of July 6, 1849.

World Fable: A Loquacious Barber, being desirous of replenishing his Stock of Bear's grease, and knowing a Bank whereon the wild Bears doze, armed himself with his Razor and proceeded noiselessly and on tip-toe to the Spot. He was just about to take the Bear by the Nose and cut his Throat, when his Professional Instinct impelled him to ask his intended Victim if he would not have a Bottle of Mandelmilch to prevent the falling out of his hair. Thus apprised of his danger, the Ferocious Plantigrade had no difficulty in killing the Loquacious Barber. Moral: Go Thou and Do Likewise.

SHORT STORIES AND SUGGESTIONS.

By Sam Davis.

When Ralston was president of the Bank of California, the question of William Sharon being appointed the bank's agent in Virginia City was under discussion.

One of the directors urged that Sharon was not a fit man, as he was a notorious poker-player, and he could prove it.

"The main thing we want proof on," interrupted Ralston, "is his qualifications as a poker-player. A poor poker-player has no business in a bank. If he is a good poker-player, why then we'll give him the place."

Some of the directors, who had vivid recollections of his skill, decided that he was considerably above the average; and that's how Sharon got his start in the world.

Speaking of poker, reminds me of the story they tell on Bishop, the well-known Piche lawyer.

He was once playing with a party in which there was an irrepressible Irishman, who suddenly laid down his cards and remarked:

"I don't wish to be personal or insinuat'ing, but if the—who's chatin at the keards don't quit, bedad, he'll get his other eye knocked out."

The fact that Bishop is a one-eyed man, and the only one at the table, gave the point to the Irishman's remark.

A restaurant patron was talking somewhat roughly to a waiter, when the proprietor, stepping up, remarked:

"Don't talk to him that way. He used to be Governor of Oregon, and such treatment naturally hurts his feelings."

Some years ago some Comstockers concluded to play a joke on a bald-headed man in Gold Hill, and told him that a decoction of sage-brush leaves would certainly make his hair sprout.

He boiled up bushels of the leaves, and recommended the remedy to his friends.

The bald-heads tried it all over the State, without suspecting the joke, and finally "The Sage Brush Remedy" for baldness began to be sold at drug stores and finds a ready sale to this day.

Some years ago a deputy sheriff attempted to collect a debt from the manager of a San Francisco theater. A slight-of-hand performer of considerable renown was the attraction. The manager heard of the contemplated invasion of the collector, and appealed to the man of legedmain.

He said he would fix it.

About seven o'clock the collector made his appearance. The manager was bland and polite.

"Take the receipts of the house. You surely would not expect more."

The collector sat for nearly two hours and watched about $800 drop into the cash-box, and was happy.

When the audience was all in, he seized the box. It came up somewhat lighter in his hand than he anticipated. It had no bottom, and every cent dropped in at the top had glided down a sort of flume through the floor, where it was duly and conscientiously corralled.

The nonplussed emissary of the law then attempted to go inside, and was refused a pass.

"Is this seat next to you engaged?" asked the traveler of a young lady in the cars.

"Yes, sir, it is."

"Who's engaged it?"

"A gentleman, I believe," she said.

"Well, he can't engage a seat this way and not sit in it. I don't see any baggage. Where's his baggage?"

And he was on the point of sitting down, when the young lady, mustering all her courage, exclaimed: "Oh! sir, I'm his baggage."

Leaving this idea of short stories, I wish to suggest a field for the idle capital now lying dormant in San Francisco.

I understand that in some portions of Africa and the South Sea Islands the practice of regarding missionaries as a regular article of diet is still in vogue.

It costs about $1,000 to take a missionary from his home in the United States and land him sound in mind and limb among the cannibals of a foreign country. If he is so unfortunate as to have a family it costs double, if not more.

Now the main item is the traveling expenses of the men of the Lord, who are required by the soulless steamship companies to pay in advance the same as sinners and excursionists.

No sooner do they arrive in their respective fields of usefulness than they are killed and eaten by the savages and their outfit and traveling expenses are a dead loss to the treasury of the church.

There was a time when the cannibals were content to masticate the flesh of the most cadaverous man that could be sent out, but of late they have learned to distinguish at a glance between the tender flesh of a high-salaried New York missionary and the fibrous meat of a half-fed Nebraska gospeltizer. The following letter explains itself:

SOUTH SEA ISLANDS, February 8, 1876.
TO THE BOARD OF DOMESTIC MISSIONS, NEW YORK.—Dear Sirs:—During the last ten years the quality of the missionaries sent to this section has been far below the average. Please forward an invoice of the tenderest stock you can find. No slop-fed meat for us. Yours truly, MIN TOH, and 2,000 others.

Now my idea is that much saving could be effected by killing the missionaries at home and shipping the meat to cans.

The meat would doubtless find a ready sale with the cannibals, and if steamed, packed, and sorted (without bones) they would pay a good price for it. As it is now they help themselves and pay nothing.

A meat-packing establishment with a little capital would soon become a permanent and thriving institution. It would rid the country of superfluous clergymen at a trifling expense, and instead of being a steady drain upon the coffers of the church would be a substantial addition to its yearly revenue.

After the trade had been sufficiently carried on to become a permanent institution, and the canned meat began to be looked upon as an indispensable article of diet with the patrons of the trade, it would be the easiest thing in the world to ship a Chinaman now and then in the place of the divines, and if care were taken the whole shipment might be so managed that Chinamen would wholly supplant the missionaries.

They could be inspected and marked like wheat; for instance, White Missionaries, No. 1; Converted Chinese, No. 2; Heathen Chinese, No. 3. San Francisco hoodlums and politicians might be sold to the lower classes under brand 4.

This plan would not only give the cannibals a better quality of meat than they have had heretofore, but it would enable domestic missionaries to get better salaries, and perhaps the cannibals might make enough gospel at their meals to become wholly content.

"CHISPA."--A LUMP OF HUMAN GOLD.

A Wild Waif of the Sierra.

Chispa was born during the fall of '49--ushered into being amid total darkness on the night of November 13th, and the tiny waif of the babe mingled with the plaintive sobbing of the wintry winds as they swept with unseen fingers the strings of Nature's harp of pines.

The snow drifted waist deep around the rude log hut, and the distant moaning of the Stanislaus River was the first lullaby that greeted his ears. Alone and unattended, the Indian mother gave her half-breed child its first sustenance, and in the agony of that dismal hour hushed the sad cry of the forlorn waif thus miserably brought to life.

The morning light brought to the door of the cabin a kind-hearted miner, who, knowing that a woman lay in mortal pain, in solitude and gloom, had tossed on a sleepless couch the whole night through.

Approaching the cabin as quietly as possible in the crunching snow, the tall, broad-chested, heavily-bearded man, with hesitating touch lifted the latch, and, half-fearing to look upon a spectacle of misery and death, pushed the door open and peered into the bare apartment.

There, in a corner, lying upon a pile of green pine tussels, half covered with a blanket which he had, amidst the derision of his fellow-miners, carried to the cabin on the previous night, lay the mother, asleep. Upon her brown bosom nestled the child, his little hands unconsciously clasping the long black tresses of the woman's coarse hair. Only the steady respiration of the mother gave evidence that life still remained--that Nature had dealt kindly with her daughter.

Closing the door, the miner departed as slowly as he had approached. He hastened to the camp on the hillside, and spread the news among the stalwart miners; and it was not long before these hardy denizens of the gulches were on their way to look upon the first baby born in Pine Log.

Some laughed at the idea of men hurrying to catch a glimpse of a half-breed papoose and its Indian mother; others sneered to feel themselves actuated by a curiosity to gaze at "a d--d Greaser's brat" asleep in its mother's arms; but long before the cabin door was reached a solemn stillness fell upon the men, and when at last they stood around the open door, to their lasting honor be it said, every head was uncovered in respect to babyhood's innocent sleep.

"The purty little Injun!" was the admiring remark of Andy McPherson.

"Only half Injun," corrected Steve Harper; "the other half's Greaser."

"Nice condition fur a father to leave his family," muttered Brock Bulger, shoving his toil-hardened hands deep into his pockets. "Tain't square, tain't human. Let's string him up when he comes back home."

"An' leave the little kid half an orphan?" asked Sam Leonard, the kind-hearted miner who had called the citizens of Pine Log to the cabin.

"Twouldn't make much difference, I reckon, ef the little cuss was left an orphan all together," retorted Brock. "He's a hell of a father, anyhow, to throw off on his wife an' child this way, an' he don't deserve no consideration that I ken see."

"That's so," said Calaveras Joe.

"Besides, we'll all chip in an' take a father's care o' the young 'un, turn an' turn about, yer see," remarked Harper.

The sentiment of the majority seemed to be in favor of summary justice as regarded the cruel deserter of "his family," and the considerate Sam only stipulated for "a meetin', boys, so's everything ken be fixed up reg'lar."

This proposition was agreed to in low tones, and then all eyes turned upon the objects of their solicitude. The murmuring of voices had awakened the mother, and clasping her little one closer in her arms, she stared wildly at the crowd for a moment. The respectful attitude of the men, and their silence, reassured her. The frightened look forsook her eyes entirely when Sam Leonard, urged by the expressive pantomime of his companions, stepped, hat in hand, to the corner where she rested.

"How d'ye feel, Nita?" asked Sam.

"Heap sick, me. Poco tiempo, purty well, mebbe," replied the woman, with a faint attempt to smile.

"How's the baby, Nita?"

"Pickaninny heap cold. Presenta me blanket, Sam?"

"You bet I will, Nita. Here, Brock, go down to my cabin an' fetch two of the heaviest blankets you ken find--an' I say, Brock, fetch up something to eat; something soft an' easy to chew. Hurry up, Brock."

The messenger flew on his errand of mercy.

As soon as every arrangement possible for the comfort of mother and child had been made the crowd dispersed to their several claims, and for days after the recent arrival was the staple of conversation in and around Pine Log Camp. As a matter of course, nothing could be accomplished except at the orthodox miners' meeting. Consequently, on the night following the birth of the child, the majority of the miners comprising Pine Log Camp met in solemn conclave at Sam Leonard's cabin, and choosing Sam president of the meeting in virtue of his being "the original locator," and Charles Babb secretary, proceeded to business.

In the course of this meeting there was much free speech, a little "chaff," a few acrimonious remarks, and a unanimous desire to aid the Indian mother and her new-born babe.

The result of the protracted discussion was the following resolutions, preserved by Babb for future reference:

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God to bestow upon that portion of humanity now located at Pine Log Camp, on the Stanislaus River, a helpless babe:

AND WHEREAS, We do not consider its natural protectors sufficiently competent to care for or provide for it in a proper or Christian like manner:

Therefore, be it resolved, by the miners of the aforesaid camp, That we take charge of the child and raise it from its present degraded condition to a sphere of usefulness:

Resolved, That we use every endeavor to keep it away from the evil influences of Greaser horse thieves and Digger Indians.

Resolved, That we hang its father on the first opportunity.

Resolved, That we educate it in the American language.

That we allow it to vote when it is old enough.

That we name it "Chispa"--first, because its sex is at first unknown; and second, because as it now exists it is a lump of human gold.

Accordingly a Relief Committee visited the hospital cabin for the purpose of carrying out the instructions of the good Samaritans in convention assembled. The cabin was empty.

The mother had folded the blankets around herself and child and fled while the miners were deliberating upon the future of their protégé.

Another meeting was immediately called, and the Relief Committee made their report. Another committee was organized and instructed to find Chispa and Nita, and bring them back to the camp--by force if necessary. This committee started in search of the wanderers, and in the course of the day found them at an Indian rancheria near Deadman's Bar, on the Stanislaus. Every effort was used to induce the woman to return, but she steadily refused, explaining in her broken English that she was more comfortable among her people. The committee did not have the heart to carry out their instructions to the letter, and returned to Pine Log without the objects of their search.

A promise was exacted from the mother, however, that she would remain in that vicinity until the child was able to walk, and that she would then allow it to live at the camp. The chairman of the committee, in his report to the meeting, closed with the remark:

"Injuns is Injuns, boys, an' they ain't to be depended on w'en contracts is to be stuck to."

Perhaps the most important information which the committee brought was that relating to the sex of the child. In the forcible language of Steve Harper, Chispa was "a boy-babby, dern the little yaller cuss's hide."

The winter passed away and spring came. The original inhabitants of Pine Log, in their restless search for the treasures of the placers, had drifted up and down the river. Some of them had migrated to other diggings, and there had been a large influx of new faces. In the absorbing pursuit of wealth Chispa and his mother had been almost forgotten, and it is not at all certain that even if Juan Mendosa, his father, had returned to the camp the resolution referring to his disposition would have been carried out or even attempted.

In the spring of 1851 only Sam Leonard and Brock Bulger still occupied their old cabins, but they knew where many of the former residents were, and in desultory conversations about Chispa, agreed that if Nita kept her promise and brought her boy back, they would duly notify the foster-fathers, and hold another meeting.

The winter of 1852 was unusually severe in the Pine Log section. The river was swollen very high, and all the windmills and sluices were swept away. The weather was extremely cold, and the snow lay deep on the slopes of Table Mountain, covering the bottoms of ravines and gulches, and shrouding the chaparral and stunted buckeyes where it drifted against the mountain side.

A party of men returning from Columbia along the slippery trail paused a moment, just above Pine Log, to look across the river at the snow-clad declivities of the Calaveras side. Why they had halted none of them knew, for there was nothing to look at but a dreary waste of snow, with here and there a cabin or two, from the chimneys of which curled thin streaks of blue smoke suggesting warmth, comfort, and the evening meal. Suddenly, one of them broke the silence:

"Is that a blanket down there?"

"Where?" asked another.

"Down there, close to that leaning pine--to the right--about a hundred feet below the trail," answered the other.

"I see it," said a third; "it's half buried in the snow 'long-side of the pine. It does look like a blanket."

Moved by a common impulse the party hurried to the spot as rapidly as the nature of the ground would permit, and the discoverer began to scrape the snow away from what appeared to be a huge bundle of blankets. In a few moments the heap was uncovered and the brown face of a woman revealed--the face of an Indian squaw. A heavy blanket was closely wrapped around her form, and she seemed to be holding something close to her breast. One of the men gently unrolled the covering, and the face of a little boy, asleep or dead, was disclosed. The woman's arms were folded about the child and her lips were close to its face, as if she had been endeavoring to preserve its life by the warmth of her breath. One of the men knelt beside the motionless form of the woman and bent his head over her chest.

"Is she dead?" asked one of his companions.

"Frozen stiff--almost," answered the other.

"And the baby?" anxiously inquired the miners together.

"I can't tell. Let's carry it to the camp. There may be some life left--perhaps we can save it. No use fooling with the woman, she's gone sure. We'll come back and bury her."

Wrapping the child in one of their heavy coats, the miners hurried to the camp, which, fortunately, was close at hand. A warm fire and the prompt administration of stimulants soon produced an effect and the boy opened his eyes. Finding himself among strangers, and missing his mother, the little foundling began to cry--sobbing in a scared, pitiful tone that brought sympathetic moisture to the eyes of men who scarcely knew the weakness of tears.

Thus did Chispa return to the place of his birth.

Brock Bulger was the only claimant of the waif, Sam Leonard having, a short time before, left for the placers of the Tuolumne, and to Brock was the little innocent given "to educate an' bring up," as the miners expressed it--speaking sarcastically and winking their reserved opinions as to what that "education an' bringing up" would amount to.

As the months rolled on Chispa became more and more proficient in the "American language," and there was not an oath or a slang expression current in the camp that he could not, in due course of time, lisp with remarkable aptitude. He was encouraged in this style of phraseology by the contrast-loving miners.

"It's mighty cute to hear a baby cuss," said Lige Peters; "sounds like an angel joshin' a barkeep. Here, Chispa, what's yer ol' man Brock, anyhow?"

And the little fellow would reply, as he had been taught, in the most earnest tone imaginable:

"A ol' pirate, dol dern his pesky hide."

Whereat the admiring crowd would laugh until the cliffs replied again.

When Chispa was four years old he chewed "nigger heel" and smoked a short clay pipe as complacently as the oldest inhabitant. Whisky did not agree with his delicate constitution at this period of his life, and every effort on his part to swallow the fiery fluid produced untold suffering.

"His young coppers," Jersey was wont to remark, "isn't galvanized yet. Wait 'till he's a few years older--ef double-distilled essence of high-proof tarantula juice fazes then you ken take my head fur a foot-ball."

In every other vice, however, Chispa soon became proficient, and as the practice of these vices was considered "cunning" in one so young, by the baser elements of the camp's society, who were his mentors, he was encouraged in his budding evil propensities. At all hours of the day he might be observed in the centre of some rough, heartless crowd displaying his wicked accomplishments in every phase which the fertile ingenuity of his teachers could suggest. When not engaged in his favorite pastime of stoning the Chinamen on the river, he was studiously absorbing the mysteries of draw poker, seven-up, or some other similar speculative science, under the tuition of some old stager who had long since forgotten every principle of decency or self-respect.

The camp possessed, among other human curiosities, an odd, vagrant genius, known as "Colonel Tom"--a tall, lank Pennsylvanian, who, in addition to a dozen other talents, was something of an orator; and, combining a passably vivid imagination with a smattering of historical learning and considerable experience as a traveler, was an interesting and at times eloquent conversationalist. This rank weed of society gave Chispa "a pedigree," and traced his lineage back to a period when the blood of his ancestors coursed through their veins as blue as indigo.

"Look at him, boys," he would say, pointing to Chispa, "look at him, the degenerate son of illustrious sires. I don't mean Mendosa, but the crowd that flourished behind him in the dim, misty past. Why, Chispa's the lineal descendant of the first families just as much as the Randolphs of Roanoke were; his record is better than Randolph's, for the proud Virginian only claimed nobility on the Injun side, while Chispa can trace his ancestors back to the blue-bloods along both branches of the family tree. On his mother's side we see the princes of her ancient tribe struggling across the glistening ice-floes of the frozen North, fleeing before the more warlike people of middle Asia. Further along we see them steadily wending their way south, peopling the forest and the desert, building mounds, living the lives of nomadic patriarchs, and finally attaining the glories of civilization under the rulers of the Aztec and Inca empires. The decadence of this glorious race, this seventh of the lost tribes of Israel, is strongly marked until it reached Chispa. On his father's side we have the pure Castilian, the chivalry of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. We observe the alliance between the proud peer of Arragon and the Moorish princess of Granada. Then comes the division of the family, when one branch flings beneath the gorgeous banners of Ferdinand and Isabella, and the other mounts guard beneath the pale light of the crescent moon upon the gray walls of the Moorish citadel. Then follows the banishment of Boabdil--the last sigh of the Moor--and we lose sight of a portion of Chispa's ancestors in their perpetual exile. Some of the Christian branch accompany Columbus to the New World, and afterward do deeds of daring and enterprise in the conquests of Cortez and Pizarro, gradually amalgamating with the Aztec race--the race of the father blending with that of the mother--and falling lower and lower in the scale of civilization until Chispa is produced. Look at him, boys. He's of right noble descent, but he's at the bottom of a mighty deep shaft. His father's ancestors sang serenades by brightly flashing Gaudalquivir, and watched the soft moonlight as it played on the sparkling waters of the fountain that once so musically tinkled in the Court of Lions, in the grand, old, legend-haunted Alhambra--and there squats the result of all this hereditary pomp and glory trying to turn jacks from the bottom so that Nigger Bob won't see how he does it. All is vanity, boys, and the older you get the more vanity you'll see. I'm dry. Whose going to call for the liquor?"

Whatever may have been Chispa's lineage, one thing is certain--barbarous instincts were constantly cropping out in his nature. He fought boys of his own size and age, Mexican or Indian, with all the vim of a Spanish knight of the Middle Ages, and he plundered as naturally as did the marauding nobles of feudal times.

At seven years of age he was soundly thrashed by Brock for robbing sluices, and at ten he was considered an arrant nuisance in the camp. At fifteen he was an accomplished gambler, horseman, thief, bruiser (light weight), and, withal, a lazy, good-for-nothing vagabond. Long before Brock Bulger left the camp he had utterly discarded Chispa, after a hard-fought battle in which the ungrateful young reprobate struck him twice across the head with a heavy bludgeon, and only refrained from murdering him outright because the bystanders interfered.

Twenty-five lashes, well laid on, in the presence of the entire camp, did not cure the youth of seventeen of his hereditary propensity for thieving, or cause him to leave the camp. His Mexican and Indian mixture, probably, made him thirst for revenge upon his enemies at some future opportune time.

A long absence from the camp soon after his eighteenth birthday induced many to believe that he had apprenticed himself to his father's trade of horse-stealing, and when he returned to Pine Log well-supplied with money the suspicion was confirmed.

The last act in the mottled career of this unfortunate waif occurred one night in a low Mexican gambling den at Martinez, a camp near his native place.

In a game of monte he had a dispute with the dealer, an old Mexican, and from words they came to blows. The crowd interfered and separated them, but a few moments afterward they stood face to face once more, each armed with a drawn knife--long, keen, murderous blades. Before any one could prevent them they closed in a terrible death-grapple. A few sickening lunges, an oath or two, a horrible groan, a devilish pain-smothered laugh, and the struggle was ended. Both staggered and fell, the old man expiring immediately in the great pool of thick, crimson blood that spread over the floor. The other died in an attempt to drive his knife home once more.

By this time the saloon was full of howling men, wildly gesticulating and jostling each other in their efforts to reach the bodies. Then a silence fell upon the crowd, broken at last by a deep voice near the two corpses:

"It's retribution, boys. The cuss that turned the waters loose hez bin swamped in the freshet--Chispa's killed his father!" The speaker was Sam Leonard.

THE OASIS.

For the Argonaut, by Nathan D. Uner.

"As rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."—Isaiah.

Another day! The long and level rays,
Like molten silver, o'er the desert ran;
And slowly still within that furnace-blaze
Crept on our caravan.

Many behind had found a shifting tomb,
Dying athirst amid the sandy waves—
Camel and rider—and the dread Simoom
Had heaped their lonely graves.

Our Lybian drivers staggered faintly by,
And goaded on our patient "desert-ships;"
We searched in vain the scorched and coppery sky,
And gnawed our raging lips.

At last the camels reared their heads on high,
Snuffed the hot air, and then, as in a dream,
Pushed on, with pace redoubled, and a cry—
A wild and grateful scream.

A tiny speck upon the glassy verge
Grew large and larger as our caravan
Sped o'er the desert, like a broken surge,
'Mid cries of beast and man.

Only some palm trees clustering about
A sphinx half buried in the sandy tides;
But still our camels, with their necks stretched out,
Rushed on with mighty strides.

Then, as we neared the emerald oasis,
The splash of waters fell upon the ear
Like choicest music, and we reeled to kiss
The wave that sparkled near.

Gemming the bald, bleak desert like a star,
And shaded by the palm-leaves interlaced,
It bubbled high, and glistened from afar,
A diamond of the waste.

Its music fanned us like a cooling breeze,
We groveled down to suck the limpid tide,
And the poor camels sank upon their knees,
And drank, all grateful-eyed.

No more we feared the wide, wide sandy seas,
Or clouds of robber-horse upon our flank;
And hymns of praise the holy dervishes
Loud-chanted as we drank.

"Allah il Allah!" Through the burning air
And o'er the plains their hoarse thanksgivings swept;
Our bosoms beat in accord with the prayer,
And, as we drank, we wept.

Oh, many a time since then my life hath seemed
A wide Sahara, desolate and apart,
And the sweet memory of that prayer hath streamed
Like music to my heart;

Till, pressing on, half fainting and athirst,
Soft oases of faith my journey graced,
And cooling waters from their bosoms burst
To cheer me o'er the waste.

Saints and Sinners.

There goes a woman, who, loving too ill
(Was there doom in her blood?), in time became Dark with ulcers of mind and will—
Spotted with sin and shame.
But I think, by the awful look in her eyes
(The woman who fled to the Lord looked so),
That down in her heart she moans and cries
With immedicable woe.

There goes a column of circumspects. See,
How clean and comely, and sleek and fair,
And unto the ultimate degree
Prim and proper they are.
Ah, worldling! you need not pry nor peek
Into their secrets for fault or flaw;
They are not of your kidney, frail and weak—
They are strong, and walk by the Law.

But see! They have caught a glimpse of her skirts.
How keen they are on the scent for sin!
And the hound in the heart of each asserts
Itself, and the pack begin.
Bravely, my masters! Mangle her now!
What to you is her hideous stress?
Tear and trample from foot to brow
Her clothed unhallow'dness.

There, there—enough now. Handsomely done!
How whitely your teeth gleam when you snarl,
And how, like an arrowed deer, did run—
Whither?—the maddened girl.
Is that a gout of blood on your glove?
You say her breath had a noisome smell?
And something, I think, was said of Love,
By Some One—can you tell?

BENJAMIN D'ISRAELI.

"I shall sit down now; but the time will come when you will hear me."

Forty-one years ago, in the British House of Commons, these words were uttered by a new-comer, a gayly-dressed young man of Jewish aspect, who, in the attempt to deliver his maiden speech, was coughed down, and who, while beating an oratorical retreat, delivered himself of a prophecy. His name heads this article. He is called, besides, "Earl of Beaconsfield." This, though a bit of verbal embroidery by which he is decorated, makes no part of his genuine self. The coronet that is supposed to adorn his brow is made of tinsel. It can not change the man, for the day following that upon which he put it on he was still Benjamin d'Israeli, and nothing else, in spite of the plumes that disguised and disfigured him. His career stands apart and by itself. It is worth considering. The first that is known of his ancestors is that they lived Spain in the fifteenth century, and that, being of the Hebrew race, they were by the Inquisition, then rampant under Torquemada, driven abroad, and that they finally settled in Venice, whence one of them, Benjamin d'Israeli, departed for, and made his home in, England in 1749. This man had a genius for commerce, and an æsthetic taste. But he imparted neither of them to his son Isaac, who led the life of a bookworm, and became a hermit in a library. In 1805 a son was born to him, and was called after his grandfather, Benjamin. So d'Israeli then became a fixed name, since two Englishmen bore it; and thus was realized the ancestral wish, on taking refuge in Venice, that "they assume the name of d'Israeli—a name never borne before or since by any other family, in order that their race might be forever recognized." The young man never went to school. He entered no university. Aided by a few private tutors, his father taught him all he knew. There was no money in the family; and so the youngster was to be dedicated to toil. A legal light takes him in charge, and, having no son, engages to leave to his student and protégé the toils and benefits of a lucrative professional business. This, however, soon become an irksome life, and the student wearied of his task. The caterpillar of the law soon emerged into a butterfly of literature. He wrote novels; he frequented society; he studied the peculiarities and the weaknesses of the titled dames who, in their homes of ease and superabundance of social chatter, unconsciously betrayed the secrets of such of their dozing husbands as happened to be intrusted with the secrets of state. The youth determined to be a politician—possibly a statesman. The first he knew he could, the latter he hoped to be. Fired with the idea, and conscious of the lack of the necessary connections he saw the necessity of fastening himself on some one who could promote his elevation. As Sheridan Knowles puts it:

"A dwarf may have a giant for his friend,
And thus be master of a giant's strength."

In 1826 the novel called Vivian Grey made its appearance. Of course every one remembers that novel. It is a prophetic photograph of the present Prime Minister of Great Britain. Who is "Vivian Grey?" The grandson of the exile who became a Venetian, and then a denizen of England. And who is the "Marquis of Carabas?" The man over whose shoulders this Venetian grandson intends to climb to power, and that man turns out to be Lord Derby. But before we go further the question of the Jewish disability must be disposed of. This young man is a Jew. In 1753 Parliament declared that Jews might be naturalized. But in the following year, in obedience to the popular clamor, this law was repealed. What chance then was there for a Jew? Certainly none. Not one of them could become an Englishman. They were tolerated, but proscribed. Therefore, the young d'Israeli must abjure the faith of his fathers. But why any young gentleman should even follow the faith of his fathers, though a thing unknown to an American, was quite well known, and still is, in England. The poet Rogers makes his acquaintance—Samuel Rogers, the banker, the first example of mammon and poesy combined. Rogers takes the lad to an Episcopalian Church and has him baptized. This was in 1817. Thenceforth, he is to be an Englishman and a Protestant. But does he so become? The sequel shows no such thing. He renounces the faith of his fathers in order that, in his new garb, he may better become its "champion." He never ceases to be a Jew. In his writings he magnifies the Hebrew. In Tancréd, "Sidonia," the child of Israel, is the type of the representative Jewish brain, and that is to dominate the world. He remembers his ancestral rights, for he has been aroused by the lofty ire of Shylock, who, in delirium of argumentative passion, demands:

"I am a Jew! Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer as a Christian is? If you prick us do we not bleed? If you tickle us do we not laugh? If you poison us do we not die? And if you wrong us shall we not revenge?"

And is his race not revenged? Look at its representative. A poor Jewish boy, born in a country in which, by the fundamental law, a few creatures set themselves apart, possessed of unbounded wealth, with most of the land, with titles and pretensions recognized by law, encouraging them to think themselves, on their way from the cradle to the grave, as born of some superior clay, he rises by his native gifts superior to them all. He finds their head of state a Queen, and he amuses himself by making her an Empress. He finds a murmur of discontent among the people and among the Commons. They object to the title of Empress. He says: "Oh, that means only an Empress in India;" and as he folds his legs while they vote, she emerges an Empress everywhere, and he walks forth an Earl. The war rages. Russia, obedient to the testament of Peter the Great, once more advances on Constantinople. England seems quiescent. But the Turk is subdued. And then the Jew begins to move. He orders the British admiral to creep up toward Constantinople. He brings forward the dusky troops from India. The opposition snuffs immediate war and ruin to the empire. Gladstone argues, John Bright protests, Punch scoffs, and the Times thunders. But the Jew quietly takes the morning train for Berlin, and the Queen, having no warrior wounded and not a shilling expended, sees a great war brought to a close, and her dominions enriched by the annexation of an island of priceless value—Cyprus—more than one hundred and fifty miles long and forty wide; a veritable warlike key, that did not cost a shilling; a sealike gem, whether for strategy or for romance; the birth-place of Venus, for there, if we believe the poets, she came dripping from the sea. To return a little. The semi-converted Hebrew disdains the remembrance of his oratorical fiasco of 1837—the first year of Victoria's reign—and in 1839 he begins to gain the attention of the House of Commons. As a boy proceeds in learning to swim, he strikes out cautiously.

Daniel O'Connell had said of him: "If this fellow's genealogy could be traced, I believe he would be found to be a lineal descendant of the impenitent thief who died on the cross." He challenged the Irish agitator, who, having already killed one man in a duel, declined the chance of a repetition of that luxury, and the whole matter was soon forgotten. With the strange man's connection with, and opposition to, political parties we have no room to deal—doubtless, he was a Radical-Tory and a Tory-Radical, and, finally, a Conservative—but all that concerns rather the finesse of parties than the substantial feature of his nature, with which, alone, at this distance, we are able to deal. Suffice it that, from obscurity, he leaped to a high place in a kingdom, and that circumstance, per se, interests an American; for here we pretend that there exists, between nothingness and renown, no artificial impediments. We, therefore, feel inquisitive when we hear that this man, circulating through a crowd of English Tories, boldly says: "I was obliged to educate my party." And that, at Berlin, where the various nations' chosen ones went for converse, for compromise and adjustment, this man loudly proclaims: "I do not come here to yield." On this side, we innocently ask, if you did not go to yield, why did you go at all? Why did you not send an agent with a power of attorney, authorized to agree to your foregone conclusions? It is plain that, by the weak condition of the Russian army, by the difficulty of obtaining a loan, crowned by this Jew's superb audacity, the Berlin day was won, and the grandson of the exiled Hebrew goes back to his Royal Mistress, laden with the trophies of his pilgrimage. We may recall the touching lines by which Shelly commences the dedication to his wife of his poem, "The Revolt of Islam," written while absent from her:

"And now my summer's task is done, dear Mary,
And the fruit is at thy feet."

The flower-beds near Charing are rifed of their sweets to adorn his triumphant path. Even his political foes leave their seats to join the swelling throng. All England rises to welcome him. In his subdued visage and in his quiet manner there may be found the traces of that feeling of revenge that recalls the thunders of Sinai. But what is said by his enemies? Alas, he has none! He walks the earth alone. He has no ancestors. He has no daughter, no son, to inherit his fortune or his fame. His foes are in no enmity to him; they feel hostility only to the measures his genius expresses. If he were to die to-morrow they would neither disparage his deeds nor attend his funeral. He has a melancholy remembrance. He was enamored of literature, and he can receive the welcome of his pillow at night, and think he has done something for it. He paid a tribute to letters in making the author of Lucille, "Owen Meredith," the magnate of India. He chose the title of Beaconsfield for his wife and for himself, because that spot is one not known in song and story by the achievements of the Norman robber, or of any of his followers now reveling in the factitious splendor of his successes, but because the ground is hallowed by being the resting place of the Poet Waller and of the literary statesman, Edmund Burke. These suggestions concern a moral phenomenon going on before our eyes. We are too much bent upon material things to heed it. If it had been a tradition coming down to us as of a hundred years' growth it would have been read as a fairy tale.

The following psychological incident is of interest: A gentleman of Louisville, Kentucky—a man of fine nervous organization—was taking his afternoon siesta; his daughter, a young lady of seventeen, sitting by his side, with her hand in his, and reading. As he passed from the wakeful state into one of semi-slumber he saw, or seemed to see, appear at the foot of his bed, a tall man, with a sorrowful expression upon his face, who, bending down tenderly, lifted up a coffin and disappeared. He was so disturbed by the strange and unaccountable nature of his vision that, after tossing restlessly for a few moments, he opened his eyes and said:

"Daughter, I believe I cannot sleep to-day, and will get up."

Looking up from her book, in which she was evidently deeply absorbed, she said:

"Papa, this is a strange book that I am reading."

"What is it?" said he.

"The life of Maria Antoinette," she replied, and then read from the pages before her a recital of the exact incident that had just constituted his dream.

A volume of poems by Joaquin Miller, entitled "Songs of Far Away Lands," will be published in London in September. The work will be dedicated to Lord Houghton.

ODE TO THE MOSQUITO.

For the Argonaut, by John Vance Cheney.

Could thorns and thistles sprout a lung
Through which their sharpness might be sung;
Were nettles like a baby born
To yell from darkness till the morn;
Were Hades housed in one small thing,
Could curses buzz about and sing,
Hot taper tortures serenade
With whines on flying fiddles played;
Had slivers wings and heinous heart
To act the true assassin's part;
Did evil hatch itself through flies,
Avernian atoms in disguise—
Thou murderous notes of midnight air,
Straight could I place ye then and there.

Whence sully thy ferocious flock
As slowly my rheumatic clock
Goes hobbling through the solemn hours?
Whence come those pricking powers,
Minute, stilettoed villainies,
To sap the vitals of mine ease?
What mighty midge, in conscience's stead,
Disturbs the refuge of my bed,
Or pauses on infernal route
To drain life's very fluid out?

O water-risen, di'p'tral devil,
Thou starv'd, wizen runt of revel;
O empty wickedness with wings,
Thou insect-imp equipped with stings;
O awl for flesh of human kind,
Gaunt gnat with a miner's mind;
Thou pestilence on pinions grav,
Thou embryo eagle mad for prey—
What still more cussed can I say,
Thou hornet's ghost turned t'other way?

One moment! Lo! upon my wall
As plain as in Belshazzar's hall:
"When heaven and earth and hell were made,
Tartarean leavings were mislaid;
These Satan was allowed to see to,
And thence evolved the d—d mosquito."

SACRAMENTO, July 20, 1878.

The career of England's present Premier is the romance of the century. He was of a proscribed class, poor, unknown, and of humble family. Now he ranks the foremost man of the foremost nation, and holds a place in the esteem and affection of the English people that has not within the century been accorded to valor in arms or success in state craft. We can but admire the genius of the man who has thus carved his name above those of warriors, statesmen, scholars, or men of hereditary birth. Disraeli owes his greatness and his success not to the accident of family or fortune, but to the strength and vigor of an intellect that has enabled him to triumph over all obstacles that lay in his path to the achievement of real greatness. It is fitting that to such a man the English subjects residing in San Francisco should convey their appreciation of his services to the English crown, and realm, and people. They have done so in preparing for him an appropriate gift: a gift with a meaning; a gift that has its significance, and is as valuable as appropriate. To Anderson & Randolph, jewelers of the clock tower, has been entrusted the preparation of a casket, from a design drawn by Mr. A. W. Stott of their house. It is engraved with the Beaconsfield arms; apartments, inlaid with gold quartz, contain the choicest specimens of California ores; the soldier of Britain, the soldier of India, the British sailor, the British arms, with rose, shamrock, and thistle, and the arms of California are embossed upon its sides in gold carving. The casket is to contain an address in vellum, containing the signatures of the donors. The design of the handles is a crossed pen and sword, surmounted by a crest in gold of the arms of the Earl of Beaconsfield. When completed it will be a most unique and elegant gift, worthy of the gentlemen who present it, the artist who designed it, the artisans who manufacture it, and the most eminent statesman and diplomatist to whom it is to be presented.

A great revolution has been going on among our liberty-loving German fellow-citizens of Cincinnati. The battle has been fought and won. Lager beer is three cents a glass!—a schooner for half a dime! Is the spirit of German liberty dying out among our adopted German fellow-citizens of this empire of the Pacific? Are they slaves, to longer submit to the tyrant brewer? Shall this land of excellent barley and superior hops rest supinely under the infliction of ten cents a glass for lager from beer-bloated brewers? We invoke the shades of the immortal Gambrinus. We call upon the memory of all the philosophers, poets, and warriors, who have drawn their inspiration and their valor from malt, to rise like yeast in their invincible might and assist us to secure the inalienable right of cheap beer. We demand of our newly-elected delegates to the Constitutional Convention—of Neunaber, Freud, Kleine, and Beerstecher—that they raise their eloquent voices in vindication of the rights of our stomachs, and in the name of that kind of liberty for which Hessians fought on our ensanguined battle-fields, secure a provision in our organic law that will guarantee to us and our descendants, for all time to come, lager beer at three cents a glass.

Thank God, the labor problem is solved. Gold has been discovered on the ocean's beach. Beerstecher, Clitus Barbour, Dr. O'Donnell, Wellock, and Kearney have become honest miners. The Chronicle is the organ, if not the discoverer, of these new gold fields. And only four miles away from the sand-lots; only four miles from lager, whisky, billiards, poker, cinch, seven up, and the other seductive allurements of civilization. Now if the city will only build a railroad to the beach, cushion the car seats, limit the fare, and guarantee good wages for eight hours' labor, we may conclude that the workingmen's millennium has come. We are sorry to observe, however, that Clitus and his associates are endeavoring to monopolize the beach of God's ocean by securing a thousand yards of the frontage, thus endeavoring to make themselves bloated monopolists of black sand. The next thing we shall expect is the organization of stock companies, an excitement in stock circles, and an endeavor to bull, bear, and corner the sea waves and sand-dunes in search of gold dust.

THE DIGNITY OF LABOR.

The best servant we ever had was an English gentleman. He was intelligent, courteous, diligent, and fully understood all the duties of his position. His knowledge of horses was thorough. He not only drove and groomed well, but was fully up in the treatment of all the ailments and diseases of which good horses in this country seem to be continually afflicted. He was a man of about thirty-five years of age, and came to us from the mines with no other indorsement than his own modest bearing. One day he asked us in reference to drafts and bills of exchange, remarking that he had sent certain moneys to his family in England and had never heard whether they had been received or not. Subsequently—and after he had been in our employ nearly two years—he came to us and said he desired to terminate his engagement as soon as we could supply his place. He then said: "I am the son of an English gentleman. My eldest brother is in Parliament, my younger brothers are partners in the banking house of Blank, Blank & Co. My career in California has, of late years, been an unfortunate one. My letters miscarried; my drafts did not reach home; I was overtaken by poverty; I felt that my family had abandoned me, and I now learn that they thought me dead." He showed us long and loving letters from his mother, his brothers, and sisters; ample remittances were furnished him to return. He had cut slips from the English journals containing accounts of his family, and they more than confirmed his statements of their social standing. He returned to England, and we have since heard from him moving in the circle to which he was born and educated. We narrate this incident as illustrative of the fact that the true gentleman, and the educated man, can honorably fill even a menial station, and not be demoralized or destroyed at a temporary run of ill luck and adverse fortune. We are informed that, during the summer vacations of our Eastern colleges, many students of Yale and Harvard go to the seaside and mountain resorts, where they find employment as hotel servants, and thus earn money enough to continue their collegiate studies and enable themselves to graduate. When we were in Europe we observed in hotels, as waiters, porters, etc., many young men speaking several languages, and evidencing that they were persons of intelligence and education. This is especially noticeable in Switzerland; young gentlemen of good families, who intend to adopt as a business the keeping of a hotel, enter themselves as apprentices. They become cook, porter, waiter, clerk, and thus advance to the position, where they bring experience and practical knowledge to the business in which they finally engage. The wealthy business men—mechanics, manufacturers, shopkeepers, ship-builders, bankers, and professional men—of Europe, as a rule, educate one or more sons to continue their pursuits, and thus it is not infrequent to see old established houses whose business has been handed down several generations in a line of unbroken succession from father to son. This will doubtless come in time to our country; but it will be when parents educate their sons to the fact that any honest employment is honorable, and when over-crowded professions shall have convinced aspirants for professional honors that it is better to prosper and grow rich in some industrial pursuit, than to beg and starve upon the ragged edge of some more genteel employment.

The Board of Education has consolidated certain cosmopolitan schools, and made a saving of $7,000 per annum. This is the first check to a great abuse. It is the first step to the correction of a great evil. It costs twelve hundred thousand dollars a year to administer the free common schools of San Francisco. The cosmopolitan schools are doing more harm than they are doing good. Our advice is to abolish cosmopolitan schools and discharge all special teachers; to no longer teach Latin, French, German, music, drawing, calisthenics, nor any except the rudimentary branches of the English language; to dismiss nearly all the male teachers, and employ only competent females. One male teacher should be retained in every school-house to maintain discipline and do the flogging. The boys' and girls' high school and the grammar schools should be converted into schools where primary branches of English education are taught. If foreigners do not like this, let them leave the country. If our rich people desire to give their boys and girls a better education than our plan would give, let them send their children to private schools and pay for their education. The whole present system of free common schools is abnormal, absurd, hurtful, and extravagant. It is communism disguised, under the pretense that a higher and better education is a panacea for all social and political evils—a communism inspired by demagogues, in the interest of pedagogues, book-makers, contractors, janitors, and boards of education. The only class that it was originally intended to aid, namely: the poor, are unable to avail themselves of the opportunity to give their children the higher education because of the cost of books, clothing, etc., and their inability to spare their children from remunerative labor past the ages of twelve and fourteen. The first step to real reform would be to abolish the Board of Education and devolve its duties upon the Board of Supervisors, hoping that out of twelve members a committee of educated gentlemen might be chosen who have more sense, intelligence and integrity than has composed our ordinary Boards of Education. We had one Board composed of twelve persons, seven of whom were Irish Catholic Democrats—all ignorant, and not all honest.

In Memoriam.

E. P. DIED JULY 19, 1878.

The Æolian harp its low vibration gives,
The wind sweeps by, and still the sufferer lives;
The wind sweeps by, the rose's leaves are shed,
The lily droops—a bright young life has fled.

O uneful harp, thy breathing notes renew;
O flower of love, retain that rosy hue;
O lily fair, it is the morning light—
Why fade and vanish in the gloom of night?

A brighter dawning hears the harp's sweet strain,
In brighter sunlight blooms the flower again;
They breathe the life no loving hand could stay,
And, floating upward, seek the Perfect Day.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORMS.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Under the above heading there appeared in your issue of 20th July instant a very able letter, bearing the signature of C. T. Hopkins, which I have read with much interest. In support of the recommendations therein contained for the redress of the great evils so graphically depicted, under which this community is suffering, I take the liberty of directing attention to the advantages and privileges which our Australian cousins are now practically realizing under their Constitution, embodying, as they do, the principles so ably advocated by Mr. Hopkins. Local, or municipal, government is there, completely and absolutely, delegated to the TAXPAYING inhabitants of the respective municipalities, and free from all interference by the General Government. These bodies become the nurseries, or preparatory colleges, for the training of legislators for the supreme Parliament of the State, furnishing, as they do, practical illustrations for the public to judge of the fitness of candidates for higher honors. Upon my arrival in this State—some eight years since—after a previous residence of many years in Australia, I was astonished to find that the Supreme Legislature held its session only once in two years; that such session was limited to the period of ninety days; that the entire community, during such term, were in constant dread, and only appeared to breathe freely and recover that degree of equanimity possible under such a state of circumstances when the time expired and the opportunity of perpetrating further mischief by the representatives of the people (save the mark!) had terminated. That there is, unfortunately, good cause for this apprehension subsequent experience soon convinced me, and the proceedings of the last Legislature furnish the most deplorable examples of the great evils and defects that so urgently demand a remedy. As you may suppose, my conception of the majesty and functions of Parliament received a severe shock. This supreme tribunal of the state I had looked upon (what in truth it should be) as the palladium of the rights and liberties of the people, and where all the wrongs and errors existing in the body politic would be remedied. As Mr. Hopkins so tersely states: "The people are the real sovereigns under our system." With the view of illustrating in what manner this sovereignty can be thoroughly and properly exercised, I will, with your permission, briefly explain the principles of the governments now successfully in operation in the Australian colonies, and where Republicanism, or government of the people by the people, obtains more perfectly than in any other part of the world.

The distinctive character, and the keystone of its success, is what is known as "Responsible government," comprising representatives of the people, elected by ballot under almost universal suffrage, who assume certain executive offices with the emoluments attached thereto, and conduct the government of the country; which offices or positions, however, they can only retain so long as they can command a majority of the votes of their fellow representatives.

The Government is invested with the patronage of appointing to all new offices, as well as the filling of all vacancies that may occur, and for the judicious exercise of which, as well as for all legislation, it is held responsible. Upon their failure to carry their measures, or upon a direct vote of the House distinctly affirming a want of confidence, the ministry must retire and resign their offices; retaining them only until their successors are appointed by the Governor, who, as the head of the executive, must carry into effect the policy of his responsible ministers. When it so happens that parties are evenly divided, so that it is difficult to obtain a working majority on either side, then it becomes the duty of the Governor to dissolve the Parliament, and the people have the opportunity of electing an entirely new one. The terms for which Parliaments are elected vary from three to five years, but they may be sooner terminated as above indicated. It will thus be seen that the people exercise a very beneficial and controlling influence over their representatives, and "as eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," so also, it will be found, is a powerful well-organized opposition the true safeguard of the nation. Instead of subordinate officers being elected, they are appointed by the Government from qualified candidates, who must pass certain examinations; and which offices, being fairly remunerated, are permanently held during good behavior and the efficient discharge of the duties devolving on them.

It will thus be noted that this system insures the most efficient and faithful discharge of the public business, in which the whole community are interested and concerned, and at the same time provides an avenue of honorable occupation for such as may desire to qualify themselves, and devote their services in this manner.

To introduce this system into the United States, and thus effect the regeneration so earnestly needed, the following suggestions are submitted:

(1.) That the President should be elected by the entire nation for a term of years, and, as the head of the executive, must fulfill his duties in accordance with the advice of his responsible ministers.

(2.) The responsible ministers, chosen by the President from the representatives of the people, must be confirmed by their respective constituencies re-electing them, the acceptance of office having the effect of vacating their seats.

(3.) The same principle should prevail in the government of the several States, the Governors acting under and with the advice of their responsible ministers.

(4.) The suffrage should embrace all adults over twenty-one years of age, without distinction of sex, citizens of the United States, duly registered, capable of reading and writing, and having resided six months in the district where the vote can be recorded.

To obtain the reforms now shadowed forth, in a constitutional and effective manner, it is suggested that means similar to those adopted in Great Britain in obtaining the repeal of the Corn Laws and other important reforms, should be organized; and the recent establishment of granges throughout the United States would appear to offer the most desirable organizations for the discussion and agitation of this truly national object. An earnest, faithful, and patriotic committee should be formed, whose duty should be to thoroughly acquaint themselves with the working of the institutions referred to, and then submit a practical adaptation, with probable improvements, for adoption in the United States.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

DEAR EM:—It was "borne in" on me, as the saying goes, yesterday, to see what I could find of interest in quite a different line from anything I have yet told you of. With that laudable purpose in view, I dropped into Will & Finck's, on Market Street, near Fourth. Tom says I have made nothing but cutting remarks ever since; but then, between ourselves, Tom is such a goose, I never notice him any more, except to smile graciously when he brings me a peace offering in the shape of a box of bon bons from Townsend's, or a lovely hanging basket, as he did the other day from Sievers'. Now, I really didn't expect to find anything special there; and, to my surprise, was beguiled into a downright enthusiasm over their show of cutlery before I got away. Such splendid carvers, with handles of ivory and buckhorn cunningly carved; such cute little contrivances for table use—ice tongs, cheese scoops, mutton-leg-holders, to steady the end of the joint while one carves; skewer-pullers, that nip the skewer as in a vice and draw it out easily. These are all made in their own establishment, as well as the carvers, which are really a specialty. The latter are somewhat peculiarly shaped, a sort of half scimeter, and are patented. Mr. Finck told me that they have, for the last three years, supplied Tiffany with all the carvers they sell, last week sending them a case of twenty-five sets. This is something we may well be proud of, and looks as if we are really beginning to run alone, if we are only twenty-seven years old. I took a look into the work-shop, which runs through from Market to Stevenson Street, where twenty-six workmen are kept steadily employed, even in these dull times. But I can't pretend to tell you of all the various kinds of sharp-edged tools, knives, scissors, and the like. They "must be seen to be appreciated." Tell Clara I have found something absolutely new in table linens for her at the Atle de Paris. They are of plain—that is, unstamped—linen, and are heavily embroidered, a quarter of a yard deep, in a chain-stitching of red, blue, and yellow, which is known as "Broderie Russe," although they are really much more Turkish in character. The napkins, which are simply immense, are similar in design. Some are done in red alone, the richly ornamented pattern of these being buds and flowers combined. Then there are others that have only a broad satin stripe round the edge, which are intended for ladies to work for themselves, a large monogram being the prettiest. You will know this quality, for they come from the Belfast house of Brown & Company, which formerly supplied only the aristocracy of Great Britain, but of late years has opened its doors to us poor commoners. Their pattern-book is a real work of art, and from it one may select designs for napery and have them made to order without extra cost. The latest kink is to embroider one's own stockings, the open-work Lisle thread in unbleached tints being the correct thing, and the embroidering is done with silk floss, an over-stitch, with a filling in of lace-stitch. There are some very pretty ones, just suited for the purpose, at this same house. Roman 'what a capital chance to quote the line, "The noblest Roman of them all," has just been getting in some unique fancies in letter papers. One is gilt-edged, with corners sometimes rounded, sometimes cut off sharp, and again in an inverted scallop; another has a monogram in blue, and the date, "San Francisco," in full, on the top of the page, and also on the flap of the envelope. Colored-edged cards for short notes come in pretty wooden cases, with the envelopes to match. Mrs. Ward's book, "Sensible Etiquette," is attracting considerable notice, it is so thoroughly practical and sensible. See how prettily she sums up the true ladyhood she inculcates in it: "At the highest, ladyhood implies a spirituality made manifest in poetic grace." She has something to say about pretty much everything. Another new volume I dipped into while loitering at Roman's is, "What Our Girls Ought to Know," by Dr. Mary J. Studley, Professor of the Natural Sciences in the State Normal School at Framingham, Massachusetts. It is full of the grandest truths, put in sweet, simple, yet vigorous language. As Mr. Roman himself said, in calling my attention to it, "I wish I could put a copy into the hands of every girl in San Francisco." I hear a whisper in the air that the old-fashioned "cottage" bonnet, the same as our fathers are always saying our mothers looked so bewitching in when they were young, are coming in again. Do you recollect the pretty little poem—I think it was N. P. Willis':

"Tying her bonnet under her chin,
She tied a young man's heart within."

Our milliners are resting on their laurels just now, and one can not find any real novelties. In untrimmed hats and bonnets the most popular shapes are the "Mercedes," the "Princesse" and the "Tivoli," for full dress, and the "Mary" and the "Berkeley," an imported English hat for morning wear. The pretty "Golden Gate," a coarse, mixed straw, is very neat when not tortured into unnatural shapes, its normal condition being a flat, broad brim, and the suitable garniture, field flowers and veiling. The largest assortment of untrimmed millinery I find at Ross', under the Baldwin. By the way, there is a new store just opening, in dry goods and fancy goods, in the block below, that is making a very fresh, pretty show in its windows. I hear, too, that Moffatt, late of Keane & O'Connor, goes in with O'Connor, and will open business in the new premises to be remodeled from the old Morton House. A little oddity in the way of jewelry I saw the other day was a pair of bracelets made of peach stones, curiously carved, and linked together with silver. They are at Mayer & Son's, 313 Kearney Street, where the sign "Sea Bean Jewelry" has so long tantalized me that I finally went in to investigate. They are made in lockets and sleeve-buttons, and come from the Florida coast. But Mr. Mayer's specialty I found to be Japanese goods, in which he is a large dealer, while on Montgomery Street, the Duke of Manchester having purchased largely of his curios; Schuyler Colfax, too, laid in a supply of "Josses" and such like trifles during his late lecture visit here. Some of the specimens of Japanese crystals are very fine, as are also the carved ivory work and frosted work in silver, card-cases, and so on. California diamonds are another specialty. There is no end of pretty foot coverings just now, though the favorites still continue to be the low shoe in at least a half dozen modifications. Kast, who, since he has been on Market Street, has been doing business enough to satisfy any one, has some of the most tempting botlines this side of Paris; in fact there are plenty that have not long been out of that dear, delightful, naughty city. They may talk hygiene and hygienic reform as much as they like, but a French shoe, even with the most trying of heels, will reign supreme. The newest things out are the "Aimée," a low shoe finished off by a cut steel buckle, and the "Princesse," with three and five straps. The steel buckles are on everything, even the white and light-colored shoes for ballroom wear. They are particularly pretty on the latter, looking in the gaslight exactly like diamonds. The rumor that square toes were to be insisted on by fashion seems to have been false, for all of the newest styles have exceedingly pointed ones. Luckily, fashions nowadays change so rapidly that there is no time to go to extremes, or one might think there was some danger of our adopting the yard-long toes of—whose reign was it?—when the gallants wore the tips of their boots fastened to their girdles by chains to keep from falling over them. Fancy President Hayes issuing sumptuary laws prohibiting one of our society sharps from exceeding the regulation length in shoe leather! But before they get too absurd, presto! change, we'll have something else. "There is a providence," you know, as the divine William says, "that shapes our ends," though, come to think of it, I don't believe he meant the sentiment in exactly this connection. Here is something very naughty, of course, and I don't mean to "go and do likewise," by any means, but just another proof that we American girls are not one bit worse than our prudish English sisters, even if we do scandalize proper folks sometimes. It is called the language of the glove and is supposed to be an improvement on that of the fan and handkerchief:

Drop a glove—Yes.
Crumple the gloves in the right hand—No.
Half unglove the left hand—Indifference.
Tap the left shoulder with the gloves—Follow me.
Tap the chin with the gloves—I love you no longer.
Turn the gloves inside out—I hate you!
Fold the gloves neatly—I should like to be with you.
Put on the left glove, leaving the thumb uncovered—Do you love me?
Drop both gloves—I love you.
Twirl the gloves round the finger—Be careful; we are watched.
Slap the back of the hand with the gloves—I am vexed.
Take a glove in each hand and separate the hands—I am furious.

Ever your own, LILLIAN DUBOIS.

Paris correspondence: I was to-day in that part of the Fair where they keep toys. It was the French part. The French have the biggest part because they are at home. The rest of us—English, Italians, Dutch, Belgians, Russians, Turks, Japanese, Americans, and Chinamen—have not so many things to show as the French, because we have to carry them further and it costs us more to come and live here. The French will not let us live here for nothing. They make us pay for every mouthful we eat. But when I saw the millions and millions and lots and cords of toy fish here, as big as California salmon, which would swim in a tub of water as well as any live fish when wound up by a key which went into their backs; when I saw the real toy locomotives and steamboats which had real machinery, and went with real steam; when I saw the toy balloons, some of them made in the shape of a man, and as big as a real man, which you could hold by a cord while he went up in the air and floated and bloated in the clouds on his back; when I saw a toy girl in a bathing dress, about half as long as your arm, in a tub of water swimming around just as well and a great deal better than a great many live girls, for she struck out with her arms and her legs just as natural as life, and wound up, like the swimming fish, by a key that started some hidden machinery in the small of her back, which went until she ran down and then she floated around loose; she could swim on her back, too, when you turned her over. I say, when I saw all these things and a great many more that never were heard of or made at all when I was a boy—when we had little tops, old clay marbles, corn cobs, clam shells and sand hills to play with—I felt sorry that I hadn't put off being born until a little later in life, that I might have some of these toys to play with.

Crab Soup.
Figs' Kidneys stewed with Sherry Wine and Served with Rice.
Broiled Breast of Lamb. Green Peas.
Tomatoes a l'Espanole. Potato Salad.
Swedish Cream (see Vol. I, No. 13).
Fruit-bowl of Peaches, Pears, Plums, Grapes, Apples, and Figs.

TO MAKE CRAB SOUP.—Take one large boiled crab, pick the meat from the claws into shreds, and put into a cool place until wanted. Scoop out the pulpy part and the white meat from the body, pound it well with about half the quantity of rice boiled in broth; dilute with a pint of rich stock, rub through a screen, put into a saucepan, and keep in a cool place. Just before sending to table, put it over the fire, and stir with a wooden spoon. Take care that it does not get too hot, as that would curdle the soup. Finish seasoning by adding half a pint of boiling cream and a little cayenne pepper; then pour the soup into a tureen containing the shredded meat from the claws previously made hot in a small quantity of stock.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

XXXVI.—THE VENUS OF MILO.

(The following is said to have "the dignity of Minerva, the fidelity and devotion of Andromache, and the fondness, passion, and despair of Dido, all combined.")

Goddess of dreams! mother of love and sorrow!
Such sorrow as from love's fair promise flows
Such love as from love's martyrdom doth borrow
That conquering calm which only sorrow knows.

Venus madonna! so serene and tender
In thy calm after-bloom of life and love,
More fair than when of old thy sea-born splendor
Surprised the senses of Olympian Jove.

Not these the lips that with impassioned pining
Poured subtle heats through Adon's languid frame,
Till over cheek and brow their kisses raining
Thrilled to his heart and turned its frost to flame.

Thy soul, transcending passion's wild illusion,
Its fantasy, and fever, and unrest,
Brood's tenderly in Thought's divine seclusion
O'er some lost love-dream lingering in thy breast.

Thy face seems touched with pity for the anguish
Of earth's disconsolate and lonely hearts—
For all the lorn and loveless lives that languish
In solitary homes and sordid marts;

With pity for the faithlessness and feigning,
The vain repentance and the long regret,
The perfumed lamps in lonely chambers waning,
The untouched fruit on golden salvers set;

With pity for the patient watchers yearning
Through lonely casements over midnight moors,
Thrilled by no echo of far feet returning
Through the blank darkness of the empty doors;

With sorrow for the coy sweet buds that cherish
In virgin pride Love's luxury of gloom,
And in their fair unfolded beauty perish,
Fading like flowers that knew not how to bloom;

With sorrow for the ever-blown pale roses
That waste their perfumes on the wandering air;
For all the penalty that Life imposes
On Passion's dream, on Love's divine despair.

XXXVII.—NOW AND THEN.

"Sing me a song, my nightingale,
Hid in among the twilight flowers;
And make it low," he said, "I pray,
And make it sweet." But she said, "Nay;
Come when the morn begins to trail
Her golden glories o'er the gray—
Morn is the time for love's all-hail!"
He said, "The morning is not ours!"

"Then give me back my heart's delight,
Hid in among the twilight flowers,
The kiss I gave you yesterday.
See how the moon this way has leant,
As if to yield a soft consent.
Surely," he said, "you will requite
My love in this?" But she said, "Nay."
"Yea, now," he said. But she said, "Hush!
And come to me at morning blush."
He said, "The morning is not ours!"

"But say, at least, you love me, love,
Hid in among the twilight flowers;
No winds are listening far or near—
The sleepy doves will never hear."
"Ah, leave me in my sacred glea,
And when the saffron morn shall close
Her misty arms about the rose,
Come, and my speech, my thought shall prove—
Not now," she said, "not now, but then."
He said, "The morning is not ours!"

ALICE CARY.

XXXVIII.—"THE BOYS."

Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys?
If there has, take him out, without making a noise.
Hang the almanac's cheat and the catalogue's spite!
Old time is a liar! We're twenty to-night!

We're twenty! We're twenty! Who says we are more?
He's tipsy—young jacknapes! Show him the door!
"Gray temples at twenty!" Yes, while if we please;
Where the snow-flakes fall thickest there's nothing can freeze!

Was it snowing I spoke of? Excuse the mistake!
Look close—you will see not a sign of a flake!
We want some new garlands for those we have shed—
And these are white roses in place of the red.

We've a trick, we young fellows, you may have been told,
Of talking (in public) as if we were old—
That boy we call "Doctor," and this we call "Judge;"
It's a neat little fiction—of course it's all fudge.

That fellow's the "Speaker"—the one on the right;
"Mr. Mayor," my young one, how are you to-night?
That's our "member of Congress," we say, when we chaff;
There's Reverend—what's his name?—don't make me laugh.

That boy with the grave, mathematical look
Made believe he had written a wonderful book,
And the Royal Society thought it was true!
So they chose him right in—a good joke it was, too!

There's a boy, we pretend, with a three-decker brain,
That could harness a team with logical chain;
When he spouts for our manhood in syllabled fire,
We called him "The Justice," but now he's "The Squire."

And there's a nice youngster of excellent pith—
Fate tried to conceal him by naming him Smith;
But he shouted a song for the brave and the free—
Just read on his medal, "My country," "of these thee!"

You hear that boy laughing?—you think he's all fun;
But the angels laugh, too, at the good he has done;
The children laugh loud as they troop to his call,
And the poor man that knows him laughs loudest of all!

Yes, we're boys—always playing with tongue or with pen;
And I sometimes have asked, shall we ever be men?
Shall we always be youthful, and laughing, and gay,
Till the last dear companion drops smiling away?

Then here's to our boyhood, its gold and its gray!
The stars of its winter, the dews of its May!
And, when we have done with our life-lasting toys,
Dear Father, take care of thy children, the Boys!

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

MR. PERRY CHUMLY'S ECLIPSE.

A Story of Truth at the Bottom of a Well.

The spectroscope is a singularly beautiful and delicate instrument, consisting, essentially, of a prism of glass, which, decomposing the light of any heavenly body to which the instrument is directed, presents a spectrum, or long bar of color. Crossing this are narrow, dark and bright lines produced by the gases of metals in combustion, whereby the celestial orb's light is generated. From these dark and bright lines, therefore, we ascertain all about the composition of the sun and stars.

Now Ben had made some striking discoveries in spectroscopic analysis at his private garden observatory, and had also an instrument of superior power and capacity invented, or at least very much improved, by himself; and this instrument it was which he and I were arranging for an examination of the comet then flaming in the heavens. William sat by, apparently uninterested. Finally we had our arrangements for an observation completed, and Ben said: "Now turn her on."

"That reminds me," said William, "of a little story about Perry Chumly who—"

"For the sake of science, William," I interrupted, laying a hand on his arm, "I must beg you not to relate it. The comet will in a few minutes be behind the roof of yonder lodging house. We really have no time for the story."

"No," said Ben, "time presses; and, anyhow, I've heard it before."

"This Perry Chumly," resumed William, "believed himself a born astronomer, and always kept a bit of smoked glass. He was particularly great on solar eclipses. I have known him to sit up all night looking out for one."

Ben had now got the spectroscope trained skyward to suit him, and in order to exclude all irrelevant light had let down the window-blind on the tube of it. The spectrum of the comet came out beautifully—a long bar of color crossed with a beautiful ruling of thin dark and bright lines, the sight of which elicited from both of us an exclamation of satisfaction.

"One day," continued William from his seat at another window, "some one told Perry Chumly there would be an eclipse of the sun that afternoon at three o'clock. Now Perry had recently read a story about some men who in exploring a deep gorge in the mountains had looked up from the bottom and seen the stars shining at midday. It occurred to him that this knowledge might be so utilized as to give him a fine view of the eclipse, and enable him at the same time to see what the stars would appear to think about it."

"That," said Ben, pointing to one of the dark lines in the cometic spectrum, "that is produced by the vapor of carbon in the nucleus of the heavenly visitant. You will observe that it differs but slightly from the lines that come of volatilized iron. Examined with this magnifying glass"—adjusting that instrument to his eye—"it will probably show—by Jove!" he ejaculated, after a nearer view, "it isn't carbon at all. It is MEAT!"

"Of course," proceeded William, "of course Perry Chumly did not have any canon, so what did the fellow do but let himself down with his arms and legs to the bottom of an old well, about thirty feet deep! And, with the cold water up to his middle, and the frogs, pollywogs, and aquatic lizards quarreling for the cosy corners of his pockets, there he stood, waiting for the sun to appear in the field of his 'instrument' and be eclipsed."

"Ben, you are joking," I remarked with some asperity; "you are taking liberties with science, Benjamin. It can't be meat, you know."

"I tell you it is though," was his excited reply; "it is just meat, I tell you. And this other line, which at first I took for sodium, is bone—bone, sir, or I'm an asteroid! I never saw the like; that comet must be densely peopled with butchers and horse-knackers!"

"When Perry Chumly had waited a long time," William went on to say, "looking up and expecting every minute to see the sun, it began to get into his mind, somehow, that the bright, circular opening above his head—the mouth of the well—was the sun, and that the black disk of the moon was all that was needed to complete the expected phenomenon. The notion soon took complete possession of his brain, so that he forgot where he was and imagined himself standing on the surface of the earth."

I was now scrutinizing the cometic spectrum very closely, being particularly attracted by a thin, faint line, which I thought Ben had overlooked.

"Oh, that is nothing," he explained; "that's a mere local fault arising from conditions peculiar to the medium through which the light is transmitted—the atmosphere of this neighborhood. That is whisky. This other line, though, shows the faintest imaginable trace of soap; and these uncertain, wavering ones are caused by some effluvia not in the comet itself, but in the regions behind it. I am compelled to pronounce it tobacco smoke. I will now tilt the instrument so as to get the spectrum of the celestial wanderer's tail. Ah! there we have it. Splendid!"

"Now this old well," said William, "was near a road, along which was traveling a big and particularly hideous nigger."

"See here, Thomas," exclaimed Ben, removing the magnifying glass from his eye and looking me earnestly in the face, "if I were tell you that the coma of this eccentric heavily body is really hair, as its name implies, would you believe it?"

"No, Ben, I certainly would not."

"Well, I won't argue the matter; there are the lines—they speak for themselves. But now that I look again, you are not entirely wrong; there is a considerable admixture of jute, moss, and I think tallow. It certainly is most remarkable! Sir Isaac Newton—"

"That big nigger," drawled William, "felt thirsty, and seeing the mouth of the well thought there was perhaps a bucket in it. So he ventured to creep forward on his hands and knees and look in over the edge."

Suddenly our spectrum vanished, and a very singular one of a quite different appearance presented itself in the same place. It was a dim spectrum, crossed by a single broad bar of pale yellow.

"Ah!" said Ben, "our waif of the upper deep is obscured by a cloud; let us see what the misty veil is made of."

He took a look at the spectrum with his magnifying glass, started back, and muttered: "Brown linen, by thunder!"

"You can imagine the rapture of Perry Chumly," pursued the indefatigable William, "when he saw, as he supposed, the moon's black disk encroaching upon the body of the luminary that had so long riveted his gaze. But when that obscuring satellite had thrust herself so far forward that the eclipse became annular, and he saw her staring down upon a darkened world with glittering white eyes and a double row of flashing teeth, it is perhaps not surprising that he vented a scream of terror, fainted, and collapsed among his frogs! As for the big nigger, he, almost equally terrified by this shriek from the abyss, executed a precipitate movement which only the breaking of his neck prevented from being a double back-somersault, and lay dead in the weeds with his tongue out and his face the color of a cometic spectrum. We laid them in the same grave, poor fellows, and on many a still summer evening afterward I strayed to the lonely little church-yard to listen to their smothered requiem chanted by the frogs we had neglected to remove from the pockets of the lamented astronomer."

"And, now," added William, taking his heels from the window, "as you can not immediately resume your spectroscopic observations on that red-headed chamber-maid in the dormer-window, who pulled down the blind when I made a mouth at her, I move we adjourn."

LITTLE JOHNNY ON THE WEATHER.

Gaffer Peters on Meteorology—The Parsee "fiores" the Missionary—An Epistle from a Thrifty Tiller of the Moral Vineyard—The Negro who became a Cook in spite of Himself, and the aphoristic Tiger.

Ole Gaffer Peters is sech a ole fool I shud think he wude bust, cos the uther day he was to our house, and my mother she said: "Gaffer, the sun is offle hot to-day;" and Gaffer he said: "Yes, there aint nothin like a warm day for to make the sun hot." But jest gimme a griddle cake, plenty butter on it, and thats the feller for me!

Uncle Ned says there is fokes in Pershy wich wershups the sun, and one day one of these fellers was down onto his kanees a worshipping hard as ever he cude, like he wude do hissel a injury, and a good mishnary come a long and he sed, the mishnary did: "Wot a damb fool for to worship a thing which you can see!"

But the man wich was to his de votions said: "I got you there, ole feller; no chance to do any bisniss with me; I'm blind as a bat."

A man wich was sent out to a place in Africa for to be a mishnary wasent herd of for a long time, but bime by he wrote home to his preachers, and the letter sed:

"Dear Bruthen—I ben labrin in this corner of the mortal vinyard for 3 years, and this mishean has ben self sportin and haint cost the Sundy scoohl puples a red cent, cos all be nited bethens wich wudent accep the means of grace I sold to the slave traders for to pa xpenses of the good work; but now there aint a pore, mizzable sinner in 10 one hundred miles wich wude fetch fifteen cents for a scare cro in a tater feeld. So you got to take a clecktion up reel quick, cos the immortal soul which I hav brot to a kanollege of the livin Trooth wil back slide les he gits a cupple of tomatto cans for his ears, and a harth brush for a tail, and has a risin sun painted fresh on to his belly."

Its dredde hotter in Africa than it is here, cos there is were the Hotentots lives. And there is ephalents there, too, and ri nosy roses, and high potamusses, and cracky diles, and a hull show for nothin, no buyin tickets jest wock rite in and be et.

One mornin reel erly there was a natif nigger in the Sary desert, and he seen a lot of sabbage animals, and there wasent any place to hide hissef. So he la down and covered hissef with sand, all but jest his nose, and thot he was a smarty, but a tiger had seen him do it, and tole the others. So thay all come up and stood in a ring a round his nose. And the tiger wank its i and said: "Wots that?" Then the lion loked vey sollem and said: "That is a dismantle fortress, dont you see the port holes for the cannons?" And the rinosy rose it sed: "I shud think it was a nose mebbly, only it aint got no horn on it." Thcu the ephlent it said: "How cude a nose hav a horn on it, you fool? But this aint one, cos where is the proboscus?"

An wile thay was a havin their own fun the sun it kep a gettin hi upper, and the sand it begin for to be hot, and the natif niggers there dont wear no close, but if thay wude try it on in California, the notty things, it wude be lifely times, but no base ball, cos the bats wude be wanted for to spank em. So the pore nigger wich was in the hot sand he stood it long as ever he cude, til he was jest nothin but a blister, and then he shuke hisself out and said: "I me offle sorry I kep yure dinner a waitin, but I didnt like to spile sech a elligant roast by takin it out fore it was done."

And wen the natif nigger was et vry little tiny bit up, the tiger it licked its lips and sed: "Let me do the cookin for these niggers and I dont care whoo makes their laws."

But mebbly the niggers wude care.

When Jules Janin was in London during the Exhibition of 1851, as newspaper correspondent, he noticed the inscription on the Royal Exchange: "The Earth is the Lord's," which he at once copied and sent to his journal as La Terre est aux Seigneurs, a marvelous instance, he said, of the slavish way in which the English worshipped their aristocracy. But what are we to think of the French journal which declared of the author of Waverley: "Qu'il était sans doute moitié Français, puisqu'il s'appellait Voltaire-Scott!" or what bounds shall be found to restrain our laughter and amusement when we read of the ingenious translator who ushered Colley Cibber's Love's Last Shift into the admiring Parisian world under the title of La Dernière Chemise de l'Amour!

Frank and Willie were discussing which were the most economical, men or women; and Frank seemed to be getting the best of the argument, when Willie suddenly brought the debate to a close by saying: "One thing I know; my father can make a piece of butter go over more'n twice as large a piece of bread for me as mother can."

A MONTH IN THE SIERRA.

"By the forests lakes, and fountain,
Through the many folded mountain."

INDEPENDENCE LAKE, July, 1878.

A month in the heart of the Sierra—a month of dreamy repose and of lotus-eating in the truest sense. I wish, dear ARGONAUT, I could send you a branch of this "enchanted stem" that you, too, might taste this dream-rest. It has been such a delightful rest—a complete cycle of existence rounded by a dream. Like the weary, tempest-tossed mariners in the legend, I, with them, would give heed forevermore to the spirit-song, "There is no joy but calm," and like them imploringly plead, "Let us alone." Like the Chinese I would make my map of the world consist of a circle in a square. The circle would be my little world here of perfect repose and seclusion, while I would consign to the narrow corners outside, all that pertains to the great workingday world with its sordid cares. This lovely little lake is nestled charmingly amid the hills, and crowned by lofty mountains, behind which rise the icy peaks of glaciers.

Declivities slope down, luxuriantly overgrown with verdure, and little crinkled streams, formed by the melting snow, here and there come scurrying down the mountain sides, eager to join the bright blue waters of the lake below. Soft airs from the wooded slopes fan us with benignant breath, laden with the resinous odors of the forest firs and pines. Everything around seems to grow and bloom for the mere love of growing and being beautiful. If there is such a thing as an earthly, dreamy, sensuous paradise, I think it might be found just here. The pleased eye falls on a thousand beauties. In the distance far below lie verdant meadows, or rather, in the apt words of Goethe "long, deep chains of valleys, in which wine and oil flow in the abundance of blossoms." The great beauty of the scenery lies in the simplicity of the outlines, and in their supernatural grandeur. It is indeed "possessed beyond the muse's painting."

Opportunity for excursions to points of interest about the lake are not wanting. Five miles on horseback to Mount Lola makes an exceedingly interesting ride, a part of the way over great banks of snow, which never disappear. The crest of this mountain is 9,300 feet above the level of the sea. As we ascend, the view opens grander and more magnificent, while smaller and smaller grows the lake, until it appears as a mere thread of silver in the encircling band of the mountains. The summit reached, we stand enraptured at the overwhelming sublimity of the view. To the north and west, stand boldly out in relief against the sky, the Sierra Buttes and Lassen's Peak, while in the distance, dimmed by the space of 158 intervening miles, the glimmer of the whited peaks of Mount Shasta is discernible. Toward the west we look out over the great Sacramento Valley, past the Marysville Buttes, on to the Coast Range; and to the south we discover, with some effort, Mount Diablo.

At the east are the Washoe and Humboldt snowy ranges, and to the south stand in serried ranks the peaks of the Nevadas. It is a scene not to be described—it must be seen to be realized. The grandeur steals upon the soul and takes possession. Snow-white heights stand forth in grandest majesty—Titans who with one bound seem to touch the heavens. Peak after peak rises before us; mountain ranges, crowned with snow, take the forms of domes and castles and temples. These great hills of pure snow, illumined by the sunset colors of the dying day, seem indeed like the great gateways of the celestial city; the delicate, feathery clouds, so bright and pure, take the forms of angels hovering over the summits—mountains of emerald and gates of pearl. The soul would fain elevate itself to come into a more perfect union with this majesty of nature; and, looking still beyond to the farthest height, and seeing with soul vision, "Jasper first," I said, "and second, sapphire; third, chalcodony; the rest in order—last, an amethyst."

We were awakened from our vision by the rude, if not irreverent, inquiry of one of our party: "Wonder if this is not the place where Satan took Christ when he tried to tempt him with the offer of all in view?" A rumbling sound answered in rebuke, and, turning, we saw the clouds gathering as if menacing us with their frowns; and, from the dark cumuli, came flashes of lightning, and the sounds of thunder came reverberating from range to range and from peak to peak, and, multiplied by innumerable echoes, vanished down the farthest range of hills. Terror and awe are forgotten, however, as we stand entranced by the majesty and sublimity of the music of the mountains, given back in the low rumble and distant reverberating roll, like that of the legendary phantom ten-pin players of the Catskills.

Our excursions on the lake are daily, and we sail, row, and become fascinated. The charm of fishing is inexhaustible as the supply. There is pleasure even in the selection of our fishing tackle, and the gathering together of the various et ceteras, chief of which is the plethoric lunch basket, provided and generally packed by our good hostess. She never forgets the bottle of that elixir of the gods here called "mountain ash." As we are rowed up the lake by the strong arms of our obliging host we have time to appreciate and enjoy the delicate green of the firry mountain-sides around, the crystal waters beneath, and the white clouds above hanging like masses of snowy smoke. Half way up the lake we stop for rest and refreshment. This is our half-way house. A tiny little stream comes leaping down the hill, clear and icy cold. A small portion of this and a generous measurement of "mountain ash" put us on our metal again, strengthens the foundation of our airy castles, and with a long pull and a strong pull—at the oars I mean—we soon reach the head of the lake. A little more "mountain ash" and we turn attention to the day's sport. It is fascination, bewilderment; we are overwhelmed. At every throw of the line we bring a victim to the surface, splashing and struggling to the boat, his sides glittering, in the sunlight with purple and golden spots. These trout are somewhat smaller than those of Lake Tahoe, but much finer and more delicate in flavor. They take the hook readily, and we frequently caught from two to three hundred in a day's sport, averaging half a pound piece.

A day in the sunshine, breathing this deliciously pure air, and exhilarated by it and our sport mentally and physically, the evening brings that charming lassitude so conducive to peaceful repose; and in this condition, dear ARGONAUT, we say good night, and lie down to pleasant dreams.

LOTUS.

It is claimed by many that there should have been no call for a Constitutional Convention. It is conceded by nearly all that the present organic law is a very good one, and that, under a proper judicial interpretation, it would have been safer to adhere to it than to make the experiment of a change. All intelligent persons recognize the peril involved in the endeavor to form a new code of laws, and to provide the machinery for their execution. It was especially hazardous to make the experiment at this time. There is abroad in our community a wide spread discontent arising from causes altogether foreign to those involved in a change of organic law. Yet this discontent was seized upon by demagogues and artfully used to bring about a political revolution. Our Constitution is not at fault for dry summers and short crops. It did not cause gambling in mining stocks, and is not responsible for disastrous results arising therefrom. It did not incite the slave-holders' rebellion, nor could it prevent the results that came from civil war. It could not control nor direct the financial policy of the nation, nor is it in any sense responsible for the disasters and inconveniences arising from the presence in our midst of a Chinese population. The Democratic party, from some inscrutable and mysterious purpose, resolved that the opportunity to spend a million or twelve hundred thousand dollars of the people's money should not be allowed to pass, and, evolving from its inner consciousness some motive, which it has not as yet disclosed, the Convention was called. It was an opportunity for an outburst of all the devilish incendiarism with which the worst element of the Democracy was charged. The pent up fires of discontent, lawlessness, and crime burst forth. Ireland and Germany vomited forth upon the sand-lots and elsewhere their hatred of institutions they did not understand, and raised the standard of revolt against conditions that are hard upon the unfortunate, the idle, and the vicious. The accumulated wealth of an industrious and enterprising community tempted the greed of these alien bandits, and they regarded the savings of the industrious as the legitimate loot and plunder of an agrarian war. This war they organized, and proclaimed their intention to subvert society, order, and government in the interest of an unprincipled band of alien adventurers. "We will," they said, "divide property, overturn vested rights, prescribe the hours and wages of labor. We will limit the occupation of lands and the accumulation of estates. We will exempt the poor from taxation. We will place the burdens of government upon the rich. We will make vacant all the offices, and will fill them with the greasy creatures of our own creation. We will send hair-frizzers and cooks, bar-room loafers and day laborers, to make the organic law for California." And, except for the intelligence and patriotism of the rural districts, the State would have endured the shame that overwhelmed the metropolis. Had it not been for the country and its conservatism, this State would have been given over to the train bands of Hessians that have invaded it, and to the plunder of the alien adventurers who understand neither the principles of republican government nor the restraints of obedience to the law. This danger is happily averted. The Constitutional Convention is, in its majority, composed of intelligent gentlemen, men of property, who have an interest in the conservation of order. They have duties to perform, the first and most important of which is not to yield to the clamor of this importunate mob. The first principle of the new code should be to provide the machinery for suppressing mob utterances and mob acts by the strong, iron hand of military force. It should be placed beyond the power of political judges to declare any law for the repression of incendiary language or for the suppression of mob violence to be unconstitutional. Taxes should be so equalized that every citizen pays upon what he is worth in real, personal, and mixed property. He should not pay upon what is encumbered by debt, and the man or corporation to whom that debt is owing should pay the tax that is rightfully imposed upon it. There should be a limit fixed to State and municipal liabilities, and provision made to secure the strictest economy and the most perfect integrity in the execution of official trusts. This being done, the burdens of government will set lightly upon all. If Assessors will marshal all the wealth of California, corporate and individual—lands, railroads, houses, gas, water, and all corporate franchises, all personal property, all articles of luxury, all the diamonds, jewels, pictures, and marbles that adorn the palaces of the rich, all the bonds, collaterals, promissory notes, stocks, and securities of our money lenders, all the mortgages of our banks, all the stocks of our mining stock gamblers, all the velvets, laces, and tennison kid-gloves of our ladies, all the goods in our warehouses, all the stocks of our retail dealers, and make every man and woman and corporate manager, on oath, give the schedule of his wealth, and for omission, false oath, or willful repression of facts send him or her to State prison—our tax will be a light one, and real estate will not be compelled to stagger under a mountain of municipal debt and pay all the taxes that personal property now shirks from paying, through lies, perjury, and deceit. We commend the gentlemen of the Convention to hold in mind this fact. We do not desire that the change of judges, legislators, and local officials should be too sudden. It will, in our opinion, be unwise to legislate the present officials from office immediately upon the adoption of the Constitution. Let us have time to adjust ourselves to the new condition of things, and to become accustomed to the changes that we are to undergo. Give the people time to consider before they are compelled to act. Instead of shortening the time of the present officials by a year, it would be better to extend it for the same period. To illustrate: Let the present hold-over Senators continue in office for the terms to which they have been elected. Let the Supreme, District, and local judges have their terms of office extended, so that we may have the benefit of their experience to put the new experiment afloat. Let the county officers hold over another year, so that the machinery of the local governments may not be brought to an abrupt termination. To adopt a new law, elect new legislators, construct new courts, and make a complete change of county and municipal officers, is to subject our government to an unwanted and severe strain. Let us not precipitate ourselves into the confusion and chaos of so radical and complete a political revolution as would be involved in this proceeding. Our advice would be to arrange for the election of officers so as to defer the change till the Presidential election of 1880. This election will bring out the entire voting strength. The misrule and riot party, it is hoped, will by that time have spent its force. The demagogues and adventurers who live upon agitation will have tamed down. The few who have bubbled to the surface in San Francisco will have spent the money earned in Convention, and will be starved back to their occupations, or killed by the bad whisky that is always available to men of political prominence. The Presidential election will bring to the ballot-box the whole mass of electors. This programme will give us two years of political repose, and will put off at least for so long a time the evil hour of Kearney's prophecy, when he would place Sharpstein upon the Supreme bench, and fill the seats of the district courts, and the halls of legislation, with greasy mechanics. Our suggestion, of giving another year of official incumbency to the present Governor, and to the hold-over Senators who called this Convention, and to the Democrat officials throughout the State, is prompted by no love of them. We want to hear the howl and see the gleaming teeth of the hungry foreign jackals a little longer, before they get another bite at the carcass. We are in hopes, too, that within the period of two years, better crops, more prosperous seasons, extended railroads, new mining developments, a larger immigration, more tule lands reclaimed, more desert lands irrigated, more great landed estates divided, greater economies in life, greater moderation in business, less speculative ventures, and less gambling in mining stocks, will bring about more prosperous times; that sober sense and reason will have been restored to the misguided masses who have followed the counsels of the ignorant, vicious, and idle demagogues, who have so selfishly and cruelly deceived them.

On Monday evening we spent an hour in the Board of Supervisors. It was the first time we ever visited the Board in session. The City Hall when finished will be an elegant and costly structure. It is a piece of extravagant folly, but when completed it will be paid for and it will be an ornament to San Francisco. It is extravagantly furnished, and this is a just cause of complaint against those who are responsible. The furniture, carpets, and chandeliers are costly beyond every necessity. The counters in Mayor Bryant's store and the desks in the Supervisors' private offices are not of carved rosewood, nor do they carpet their places of business with the finest productions of foreign looms; they do not have half a dozen flunkies sitting around the doors of their business places on stools, as messengers and janitors. The County Clerk, the Sheriff, the Tax Collector, the Justices, the courts, and every other department of the city government has more employés than are necessary. The salaries of officials from Mayor down to Pound-keeper are higher than they ought to be. The Bank of California pays its best book-keepers and clerks from $100 to $175 per month. Better, more intelligent, more responsible, better educated, more industrious, and more competent men than Sheriff Nunan, County Clerk Reynolds, Collector Mitchell, Superintendent of Streets Mansur, Superintendent of Schools Mann, Auditor Maynard, Treasurer Hubert, or any of the other city officials, can be found who would stipulate to work for less than $200 per month, and be glad of the opportunity. The man who drives our carriage is as industrious, as brave, as respectable, as intelligent, and as competent as the average policeman, and he is glad to work for $40 per month. There are better lawyers at the bar than on the bench, who would be glad of the positions at half the salary. There are thousands of intelligent, conscientious, and competent ladies who would fill the positions of our male school teachers at half the price. Our street system is a systematically organized robbery. The average street contractor is a highwayman in the literal sense. Personal property owners have, by lies and perjury, reduced the hiding of their assets from the Assessor and Tax Collector to a fine art. The result is, real estate is over-burdened, and is the first to shrink in value because it cannot steal away and avoid being taxed. We were very favorably impressed with the personnel of our Board of Supervisors. Most of them we have known for a long time. We noted their treatment of different questions as they came up, and we came away with a favorable opinion of the intelligence and integrity of the gentlemen who compose the Board. There is a disposition upon the part of the press and of the public to jump at conclusions prejudicial to the honor of men in office. To call them "rogues" and "thieves" is the vocabulary in daily use. The Supervisors of San Francisco legislate for the wants of 300,000 people, and for the protection of more than $300,000,000 of wealth. Under pressure of jobbers, contractors, place hunters, and place holders, they may give way more than in their private business, they may yield a point when the interests of the individual comes in conflict with those of the general public, they may be at times careless or indifferent, but that there is in the present Board any corrupt ring we see no evidence. That it has many honest gentlemen in it we know, and in our judgment it would be better for property owners to oftener attend the meetings of the Board, and become somewhat more conversant with the city legislation. It would, in our judgment, be better if the ever vigilant, and ever virtuous daily press would be somewhat more careful and more deliberate before it indiscriminately assails officials. It is this unwarranted denunciation of the press that renders official life and the performance of public duties distasteful to quiet, honest men. If property-owners would organize for the purpose of protecting their property, and would be half as diligent in its defense as jobbers, place holders, and contractors are in warring upon it, we should have a better administration of our municipal government, less grumbling, and less taxes to pay.

Felix Adler, a German Jew, whose occupation is that of a traveling lecturer against the dogmas and teachings of the Christian Church, proposes to establish in San Francisco a Kindergarten School. If this undertaking were an individual enterprise at the cost of Mr. Felix Adler, it would be thus placed beyond our right of criticism. But when it becomes a public charity, and is founded upon the solicited gifts of the benevolent, we exercise a privilege, if we do not perform a duty, in demanding its aims and purpose. It is to be an unsectarian school for poor children from three to six years of age—we presume to be under the charge of Professor Adler. Whether Christian or Jewish parents may desire to have the minds of their children, in the formative age, left to the guidance of an avowed infidel, is for them alone to determine. It is our observation that men who are very liberal in the direction of free thought are restrained somewhat in expressing their opinions in the presence of their wives, and silent in the audience of their children. Doubt and disbelief comes soon enough, and though we are not at all orthodox in our religious sentiments, we have never been able to trace any evil influence from the religious teachings of a mother to an infant child. Our doubts are so well grounded upon this subject that it is our opinion that a three-year old child had better be left to the teachings of its mother, rather than to be turned over to the moulding process of Messrs. Adler, Schuenemann-Pott, Joseph Winans and Fred. MacCrellish; Mesdames Müser, Gotting, and Miss Malwedel. We think we scent the rodent in the suggestion of Prof. Adler that this is a tentative experiment, preliminary to engrafting another German educational experiment upon our already over-burdened and oppressed taxpayers. As we are opposed to teaching little Germans over six years of age how to speak their mother tongue at the public expense, so are we unwilling to be taxed in order that little Germans of three years of age should escape the danger of becoming Jews, Catholics, or Protestants, and have their infantile minds directed to that higher range of free-thought known as infidelity. We are, for these and other reasons, therefore, inspired to advise our readers not to subscribe one dollar a month to aid in the experiment of a Kindergarten School for poor children of three years of age in San Francisco.

PRATTLE.

The man who committed suicide with a ferry-boat, the other day, left behind him a pathetic letter intended to excite public sympathy; but, with that lack of literary judgment which distinguishes the unpracticed amateur, he imprudently mentioned that he was—a book-cannasser! Every man thinks himself a good writer and a “lord of human tears;” whereas, there is not more than one man in a thousand who can make us weep with his pen except by sticking it into our eyes.

Said Bishop, actor: “I had quite a scare—
Capsized my boat!”
Said Bradley, ditto: “Are you not aware
That sticks will float?”

A contemporary has a marvelous story of a Confederate prisoner of war, who being required to work on the fortifications under negro supervision seized a hatchet, severed his hand from his arm, and said to the officer engaged in coercing him: “Now, sir, will you make me work for your rotten government under a negro guard?” The tale is essentially true; I was an eye-witness. But it occurred this way: Threatened with banging if he wouldn’t go to work, the prisoner seized the officer’s sword, and dextrously severed his own head from the body. “Now, sir,” said he, with a bow of politest mockery, “if it’s a fair question permit me to ask how you will make the rope hold?” Struck with admiration for such heroism, the officer set him free, presented him with the cover of a collar-box for a hat, and paid his passage to San Francisco. He is one of the profoundest thinkers in this State, and is at present editing the Morning Call.

“Resolved that we will post,” the merchants say,
“All names of debtors who do never pay.”
“Whose shall be first?” inquires the ready scribe—
“Who are the chiefs of the marauding tribe?”
Lo! high Parnassus, lifting from the plain,
Upon his hoary peak, a noble fane.
Within that temple all the names are scrolled
Of California’s bards, inscribed in gold;
To that bad eminence, my friend, aspire,
And copy thou the Roll of Fame, entire.
Yet not to total shame those names devote,
But add in mercy this explaining note:
“These cheat because the law makes theft a crime,
And they obey all laws but laws of rhyme.”

By way of proving that “the pediments and sunken foundation stones of the law are based on broad grounds of common sense,” a correspondent at Marysville sends me a “legal maxim” in rather fishy Latin, to the effect that when a sturgeon is taken it shall belong to the king entire, but of a captured whale he shall have only the head, while the tail shall go to the queen. That may be good law in Marysville, but it is a dead letter down here. When a sturgeon is taken in these waters it goes to the hotel dining-room as “sea bass;” and when a whale, en route to the Yuba, comes ashore, it is divided as follows; the finder takes its measure, and the showman its carcass. Its description is given to the poor, and its immortal part, the odor, accrues to this State as a permanent endowment, and, as an occasional benefaction, when the wind favors, to Nevada.

“Say it over, do you love me?”
Said the husband of a year;
“Are you happy—do you love me—
Love to have me always near?”
—William D. Pollock.
“Yes, I love you, Bill, you bet your Life I do, because you snore
Tetrametrically—let your Rhinotrochees sound once more.”

He had slept like a brave man, long and well, had the obese and not over-active Joseph, under a bay tree in one of the comfortable valleys of Marin, and now his waking eye vainly explored the circumjacent spaces for his comrades. Lifted above his head in a cleft stick the ace of spades invited attention. Joseph handed it down and read the following inscription:

“Here rests the mortal part of Jo,
Who lay down here and closed his eyes
In perfect health; but well we know
That life’s too short for him to rise.”

I have received a bookseller’s circular in which it is affirmed that everybody should read a brochure (by a person who has the learning to call himself “Semper Veritas”) entitled “An Appeal to the Jews to Stimulate Them to Obtain a Higher State of Civilization.” This is rather good concerning a people whose ancestors were masters when ours were slaves, who had the arts when we, skin-clad, sat on our haunches gnawing bones, and from whose early literature we have compiled a religion. In the Jews I am aware of but two important defects—weakness of judgment and imperfect politeness; they are poor judges of ready-made clothing and they treat the deities of other races with marked incivility.

At about the same time that the President was ostentatiously entertained by Senator Don Cameron, with whom he had theretofore been at feud, it was observed that the Widow Oliver was dismissed from her clerkship in one of the Departments. That lady may be said to have paid for the dinner and been herself served up.

Says Hayes to Widow Oliver: “I kiss you
(A Judas-spre, dear madam) and dismiss you.
For Simon says, ‘Thumbs down,’ and that, translated,
Means, ‘Let the fallen be decapitated.’
Simon and I (as birds of certain feather, Where’er corruption is, will flock—to gather)
Are for Reform—I Civil Service climb on,
And that’s my hobby; his, I think, is Simon.
I’m pledged to make the country’s fame less shady,
And he to make of you an honest lady.
But breach of promise is our common mania—
You lose your place or I lose Pennsylvania.

An “American Bar” has been opened at the Paris Exhibition, and, prudently avoided by our countrymen, is civilly patronized by the natives. But it requires only one cocktail to knock the Parisian faculties stone-cold; in consequence whereof the American Bar is the only quiet corner in the world’s capital: for a Frenchman, although drunk as a lord when sober, is sober as a deacon when drunk. Owing to the torpor of its occupants, the place (with a courteous concession to la langue Americaine) has received the name of Maison des Steefs—which these good people believe to be our name for a morgue.

Lo! a drowing woman gaily
Rescued by Professor Daley,
From the woman—heaven bless her!—
Who can rescue the professor?

Mr. Archibald Forbes, the famous war correspondent of the London Daily News, does not appear to be aware of our republican prejudices and aversions—our loathing of aristocracies, and contemptuous indifference to “crowned heads.” His lectures in this country are to be on the subject of “Emperors whom I have Met.” Of course he will talk to empty benches, and I should not be surprised if these, self-wrenched from the floor, were to throw themselves at his head. Now, here is a question of law which Mr. Forbes would do well to consider with the guarded attention of an old maid reconnoitring a pair of trousers in the solitude of the kitchen cellar. If when he delivers his lecture all the people of the vicinity should unhappily break their necks in attempting to escape the sound of his voice, could he not be held for murder?

If Mr. Forbes should by any chance have a beggarly half-dozen auditors—hired with “British gold”—I suggest that the “exercises” begin with an appropriate song composed on the model of the following spirited stanza:

What makes the mob love monarchs so, monarchs so—
What makes the mob love monarchs so?
The Eagle’s children cry.
Why, monarchs love the mob, you know, mob you know, mob you know—
Why, monarchs love the mob, you know,
Made up in mutton pie.

If the dazzling sarcasm of that truly original song do not hurl every effete dynasty from its crumbling throne, as Saul was unhorsed by the divine effulgence, I’ll eat my leg!

I fear I have lately exhibited a spirit of most reprehensible levity with reference to some of the cherished principles and traditions of our American politics. In defense I can only plead that I never more than half understood, but did always wholly condemn, “government of the people, by the people, and for the people.” I openly affirm, and can prove, the entire incapacity of our people, or any people, for self-government. I assert that no single proposition is supported by so formidable a series of historical facts as this. The chain of evidence is unbroken and indiscoverable; the links that we are forging to-day for its hither end are as flawless as those which the early republics welded into the immeasurable sequence at the point where, beyond their desolation, all is dark. If democracy is not necessarily and inherently a failure—if an enduring republic is anything more than the splendid dream of a generous imagination—then the historical method of ascertaining truth is more worthless than the incantation of a thaumaturgist, and more misleading than the oracle of a pagan temple.

The republic has the lowest aim of all forms of government; it proposes to accomplish only that modest Benthamite Utopia, “the greatest good to the greatest number;” and it is with reference to this unexact standard that it must be judged—and judged to have failed. For the realization of that nobler aspiration, the greatest good to the greatest men, its competence is as that of a boa constrictor to wet-nurse young lions. If I were dictator it is to the attainment of this latter object that I would direct all the energies of the State; nor would I too curiously consider the cost of success. Slavery is an ugly word; but if it seemed to me that the temple of the Greek civilization was reared upon a substructure of Helots’ bones, I should not have the presumption cruelly to turn my back upon the practical significance of the fact. War is an unpleasant business; but if convinced that the lassitudes and cupidities of peace relaxed the national intellect and debauched the national conscience,

I hope I should have the benevolence to make education by fire and sword compulsory. Poverty is a disadvantage, wealth a peril; but if hereditary leisure appeared a condition necessary to the growth of great minds, ought I dishonestly to refrain from heaping the coifers of the few with the earnings of the many?

I do not say I hold the opinion intimated above; what I do say is that I favor all such forms of dominion and subordination—all such codes and customs—all such relations of the individual to society—as tend to the rearing of broad-brained and great-hearted gentlemen. How dare we mediocre millions—males, females and young—weigh our vulgar “welfare” and our purposeless “lives” against the precious possibility of a Shakspeare! Is it not matchless effrontery to measure and tally the tears, the sweat, the blood, that may be required of us to water the soil where Paul hath planted? Is humanity wiser or better for our lives; in pain when we suffer; and poorer when we die? What we need is the decent pride of the honest Irishman who boasted that the Duke of Wellington had spoken to him—saying, “Out o’ the way, you blackguard, or I’ll ride over you!”

Let us not deceive ourselves with cant—our solicitude and sympathy for mankind are quite as insincere as the affected distress concerning public affairs which Johnson rebuked in Boswell. No one but Jesus Christ ever loved mankind. Our eyes are wiser than our tongues: every one has wept for the death of a man; no one ever wept for the death of a thousand. You may go into a cemetery and pass over a hundred graves of nobodies without so much as a sigh; you come upon that of great man and are profoundly moved. The Grosser Kurfurst founders with three hundred sailors and marines; you pause midway in the dispatch to pare a nail. Suppose Bismarck had been on board! An entire army is destroyed in battle. Bah! that is what they might have expected. But it is different when Bryant cracks his pate on a door-step.

As it is the regimental officers who are the regiment, the organization, so it is the world’s great men—eminent and obscure—who are the world. These are they for whom governments should be “established among men.” Their welfare is the justification of organized society. Is this hero-worship? I do not know—I never in all my life took three steps to see an eminent person with whom I had not personal acquaintance. Let me not be disingenuous; I once mounted a nail-peg to have a look at the Shah of Persia, and on another occasion climbed three pair of stairs to see Colonel Jackson about an advertisement.

“Pen’s mightier than the sword,” McComb begins—
Backus takes up the talking
With—“Doesn’t get between a fellow’s shins
And trip him up when walking.”

Twelve members of a Mississippi family named Sample are reported murdered. Having taken twelve Samples, Death ought to be able to say if he will have the lot.

A church journal complains of “the decay of seriousness.” That is bad, certainly, but what ails us graybeards is the seriousness of decay.

A propos of seriousness, here is a bit of conversation between two friends of mine on their way home from “the club” at an unheavenly hour. A.—“Bless me! how will the wife receive me?” B.—“What is the lady’s usual frame of mind on such occasions—coulour de rose?” A.—“H’m, no; not quite. A kind of night-blooming cereusness.”

When the Call and Chronicle begin to abuse the army at about the same time, and neither on seeing the other at it will turn around and take the other side, it must be that each has an exceptionally gratifying sense of its own stupidity and sin; for if there is anything that will make a thief stop stealing it is an opportunity to expose the theft of another thief.

When two graveyard ghouls clandestine,
Swallowing the same intestine,
View each other’s jaws encroaching
On the point they’re both approaching,
Neither leaving off to pull it
Out of the competing gullet—
For so provident a measure
Too intent on present pleasure—
What must be the fine, infernal,
Rank, unmatchable, supernal
Nastiness of that “internal!”

Mr. Burleigh, a barber, of Capron, Illinois, has set lectures a brilliant and praiseworthy example. He announced “A lecture on suicide with a practical illustration, at Thornton Hall;” took over $200 in at the door as a burial fund; talked an hour and a half on the utility and means of terminating life’s troubles; and then drawing a revolver shot himself dead. The audience, it is said, were perfectly satisfied with the performance, but few demanding their money back at the door, and it is confidently hoped and expected that this species of entertainment will become wide-spread and popular. There will be no difficulty here in finding star performers; no trouble in raising a satisfactory fund; no doubt of a full house.

THE ROSE OF EDEN.

Fair Eve knelt close by the guarded gate, in the glow of the Eastern spring.
She saw the flash of the angel's sword and the sheen of the angel's wings;
She thought, as she held her sobbing breath, she could hear the happy sighs
Of the tiny rivulets that fed the mosses of Paradise;
She knew how the birds were fluttering, among the clustered flowers
And gorgeous blooms and arching trees that shadowed Eden's towers
And she cried aloud in an agony of wild, remorseful prayer:
"Give me one bud, but one, but one, from the thousands that bloom there!"

He turned as he heard her piteous voice, in his grave, angelic grace.
And he looked with a wistful tenderness on the beautiful woman's face:
And because it was so beautiful, and because she could not see
How fair were the pure white cypresses, crushed dying at her knee:
And because he knew this punishment through the weary years must burn,
That through all things sweet and good on earth her heart would for Eden yearn,
He gathered a rich, red rose, that grew where the four rivers met,
And flung it to the frail, fatal hands, that clasped imploring yet.

And though for many a cycle past that rose in dust has lain,
With her who bore it on her breast, when she passed from life and pain,
There is never a daughter of Eve but once, ere the tale of her days is done.

She will know the scent of the Eden rose, just once, beneath the sun!
And whatever else she may win or lose, endure, or do, or dare,
She will never forget the enchantment it gave to the common air:
For the world may give her content or joy, fame, sorrow or sacrifice,
But the hour that brought the scent of rose, she lived it in Paradise.
—All the Year Round.

FLEUR-DE-LIS.

The Pre-historic Legend of a California Flower.

A summer or so ago, wandering aimlessly about in the valley of Santa Clara, I chanced to spend some weeks at the old mission of St. Francis, where I became acquainted with Father José—since dead—as genial a gentleman and as devoted a student as one finds, even outside the ranks of his calling. The worthy padre and myself became the best of friends, and many were the evening rambles we took together in that "Valley of the Pleasant Nights," as the blessed founder of the mission, Father Benvenuto, called them a hundred years ago.

Our conversation generally drifted into subjects connected with the foundation and history of the early church establishments, and the tales of the childlike natives and the good fathers, who came from Castile and from Leon to bless and teach, beguiled many a weary hour.

One evening, strolling along the tree-lined Alameda, and now and then stopping to gather the simple wild flowers that lined the borders of the avenue, I plucked a blossom that was strange to me, alike in history and in name.

I spoke of it, and my companion told me then it was the wild fleur-de-lis, which grows abundantly in all our sea-coast valleys, and which, though almost weirdly lovely, neither he nor I had ever seen domesticated.

The padre—who was something of a heretic, by the way, and who clung to the curious belief that in the times of which history makes no mention there existed over the face of the earth a highly civilized and enlightened people—the padre informed me that the natives in early times related a strange legend of the lovely blossom and that for it, even many years after the arrival of the missionaries, they preserved a species of tender adoration.

As I studied over the purple petals drooping with a lovely grace, the creamy stamens just tipped with gold, and inhaled the faint and balmy perfume that floated from the violet heart of the flower, I seemed myself to feel some mystic, inherent charm that bound my senses like a spell cast by an Indus sorcerer.

And we stood there—the padre and I—under the giant trees; and in a voice low in tone, and yet resonant with passion, he told the story of the Tyrian flower.

In those times, when nations flourished whose course and power have vanished from memory like dreams of the morning, whose very names the perspicacity of history has left to legend or to silence, over the broad valleys, the snowy peaks, and sun-lit harbors of California, a mighty nation rose, endured, and—succumbing under the weight of ages on her brow—finally fell.

Of her temples of marble and jasper, her palaces of granite and chalcodony, her ships, her marts, her glorious history, and her mysterious fall, no trace remains; only the tremulous fleur-de-lis preserves its delicate purple pallor and its strange, sweet scent—a perplexity of memory and a dream of mystery.

It was the flower of royalty in those days—the flower of royalty of a mighty nation whose borders stretched from the Columbia to the Colorado, and whose metropolis stood in the Valley of the Pleasant Nights.

And in those days a gentle boy, whose hair was like the gold floss spun by old Etruria, and whose eyes reflected every thought as the blue Sierra lakes mirrored the gentlest movement of the lining trees and grasses, had his home away in the north, in the land where the rushing waters of the Trinity bounded as impassioned love to meet the welcome of the rock-bound sea.

Simple shepherd of mountain sheep, his art-lessons incarnated the innocence of the things he tended. The angel of true Art spoke understandingly to his heart in the beauty of the forest's, the grasses, and the flowers, while the Nameless God whispered to his pure soul and was comprehended in the towering, snow-clad peaks, the roaring torrents, and the masses of turquoise clouds—scarlet and gold-edged by day, silvered with star-dust in the silent night.

And in the night, his rock folded and his daily labor done, he sat on the borders of the mountain stream, and his eyes, sweeping along the multitudinous vistas of the stars, had in them that look which dwells in the eyes of man when the spiritual vision, driven on by the genius of aspiration and of art, is yet arrested by the diamantine limits of the universe.

Otalas was an artist in these dreamy hours, and with colored earths, delved from the slopes of the hills, and parchment made by his own hand, he limned marvelous pictures of trees, and of woodland elves. But not for long, the summer's day there came a stranger to that quiet place, and he saw the colored sketches, and learned their history.

With tales of splendid palaces, of gorgeous pictures, of fair women and helpful men, he fired the heart of the mountain shepherd, so that naught but to see the great city of his land where dwelt the king—patron of all arts—would now content him.

So he sold his sheep, gathered his paints and parchments, cut a stout staff, and begging of the stranger a letter to the king, set out on foot from his mountain home.

The heavens were resplendent with the red glow of a gorgeous sunset, as with eager movement Otalas neared his journey's end.

With all the fabled splendor of Atlantis, with groves fairer than those of Dodona, and temples and palaces more beautiful than those of Ephesus, the City of the Valley rose before his eyes, regnant in her strength, great in her extent, and marvelous in her loveliness.

Otalas stood at the gate, weary, footsore, and unknown, faint, and yet strong. As he stood there he heard a ripple of silvery laughter—joyous as the carol of the meadow lark, and so sweet it sent the blood back to his heart and fixed him motionless, shuddering with a strange delight.

Through the portals of the massive entrance there came a bevy of laughing maidens, and in their midst, like a waterlily on the bosom of a lake, walked Soëfa.

The hands of her maids were filled with flowers, their words brimmed with lightsome, childish joy, which hushed, though, as she saw the weary youth leaning exhausted upon his madroño staff.

Soëfa paused—then, touched by pity, spoke to the shrinking boy:

"Fair sir, wearied you look and travel worn. I pray you, sir, if help there be, that we may do, 'tis yours. My noble father rules this land, and 'tis not fit that stranger guests, though rich or poor, should be unwelcome here."

"Nay, lady," he answered, waving back the but half-outstretched charitable hand, "I crave no aid, save that which lawfully I earn. I am a peasant of the mountains in the north, and bear to the ruler of this land a letter. That I would fain deliver—'tis but to ask for work to do."

"Myself will take the letter; and come thou to the palace on the morrow, and ask for me—the demoiselle Soëfa. Stay—this flower will give you entrance. 'Tis the royal sign." So speaking, she took from her raven hair a purple flower, with tender stamens, and bound it with some pinks and mignonette; then giving it, she smiled and moved away.

A year of hurning days and starry nights passed swiftly by, and in all the silent night of the winged days fortune smiled on the painter-peasant.

Day by day since, tremblingly, he first sought the palace doors, did his fame and fortune grow, till at last, recognized in one brief year as a man of marvelous genius, he was commissioned to paint the portrait of the high-bred princess. And it was done.

And there were two Soëfas then; only, the one that seemed to start from out the canvas had in her eyes a depth of sadness the living one had never yet experienced, and on her lips, some said, there trembled a sob of unutterable woe.

He had conceived her, sitting upon a bank of fleur-de-lis that grew wild and luxuriant, by the walls of the palace, just under a massive, sculptured canopy of granite that bore the blazonry of her royal race. A form of haughty, splendid beauty, clad in a white tunic banded at waist and sleeves with gold; her neck and shoulders bare and smooth, and gleaming white as sculptor's marble against the shade of her half-loosened hair which fell to the ground as midnight falls in the tropics. But her eyes, glorious in their dark brown beauty, were veiled with a mist like the tears the stars shed on cloudy summer nights; and on her lips—too perfect for silence and repose—there hovered and trembled a sobbing sorrow that seemed to pain the heaping mass of amethyst flowers that bestrewed her lap.

Soëfa, looking at this second self, felt that gold for payment of its beauty would be as dross; and she cut from her hair one dark, silken tress and put it in the painter's hand.

Yet more—in the stately throne-room, when the canvas was unveiled before the enthusiastic court, it was her sweet voice that gave the dearest praise.

"Ah," said she, "so long as great natures live, true art shall live; when these fail, then falls true art, and when it falls—the world!"

And yet again months winged onward, and once more the palace shone with a thousand gorgeous lights that gleamed on the flower-wreathed cornices and solemn capitals, and seemed to battle with the sleepy softness of the night.

It was her birth-day, and gathered to celebrate it with becoming splendor were all the great nobility of name, of wit, and of beauty of the land.

Never had the Valley City seen a happier eve; never was it to wake to a sadder morn. Yet on that night, Fate itself seemed to have set its seal of happiness.

Low, distant bell tones, sounding like the thoughts of a mighty Melancholy, were mingled and mixed with the clear notes of the trumpet, the blare of triumphant bands, and the soft sweetness of the lute played under summer trees.

All was rhythm, light, and perfume; even the balmy breezes, sweeping down from the dark blue Sierra, bore in their bosom the lingering odors of the forest pines.

Under the mighty granite canopy, where was raised a velvet dais, the dark-eyed hyacinthine fleur-de-lis nodded and swayed in their sensuous delight—knowing as little as did the fleecy clouds the issues of that tropic eve.

In the grand hall of the palace, lofty, vaulted, and fretted with antique figures antedating those of the temples of Elephanta, the dancers moved to the passionate music, which thrilled and throbbed with joy.

Knowledge of love, unknown erstwhile, is sweet; and, as Otalas watched the Princess floating with all the poesy of the goddess of the hour, that knowledge came to him. "Tread lightly, love," his heart inaudibly whispered unto her; "tread lightly! under your tinkling feet lies my whole soul, sweet-heart."

And, as the night waned, he left the brilliant scene and strolled outside, to that velvet throne that rested on the bed of violet flowers; and, as the hours fled on, Soëfa, wearied and flushed, came also from the hall, unremarked and alone. Out from the lights and into the palpable night she strayed—strayed to that same sweet hank over which the sculptured canopy cast a grim and menacing shade.

"Princess—lady—Soëfa! I love you!" and he stood here before her with his arms outstretched, and that light in his eyes that Sappho saw in the eyes of Phaoon.

"I am the daughter of a king," she said, as she raised her face and looked at him.

He had stepped from under the canopy as he spoke—she was still beneath it.

As they stood there, silent, over all the valley settled a strange oppression, the heat grew more intense, the air itself seemed weighted with noxious vapors; there came a tremulous shudder of the earth, the garden heaved as a ship in a storm, and the ground beneath the foot swelled as a wave that is about to break.

And above Soëfa's head, the granite canopy with a hollow, groaning noise was cracking and breaking loose from the palace walls, and she knew it not—but simply gazed upon the artist, who stood in a breathless and motionless torpor, unable to move, unable to cry, unable, he thought, to care.

At last, as the mass of stone loosened its final hold and fell—with one wild cry he shook off the lethargy that paralyzed his limbs, and springing to her side, pushed her away—away from under the mighty incubus that felled him, a sacrifice, to the earth.

Frantic-eyed, she fled—but only for a moment. Then she came back and stooped to his side. Her fingers trembled as she felt for the faintest pulse, where pulse there was none. Then the clouds drifted back from across the moon, and a pale, slanting ray of light fell across his ghastly face. And thus once more she looked at the artist's features; and now in her eyes shone that tearless sob, now her lips were sentient with that unutterable woe.

Dead, dead, dead! Dead, with all his glorious hopes, his dreams of art, his soul of love and loyalty. And in the palace the fright was over, the gayeties resumed, again breathed the softest music, and to it whirled the people in the rhythm of the dance.

Too soon, alas! the Princess knew the truth; too soon her own heart told her he was dead; and then she raised her slender form and turned her eyes first to the eternal stars, and then again to him.

Then, as she stood alone above that silent form outstretched in the cruel light of the moon upon the bed of purple flowerets—as she stood above that pale face, crimson spotted with a single gout of blood on the ashen cheek, she reeled and fell.

They found her there—the palace revelers—in the early morn, her senseless body prone upon his own, and they took her up and bore her gently away. They say she never waked from that death-like sleep of grief. It was better so—for she had loved him; not with a love that broke all barriers down, perhaps not even knowing that she loved till that last moment—and yet, she loved him well.

They heaped her grave and his with those dainty flowers that ever since have seemed to weep; they carved with cunning hand the blossom's delicate form upon the marble tomb, and the people even loved them so, for their sad tale, that out of the whole history of that pre-historic age, this leaf alone from their annals has come down to us.

O love! O grief! Plato well knew you both when, amid the groves and temples of stately Greece, he uttered that sorrowful cry: "One, indivisible, everlasting, and single."

BURNETTE G. HASKELL.

SAN FRANCISCO, July, 1878.

A book has recently appeared in England entitled "Cycles in Commercial Failures" showing, or attempting to show, by statistics that the law of periodicity in panics makes one necessary every ten years. The same superstition has prevailed in America and California, and it really seems as though for the last half century in the Eastern States, and, since the settlement of this State, in California, that we do have our regularly recurring period of hard times. That there is any law governing the business tides we doubt, except that tendency in human nature to rush from one extreme to another. We are always discounting the future. When business is good we make it better by our energy, enthusiasm, and confidence. When times are dull we make them worse by our fears and our want of confidence. We remember the panic of 1854; we recall the Frazer River scare. This is the third time in our history that we have seen business men frightened, real estate dull and faint-hearted, croakers go about the streets with lugubrious visages and sepulchral voices prophesying evil. This is a good time for fools to sell real estate, and a good time for wise men to purchase. These are the times in which the doctrine of the survival of the fittest is illustrated.

Mr. E. D. Sawyer has had the industrious presumption to collate a constitution, which he respectfully and appropriately dedicates to Mons. Bonnet, the barber, and Mons. Vacquerel, the cook. From it we extract the following provisions as specimens of the whole:

Art. II, Sect. 2—"All elections shall be free and equal."

Art. II, Sec. 3—"No alien Chinaman shall have the right of suffrage."

Art. V, Sec. 24—"An office is a public position."

Art. V, Sec. 25—"Provides in the oath of office: 'I do solemnly swear that I will not accept any Federal office during my term of office.'"

The Supreme Court shall have an appeal as follows:

"In cases where either court of appeals overrules a prior decision of the highest court-of the State, not previously overruled by the same court."

Judge E. D. Sawyer's law learning will never make him mad, but it is devilish vexatious to everybody except himself.

M. Gustave Droz, the distinguished French novelist, is a painter who took to writing only by accident, in order to assist his friend M. Marcellin, who had founded the Vie Parisienne. In that sprightly journal of sport and fashions, the signature "Gustave Z." was for several years the chief element of success, and much surprise was expressed on its becoming known that the author who drew the habits of refined society so well, who was so much at home in portraying women, and who knew all the prattle of children by heart, was a hardened bachelor, who lived in a studio redolent with tobacco smoke, and never set foot in a drawing-room because he hated dress-coats.

A chap on Long Island has named his little boy Brete Tarte.

INTAGLIOS.

The Sarcastic Fair.

Her mouth is a honey-blossom,
No doubt, as the poet sings;
But within her lips, the petals,
Lurks a cruel bee that stings.

W. D. HOWELLS.

The White Rose Lover.

Up to her chamber window
A slight wire-trellis goes
And up this Romeo's ladder
Clambers a bold white rose.

I lounge in the flex shadows,
I see the lady lean,
Unclasping her silken girdle,
The curtain folds between.

She smiles on her white rose lover,
She reaches out her hand,
And helps him in at the window—
I see it where I stand.

To her scarlet lips she holds him,
And kisses him many a time;
Ah me! it was he that won her,
Because he dared to climb.

T. B. ALDRICH.

From the German.

Oh, the might of the strength that dwells apart
In the deep, deep cells of a woman's heart!
Little we know it, and man may deem
It is but the tale of an idle dream;
But there are springs which are never dry,
But flow on in silence exhaustless;
And there are chords which, if once ye sound them,
The heart where they dwell will shiver round them.

Sermons.

Sometimes a little flower will tell us more
Of God's good wisdom than the grandest words
That ever preacher preached or organ chords
Thundered within the temple's sacred door!
A flying seed wafted on busy wind;
A bird-note hiding where the branches lean;
A glimpse of sunlit valley, left behind,
With sweet homes nestled in the living green;
Some friendly voice that greets us on the road
In common salutation brief and kind;
A gentle glance by stranger eyes bestowed;
The dear face of a child with tender meaning lined.
A lonely grave where violet buds have blown—
These are the presents by which God is known.

Strawberry's Surprises.

Sweet little Strawberry Blossom
Sat nodding in the sun.
She said: "When breezes dance me,
O what delicious fun!"
Just then a merry zephyr,
Who was gayly rushing by,
Took Blossom's white hat with him;
Said Strawberry Blossom, "Why?"

The warm sun, smiling brightly,
Kissed Berry's drooping head;
She dropped it lower, lower,
And blushed a rosy red.
A little brown-checked urchin
Espied her bending low,
And bore her home to mamma;
Said Ripe Red-Berry, "Oh!"

The Ideal.

Oh, might I meet her in my wandering,
By mossy rivulet or green hedge-wall,
Or in the copse where early throistles sing,
And clasp her in my arms and tell her all!
Yet well I know she dwelleth not on earth,
Nor yet in any other world unseen;
Nor will God ever fashion such a one
Lest haply He Himself should find a dearth
Of love and worship. If man's earthly queen
Were peerless as his highest thought could throne,
He would not lift his soul above her face;
And if she smiled, his heart would be at ease,
Nor rock of nobler love or fairer grace
Till black death caught him slumbering at her knees.

A Green Heron.

Where a bright creek into the river's side
Shoots its keen arrow, a green heron sits
Watching the sunfish as it gleaming flits
From shade to shade. He sees the turtle glide
Through the clear spaces of the rhythmic stream,
Like some weird fancy through a poet's dream;
He turns his golden eyes from side to side,
In very gladness that he is not dead,
While the swift wind-stream ripples overhead,
And the creek's wavelets babble underneath!
O bird! that in a cheerful gloom dost live,
Thou art to me, a type of happy death;
For when thou fliest away no mate will grieve
Because a lone, strange spirit vanisheth!

—Scribner.

Lamplight vs. Starlight.

Drunken with oil and all abaze,
A proud lamp sneered at Vesper's rays;
Boasted it shed a brighter gleam
At eve o'er valley, hillside, stream.
The night wind rising, softly sighed,
And in its breath the lamp's light died.
Kindled its wick, some one again,
From biting taut could not refrain.
Short-lived your radiance seems, he said,
Their beams the stars forever shed.

A Lily's Word.

My delicate lily,
Blossom of fragrant snow,
Breathing on me from the garden—
How does your heavy grow?
Tell me what blessings the kind heavens give,
How do you find it so sweet to live?

One loving smile of the sun
Charms me out of the mould;
One tender tear of the rain
Makes my full heart unfold.
Welcome whatever the kind heavens give,
And you shall find it as sweet to live.

LUCY LARCOM.

A Lover's Prayer.

In vanished days I said: "If God shall give
To me contentment—cause my path to lie
Through ways of pleasantness—I then may live
A peaceful life, and peacefully may die;
And joy shall surely through these channels flow,
If God shall bless me so."
But now I say: "If God shall give me thee!"
So ends my prayer. If I at last may meet
Before thee, loved one, who art more to me
Than all that life holds dear, that hour shall end
All save the dearest joy that man may know,
If God shall bless me so.

We walk through life in devious ways; no light
Illumes the distant future's shadowy mist,
But, like some phantom of the lonely night,
Come yearning thoughts my soul can not resist.
I long to share the joys my fancies know.
Kind Lord, oh, bless me so!

ELIOT RYDER.

SANITARY NOTES.

Some of our wealthy citizens and large owners of real estate, worn out with the great and petty exactions of Spring Valley, have an application before the Board of Supervisors for a franchise to bore wells and supply a populous portion of this city with water. They have failed to read of the effects of wells on real estate in other populous cities. It does not occur to them that there can be much connection between the price of real estate, in a given neighborhood of a city, and the fact that the people of that neighborhood are supplied with water pumped from a well in that vicinity. Yet in all large cities real estate is cheapest and rents lowest in those portions where the people are supplied from well water. The reason is obvious. The people who use well water in a populous city are subject to typhoid and low fevers, diphtheria, headaches, and general ill health. The neighborhood obtains the reputation of being unhealthy, the better classes leave it, rents fall and it is occupied by the poor and ignorant. Imagine a well in Hayes Valley or at the Mission, two hundred feet deep, and five thousand water closets, swill receptacles, urinals, and miles of sewers on the surrounding hills, and a population of thirty thousand, making use of these daily. Imagine this animal filth percolating through redwood sewers and State prison porous brick into the surrounding sand, there to be husbanded until the next winter's rain carries it into these wells, there to be mixed with the water in the lower strata, and then pumped up and used, looking as clear as rock crystal, but as full of uric acid and other fecal matter, as the surgical ward of an old hospital is of the bacteria of putrefaction.

In the suburbs of Liverpool, in England, a gentleman bored a well three hundred and fifty feet deep for the use of his house. The greater part of the boring was through rock. It was not supposed possible that the water from the well could be contaminated. The water-closet, which had been some years in use, was situated more than three hundred feet from the spot where the well was bored; yet, the year after the well was used, a test showed the water from it to contain uric acid, proving that the contents of the water-closet had followed the strata of rock, and followed the pipe down to the source from which his house was supplied. In August, 1873, in a part of that district of London called Pentonville, more than three hundred children, less than three years of age, died of typhoid fever within four days. The physicians were at a loss to account for this great mortality until it was ascertained that all of the families where the deaths occurred were supplied with milk from a particular dairy seventy miles distant. An examination showed this dairy to be cleanly and the cows to be fed on proper food. The buildings in which the cows were housed were on a hill, and all of the solid and liquid manure was preserved for sale in a large stone tank beneath these buildings. At the foot of this hill ran a small brook where the cows were regularly driven for water. It was found that some of the stones near the foundation of this tank had yielded to the pressure, and the contents had, probably for months, been passing under ground to this brook. The cows had thus been compelled to drink their own fecal matter, and the infant mortality was explained.

In a recent history of the spectroscopy, it is stated that, about five years since, the typhoid fever broke out on one side of a street in Liverpool, there being no cases on the other side of the same street. It was found that the water supply of each came from different sources. The reservoir that supplied the side where the sickness prevailed was situated on a hill above which was a hospital. The physicians said these cases of typhoid were certainly the result of the absorption of excrementitious matter, and they suspected that the drainage of the hospital was finding its way into the reservoir. To test the fact, a small quantity of lithia was placed in one of the urinals of the hospital, and after sufficient time had elapsed water was drawn from one of the pipes in an infected house. This water was tested in the spectroscopy, and immediately showed the crimson and yellow lithium lines. Excavation proved that a break in the sewer of the hospital had saturated the ground, and that a portion of the contents of the sewer had been leaking into the reservoir.

The Cloaca Maxima, constructed of stone (not by a San Francisco street contractor, for it has been in use without repair for 2400 years) has corrupted the earth to a depth of forty feet, and for more than one hundred feet on each side. So deadly are the exhalations, than none but the lowest class of Romans now live in its immediate vicinity. Travertine, tufa, and clay would hardly absorb more of a given amount of excrementitious matter in 2400 years than a wooden sewer and our sand would in thirty years. There is not a physician who "keeps abreast" of the investigations in sanitary science, but advises against the use of water from wells in populous neighborhoods. There is not an intelligent property-holder in Rome, London, Edinburgh, Boston, New York, or Philadelphia, who would hope to keep tenants of an intelligent class if he compelled them to use water pumped from wells in the vicinity of cesspools, water-closets, urinals, and sewers.

One of our citizens of average intelligence, living near the base of one of our hills, some years since, determining not to suffer the extortions of the Spring Valley Company, bored an artesian well for the supply of his house and that of his tenants. There are more than one thousand water-closets, besides the sewers, on the hill above him. His tenants have left, and his houses are but rarely occupied; he has lost both of his children, one by typhoid and one by diphtheria; his wife has become a confirmed invalid, and he has pains in the back, continuous headaches, and low fever, and crawls down town to attend to his business but two or three days in the week. His physician advised him that probably the water he was using was contaminated, and had some of it analyzed by a chemist. It was found to contain uric acid. The physician was discharged as compensation for his faithful investigation, and our citizen, clear-headed and sharp on grain, burials, and stocks, is now under the care of a Chinese doctor, who tells him his trouble is caused by his liver having become detached from his back-bone, and that the fever has melted the fat of his kidneys, and that his liver is floating loose in this melted fat. The Chinese doctor is giving him a tea made of mistletoe leaves, ginseng, gum arabic, and sturgeon bladder, and tells him that this tea will cause his liver again to adhere, when he will be restored to health.

We cannot complain that intelligent physicians do not advise us of the effects of lack of proper ventilation or of bad sewage and contamination of drinking water. The scientific and medical journals are filled with articles on these subjects and the public can read them if they desire to be informed. One could hardly expect his physician to say, "My dear sir, you have been over your ledger and given close attention to your business for fifteen years; you live in a climate where your skin cannot act naturally and your kidneys have to do the work properly belonging to the skin; you must quit work and go hunting and fishing, where you will have physical exercise, natural perspiration and give your brain rest. You have now slight congestion of the brain and occasional touches of sciatica showing that the nervous center is overworked." Or, how would one receive it if his physician said, "My friend, you are 'doping' your hair and beard with hair-dye to look young; you deceive no person but yourself; when time sends gray hair he sends wrinkles and crow's feet to correspond. All of this hair-dye is composed of lead and sulphur in some form; handle it, dye your hair with it and your system will absorb it. Your daily headaches, slight numbness, wandering pains and occasional temporary paralysis of particular nerves is painter's colic caused by lead poisoning from 'hair-dye' warranted to be prepared entirely from vegetable products." No physician can afford to be "a prophet of evil." A few constitutions can stand fifteen or twenty years close attention to business without relaxation, and those who possess them may not die of Bright's disease or paralysis, and some constitutions are capable of resisting lead poisoning for many years. The physician who volunteers advice loses his practice when his predictions fail. Most of us do not want to know the truth, even when we ask for it, if it is disagreeable, or if it will interfere with our money-making, our habits, or our pleasures. Some years since a Captain of Police, in an interior city, contracted an annoying hacking cough; at last he got uneasy about it, and called on an intelligent physician and said: "I have had this cough for some time and it worries me; I come to have you examine it. If it is consumption I want to know it and arrange my affairs. You know I am not afraid to die, for you are aware that in the pursuit of thieves and robbers I have taken desperate chances and hold my life cheap. I want to know the truth." The physician applied his stethoscope, found tubercles, and frankly told him he had consumption. The captain said, "It's a d—d lie," and left. He died within ten months, but devoted his time to the last in informing his acquaintance that he was daily improving in health, and in injuring the medical reputation of the physician who told him the truth at his own earnest solicitation.

Spring Valley water is bad enough. The cyclops, rotifers, and other animal infusoria can be digested without injury; so can cheese-mites and wood-cock entrails. All catchment water is bad when obtained from hills containing vegetation. The humus and decayed vegetation washed into the reservoirs by the winter rains only produce malarious fevers, and these can be neutralized by sulphate of quinia. But physicians have, no equivalent for quinia where, instead of decayed vegetable matter, decayed animal and fecal matter have been absorbed into the system, producing typhoid.

Without doubt the wells will be dug and some people will use the water. It may be that this—in the theory of evolution—is one of the modes by which the race is to be improved. If some people will not read, nor think, nor study to prolong their lives, it is well that they should die young and before they have propagated their kind. By this process—time enough being given—the race will have improved by a "natural selection" in sorting out the ignorant and stupid.

God Knoweth Best.

Some time, when all life's lessons have been learned,
And sun and stars forevermore have set,
The things which our weak judgments have spurned,
The things o'er which we grieved with lashes wet,
Will flash before us, out of life's dark night,
As stars shine most in deeper tints of blue;
And we shall see how all God's plans were right,
And how what seemed reproof was love most true.

And we shall see how, while we frown and sigh
God's plans go on as best for you and me;
How, when we called, He heeded not our cry,
Because His wisdom to the end could see.
And even as prudent parents disallow
Too much of sweet to craving babyhood,
So God, perhaps, is keeping from us now
Life's sweetest things because it seemeth good.

And if, sometimes, commingled with life's wine,
We find the wormwood, and rebel and shrink,
Be sure a wiser hand than yours or mine
Pours out this potion for our lips to drink.
And if some friend we love is lying low,
Where human kisses can not reach his face,
Oh, do not blame the loving Father so,
But wear your sorrow with obedient grace!

And you shall shortly know that lengthened breath
Is not the sweetest gift God sends His friend,
And that, sometimes, the sable pall of death
Conceals the fairest boon His love can send.
If we could push ajar the gates of life,
And stand within, and all God's workings see,
We could interpret all this doubt and strife,
And for each mystery could find a key!

But not to-day. Then be content, poor heart!
God's plans, like lilies, pure and white, unfold.
We must not tear the close-shut leaves apart;
Time will reveal the calyx of gold.
And, if through patient toil, we reach the land
Where tired feet, with sandals loose, may rest,
When we shall clearly know and understand,
I think that we will say, "God knew the best!"

Floy's Musings.

I wonder why the sky is always blue
Except at night, and when it's raining, too;
And why those clouds float on and never fall,
Does some one hold them there? I wonder who.

They look like snowflakes piled so high up there;
I wonder if they are; and if that's where
God keeps the snow through all the summer time
Till winter comes, then drops it in the air.

I wonder why the trees are green, and why
They lift their faces up against the sky.
I wonder what they see, and if they're glad
To feel the sun kiss all their dewdrops dry.

I wonder why the brooklet murmurs so,
And why its waters always onward flow.
I think it might be happy, it's so bright,
And stay a while here where the roses grow.

Perhaps, like me, it wonders why it goes,
But knows it can't, and so still onward flows,
And that is why it grieves so. How I wish
I knew what it is saying to the rose!

The rose bends down, keeps all her branches still,
Leans low and listens there a moment, till
She's heard the story; then she trembles so
She drops her own pink blossoms on the rill.

Is she sorry? Shall I by and by
Learn all the things she loves to say and try?
But when I ask at home, they only laugh,
And say, "Don't tease so, Floy." I wonder why.

The Wonderful Geysers!

THIS WONDERFUL SPOT OF CALIFORNIA

California should be visited by all residents and tourists. The Geysers of Iceland and the Geysers of the Yellowstone have their counterpart in the remarkable Canyon of the Pluton in Sonoma County. Wonderful as a curiosity of nature, wonderful as a health resort, and delightful as a resort of pleasure. By steamer, train, and coach, over a beautiful bay, through beautiful valleys and mountain hills, the trip alone more than compensates for the cost and time. Leave San Francisco daily at 3 p. m., by steamer for Donahue; take train for Cloverdale; stay all night at Cloverdale, and leave in coach—four-in-hand—at 7 a. m. for the mountain drive over the hills to the Geysers. Returning passengers reach San Francisco in a day by the Calistoga way. A trip to the Geysers is the easiest, most inexpensive, and most delightful of any in California. The hotel accommodations, the trout fishing, the hunting, the walks and drives, the bathing, the everything, are perfection.

all the conveniences necessary to their enjoyment, I have purchased the grounds adjoining the hotel for croquet, swings, etc. Having ample room for children's play-grounds I am able to offer unusual advantages to families. As an additional attraction I have erected Piazza 14 by 100 feet, with an elegant dancing floor. The Hotel has been completely renovated and refurnished. The Dining-room and general menu is under the personal supervision of Mr. GEO. W. HOADLEY, Manager. I am prepared to make special arrangements with families and others desiring to make an extended stay at the fashionable watering place of the Pacific. Day rates as usual. J. H. HOADLEY.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 25, 1878.

MY DEAR MADGE.—When I go to Baldwin's Theatre nowadays to see a new play I really expect something of a treat. The play itself is likely to be pretty bad, for they have come entirely to the end of their Union Square resources, and everything in the dramatic line is a drag in the market but good plays, but the stuff they do scramble together they mount with such regard for the unities, with such absolute fidelity to the little things which catch the public, that one is very apt to sit through the performance to see what device the clever machinists have evolved from the depths of experience and imagination. There was a good deal of this sort of thing in From Singapore to Suva, which name the management thought more appropriate than The Oerland Route, as Toni Taylor, for some strange reason, chose to christen his play. The latter name is not only suggestive of the big American trip, but as almost the entire plot takes place on ship-board, it is ridiculously irrelevant. The management, therefore, did a very wise thing in making a change. They got up a very realistic-looking saloon. If the Vokes had only been there to pitch and toss with the imaginary lurches of the vessel, we should all have been dreadfully sea-sick, with that horribly reminiscent red-checked table-cloth before us, and the long lines of staterooms from which a phantom emerged now and again. But the Vokes were not there, and the people rumbled around as solidly as if they stood upon as firm a base as the Pyramid of Cheops, so we were saved all imaginary trouble. The deck scene was more attractive, with its masts, and spars, and all the paraphernalia. There were a few life-preservers disposed gracefully about, some comfortable-looking lounges, and a crowd of people. Among them were some white-robed Nyahs in regulation costume, toe-slippers, bangles, etc. One of these, a Miss Alma Saville, an accommodating little singer, reminds me strongly of Clara Louise Kellogg as "Aida." Perhaps I need not mention that the resemblance ceases when Miss Saville begins to sing, although she crooned a Hindoo song very prettily. The Hindoo song was another of the realistic effects, but as Hindostance is rather an unfamiliar language hereabouts, Miss Saville was not importuned for an encore. But the triumph—the piece de resistance, the scenic artist's victory—was the sea, as represented first in the raft tableau, and afterward as washing the shores of the coral reef upon which the entire dramatis personae were wrecked. The sea consisted, in this instance, of a series of gray somethings, at first strikingly like the pictures of the Himalayan summits in the school geographies. Like the restless sea they shifted ever, and looked, in the half-light, like a long procession of friars, in orders gray, bouncing over a mud-puddle. As they assumed more regular motion, rising and collapsing quite evenly, the place looked like an umbrella factory in which a number of workmen were engaged in testing the joints by half-opening a new set of gray umbrellas. As a matter of course, in such an extremely realistic production the breakers could not be omitted. They were formed, so far as I could see, of an Archimedes screw, swathed in green calico and tufted with white cotton batting. The idea is not bad, and on a big stage I could fancy this a fine scene. But I can not say that we were overcome with awe with these almost transparent illusions, even in the terrific, thrice-encored raft-scene, where a few of the survivors stood calmly on a dry goods box while the big black-board in front of them pitched and tossed about wildly in the high calico-sea. The only striking members of the group were Bishop and Willie Seymour. The latter appeared in a dead dark gown and a very tight white suit as the detective; and, as he fastened the relentless grip of the saw in mid-ocean on the unhappy Augustus Lombard, the tableau, considering the relative avoirdupois of the pair, was something awe-inspiring. Some people, I observe, are inclined to compare Bishop unfavorably with Crane in this part but I attribute such an idea to rusty memory. I can not conceive anything more absurd than Bishop being around the saloon—for he is the only one who suggests any unsteadiness in a ship's cut—with the captain of the port, sea-sickness visiting him at intervals, and various other noxious, matrimony included, accumulating around him. His face, in its various phases, would serve admirably to a born one of those on elocution water in the passions are illustrated that remarkable series of wood-cuts which outshout other in hideousness. I do not wish to contribute the idea to you, Madge, that this excellent comedian is hideous, but when he commences to be funny he does not spare his beauty. Rose Wood, as "Mrs. Seabright," the heroine—they are all heroes and heroines, but I assume her to be the heroine because she is the leading lady—is a dashing young widow. That is to say, she has a husband whose existence she does not mention and his name is Jack. She makes many apostrophes to him when she is alone, which caused my Jack, who is not always attentive to the play, to start with some alacrity in answer to the fervency of the tone. She tempted the burning sun of the Indian Ocean in a pale pink ball dress, and without so much as a wisp of straw on her head. But she is such a nice little body, and works so hard, and is sometimes so thoroughly good, that I can forgive her making a guy of herself as she does in the last act, where they are reduced to strange shifts, but where Miss Corcoran makes herself picturesque by twisting an old red silk handkerchief around her head in fisherman's style. Mr. Mackay, in this same act, as "Sir Solomon Frazer, K. C. B.," etc., is as complete a wreck as the dismantled ship or the guy "Mrs. Skewton" when she was taken to pieces. I hardly liked him so well as usual during the first two acts, but when he appeared among the shipwrecked on the reef, sans hair, sans dye, sans teeth, sans everything, I realized how well he had been made up in the first part. After all, I said to myself, he rarely makes a mistake. This last act, by the way, saves the play. The first part is so insufferably tedious that, if the raft tableau had not awakened the risibilities, I believe few would have sat long enough to see the best of it. But the last act brings them all together under peculiar circumstances, and admits of a little insight to human nature. Mr. James O'Neill is put on the bills as "Tom Dexter," an adventurer, though why an adventurer I cannot see. He is made ship's surgeon in about five minutes after the curtain goes up, and might just as well have held that honorable position from the beginning. Perhaps, however, it is to admit of a certain rollicking jauntness of manner, which would be unbecoming in a ship's surgeon, but would sit well enough upon an adventurer. I do not like Mr. O'Neill's rollicking jauntness. Since I have seen his "Jean Renaud"—which is really a powerful bit of acting—I find that the gentleman must be very much in earnest to do anything really well. Of course he has a false, I may say a falsetto, idea. Mr. Brown's "Major McTurk" was chiefly remarkable for an accentuated seam down the back of his head, and a Scotch accent which was not half bad. He is quite a clever character actor, and possesses some genius in the matter of make-up, which genius developed itself in this instance in a pair of extemporized shoes consisting of basket covers. I watched the various rigs with some interest, as they indicated to some degree just how the various fancies would turn in case of real necessity. I have been to see Diplomacy once again. I am amused by the various comments of the people around me. They will go and sit through a mass of drivel, and laugh, applaud, and go again, and make no criticism, but each one finds a petty flaw in Diplomacy, and seems to rejoice in his discovery as a compliment to his own perspicacity. Jack and I thought we would take a hand at this fault-finding the other night. We commenced by objecting to "Zicka's" bitter humiliation. She is crushed into the very dust, tormented by the light, cold sneers of the supercilious "Harry Beauclerc," agonized by the cruel, unforgiving "Julian." We did not like the way "Harry Beauclerc" played with his victim in that little fable of the mouse and toasted cheese. We did not like to have her make her confession before them all. We did not like to look upon the strong agony of the strong woman. In short, we found that if we eliminated what we did not like we completely destroyed one of the strongest dramatic situations which the playwright conceived. The finale is really tame just at the last moment with that wooden, unimpulsive embrace of the reconciled pair, but still how few are the flawless gems! We gladly accept Diplomacy as it is with all its rarely good acting and delicate sinuities of plot! What a natural and clever stroke that is, to give the wily diplomatist for a clue the scent of a sachet-bag. There is something sensually suggestive in the very name of lotus-bloom, and women of the "Zicka" stripe always love strong perfume. They like abrupt contrasts, warm colors, splendid jewels, dashing traps, warmth, magnificence, expense. I should not ask a better "Zicka" than Jeffreys-Lewis. What an advantage height gives a woman on the stage! To me she is suggestive sometimes of a barbaric princess with her deer-like tread, her jetty locks, her dark-blue, expressive Celtic eyes, her magnificence of raiment, and a pair of great gold earrings, more expressive than the inevitable solitaires. Don't be alarmed at this bit of gush, Madge; the lady deserves it, for either the roof leaked on my nose or I shed a silent tear when she put forth the circumstances of her hapless, helpless girlish life in extenuation for an apparently long list of sins. She is wonderfully intense, and as such a complete foil to the pretty, kittenish "Dora," with her volatile, impulsive ways, her surface passions, and her blonde, phlegmatic beauty. Jeffreys-Lewis could play "Dora," but Maud Granger could not play "Zicka." I fancy Maud Granger would make a delightful "Juliet." There is a bit in Diplomacy which is slightly reminiscent of the scene with the nurse, and Maud Granger does it quite charmingly. Montague is still hoarse to some extent, but he does not retire to the wings and cough violently every few seconds, as burlesque prime donne do. He permits the audience to forget that he has a cold if they can. In fact, no one obtrudes personality on the audience, as has for so many years been the obnoxious custom of the California Theatre stock company. Mr. Warde occasionally sees fit to indulge in the slightest little bit of low comedy. People laugh at him at the time, but comment on it afterward, not because in itself it is so very bad—it would hardly be called low comedy in other companies—but because it jars upon the harmony which the superb "Zicka," the pretty "Dora," the perfect "Stein," the fervent "Julian," the courteous "Orloff" produce, and in which constellation Mr. Warde is certainly one of the shining lights. I think, Madge, that I have got that figure a little mixed, but they talk of the harmony of the spheres, and the spheres make the constellations, so I will let it go. In any case, you always understand.

Your own, BERTY B.

A Compliment for the Loring Club.

TO THE ARGONAUT:—The writer, on Tuesday evening, had the pleasure of attending the rehearsal of the Loring Club, and begs of the ARGONAUT a few lines in which to express an humble opinion of praise toward the rendering of one special number of the programme. Having been connected with and heard similar organizations in various cities of the East, societies which, in their interpretation of male part songs, stand unrivaled, it is not the writer's desire to offer any comparisons in a programme thoroughly well sung from beginning to end, but simply to refer to the singing of Schubert's "The Night"—the last number but one of the programme. Such a rendition as the Loring Club gave to this gem was certainly one that older and more experienced societies, with a larger and more favorable field from which to select, would have been proud, and deservedly proud, to have given. The shading, the perfect evenness of tone throughout, with no apparent forcing of voices in any part, and the feeling or sentiment that seemed to pervade each singer, made this song, of all the rest, as deliciously delicate and faultless as male part singing can hope to be. No richer compliment can be paid the club and its director, than that their Eastern rivals in song would, notwithstanding their advantages, find it extremely difficult to render anything nicer or more perfectly than Schubert's song was rendered on Tuesday evening by the Loring Club. That the club may continue to produce such musical perfections is the sincerest wish of a gratified

What Answer?

The effort on the part of the managers of the California Theatre to secure new faces has been a success, and for the production of Diplomacy they deserve a renewal of the patronage for which this theatre was originally distinguished. But why does Schultz still lead the orchestra? What exquisite torture to be obliged to sit through the execrable selections of this musical phenomenon! With what grave apprehension we see the drop fall, for it is then we are left to the questionable taste of our "ex-fire boy!" And our ears have been tortured with the inevitable "Wake up, Mose," until they ring again. We can not always go out, because we respect our record—and, besides, our wife won't let us. With such an orchestra as the California possesses under his control, Mr. Schultz could surely give us (if he saw fit) music that would while away the "tween acts," that would lead us to look with composure, at least, upon the falling of the drop, and perhaps with regret upon its rise. May we hope for this?

ONE WHO CAN'T GO OUT.

Charles Reade and Charles Mathews.

The following correspondence once took place between Charles Reade and the late Charles Mathews:

GARRICK CLUB, COVENT GARDEN, November 23.
DEAR SIR:—I was stopped the other night at the stage door of Drury Lane Theatre by people whom I remember to have seen at the Lyceum under your reign. This is the first time such an affront was ever put upon me in any theatre where I have produced a play, and is without precedent when an affront was intended. As I never forgive an affront, I am not hasty to suppose one intended. It is very possible that this was done inadvertently, and the present stage list may have been made out without the older claims being examined. Will you be so kind as to let me know at once whether this is so; and if the people who stopped me at the stage door are yours, will you protect the author of "Gold," etc., from any repetition of such annoyance. I am, dear sir, yours faithfully, CHARLES READE.

To this demand Mr. Reade received next day the following answer:

T. R., DRURY LANE, November 29.
DEAR SIR:—If ignorance is bliss on general occasions, on the present occasion it certainly would be folly to be wise. I am therefore happy to be able to inform you that I am ignorant of your having produced a play at this theatre; ignorant that you are the author of "Gold," ignorant that you are on the list at the stage door; ignorant that your name has been erased from the list at the stage door; ignorant that it has ever been on it; ignorant that you had presented yourself for admission; ignorant that it had been refused; ignorant that such a refusal was without precedent; ignorant that in the man who stopped you you recognized one of the persons lately with me at the Lyceum; ignorant that the doorman was ever in that theatre; ignorant that you never forgive an affront; ignorant that any had been offered; ignorant of when, how or whom the list was made out, and equally so of whom it was altered. Allow me to add that I am quite incapable of offering any discourtesy to a gentleman I have barely the pleasure of knowing, and, moreover, have no power whatever to interfere with Mr. Smith's arrangements or disarrangements; and, with the wholesale admission of ignorance, incapacity, and impotence, believe me, yours faithfully, CHARLES READE, Esq.

The next attraction at the Bush Street Theatre will be Haverly's Minstrels, with a new assortment of talent.

THE HOTEL VERANDA.

AFTER THE ARRIVAL OF THE SATURDAY NIGHT BOAT.

Why! how d'ye do?
Can it be you?
When did you get here, pray?
You know you wrote,
In your last note,
You couldn't get away.

You look quite ill,
(Now don't! Be still!
Don't squeeze my hand! I'll go.)
You've heard! Heard what?
Is it true, or not?
Oh! that! How did you know?

Yes! I've said yes.
To whom? Just guess—
I'll tell you if you're right—
It isn't out,
But you, no doubt,
Can keep it secret, quite.

What can you mean?
I might have seen?
Seen what? You never said—
I couldn't guess;
I told him yes,
You don't wish you were dead.

I met him here—
No! Just this year,
There, that's his T cart—see?
Yes! 'tis quite well,
And the groom as well,
There! that little man? That's he.

I must not wait,
I'll be too late,
He's going to drive with me.
I'll meet you then,
On the piazza, when
It's dark, and he can't see.

Fiske's Dramatic College.

The New York Dramatic News gets sarcastic over the idea of the Dramatic College which Stephen Fiske proposes to establish at the Fifth Avenue Theatre. It says: "All sects of professors and teachers are to be engaged for its faculty. It is to become a sort of Conservatory, in which the young idea will be taught how to shoot tragically or comically, as the case may be, and then polled for theatrical use. 'Ladies and gentlemen'—mind you, nothing short of 'ladies and gentlemen'—will be enabled to make their first appearance on any stage in leading characters, when equipped with Mr. Fiske's certificates of competency. Once a year the undergraduate supernumeraries will receive their diplomas from 'Governor Tilden, August Belmont, and other distinguished gentlemen,' which will, of course, make first-class actors and actresses of them at once. The 'ladies,' we presume, will all take 'Pauline,' 'Juliet,' and 'Camille' degrees, while the 'gentlemen,' on their side, will have for the titles of their baccalaureate, 'Romeo,' 'Armand,' and 'Claude Melnotte.' There will hereafter, thanks to Mr. Fiske, be none of that dearth of talent which all the newspapers so painfully deplore, and 'Society' will fairly swarm with 'ladies' and 'gentlemen' competent and more than willing to go on and play a 'responsible' part at a moment's notice. Seriously, was ever a more absurd scheme more audaciously presented to the consideration of the public? Its simple meaning, if Mr. Fiske's glittering generalities have any meaning, is this: Mr. Fiske not only intends to pay no salaries to his company, but, on the other hand, intends to make his company pay him for the privilege of appearing on his stage. Competent professional actors will be replaced by a lot of ambitious novices, out of whom Mr. Fiske will, under the pretense of 'educating' them, extort considerable fees."

Di Murska has told her matrimonial story to a reporter of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, prefacing it with the assertion that she is of noble birth, and that her success in Europe was wonderful. A French Count followed her for years, but she spurned his offer of marriage, and he in desperation shot himself. She says as to her first husband: "In our troupe was a young Scotchman, Anderson, well educated, and an excellent pianist. I supposed that his brilliant complexion was the result of health, but it was only the indication of heart disease. I liked him very well, but never dreamed of anything more, though he showed me much attention. In New Zealand, one evening, he fell from the piano-stool insensible. I had him carried to my apartments, and the doctor said it was a terrible attack of heart disease. To move him, the physicians said, would be fatal. I therefore gave up my apartments and took others, and shared with my maid in nursing him. I was roused from my compassion to hear that people were saying bad things of me because I was taking care of a sick man in my own house. He heard of it, and begged me to marry him, as he had only a few days to live. I was foolish enough to do so. He lingered for six weeks, and managed in that time to draw a large sum of my money from the bank, which he sent to his own family." Three months afterward she married Mr. Hill.

Clara Louise Kellogg's favorite "cuss word" is "By chaowder." Myron W. Whitney's is "Crotch all broom-sticks." Minnie Hackett's is "Holy St. Jerome," and Annie Louise Cary always says "Great juniper ginger" when her boot-lace breaks.

After Howells, Bavard Taylor will be Lawrence Barrett's next sensation in the way of a native American playwright. Taylor's play, however, is said to be simply a translation, and not to claim any decided originality in the way of treatment.

EXCURSION TICKETS TO MONTEREY.

On Saturday last the Southern Pacific Railroad Company commenced the sale of round-trip excursion tickets to Monterey at greatly reduced rates. These tickets will be sold on Saturdays ONLY, for the 8.30 A. M. and the 3.30 P. M. trains. The run of the latter train will be extended to Salinas on Saturdays to accommodate this travel, the Monterey and Salinas Valley Railroad making close connection with this train for Monterey. ## THE BEST OF TESTS.

NEW YORK, May 24, 1873.

Messrs. Steiway & Sons:—Gentlemen—On the eve of returning to Europe, I deem it my pleasant duty to express to you my most heartfelt thanks for all the kindness and courtesy you have shown me during my stay in the United States; but also, and above all, for your unrivaled Piano-fortes, which, once more, have done full justice to their world-wide reputation, both for excellence and capacity of enduring the severest trials. For, during all my long and difficult journey over America, in a very inclement season, I used and have been enabled to use your Pianos exclusively in my two hundred and fifteen concerts, and also in private, with the most eminent satisfaction and effect. Yours, very truly,

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

THE STORY OF DEACON BROWN.

Have you heard the story of Deacon Brown—
How he came near losing his saintly crown
By uttering language so profane?
But it wasn't his fault, as you maintain;
Listen, Maria, and you will see
How it might have happened to you or me.

A worthy man was Deacon Brown
As ever lived in Clovertown;
Bland of manner and soft of speech,
With a smile for all and a word for each.
"There's odds in deacons," as I've heard tell;
But one who had known him for quite a spell
Has often told me that Brown stood well,
Not only in church, but among his neighbors,
Esteemed and loved for his life and labors.
Not a man in the town at Brown would frown,
There wasn't a stain on his fair renown;
His soul was white though his name was Brown.

One morning the deacon started down
To purchase some goods at the store in town;
Sugar and salt and a calico gown,
And a pair of shoes for the youngest Brown.
And other things which he noted down;
A good provider was Deacon Brown.
His guileless heart was light as a feather,
As he rode along in the sweet May weather,
Till he came at length to the garden gate
Of the widow Simpson, and there did wait
For a moment's chat with the pious dame
Who, years ago, was the deacon's flame.

The widow Simpson was meek and mild,
With a heart as pure as an innocent child;
She dwelt in a cottage, small and neat,
A little way back from the village street;
And now, in sun-bonnet, with trowel in hand,
She was tilling the soil of her garden land.

The widow looked up and said, "Du tell!"
Is that you, deacon? I hope you're well."
And the deacon replied to the gentle dame:
"Quite well, I thank you; I hope you're the same."
Then they talked of the crops and the late spring storms,
Of the sparrowgrass and the currant worms;
And she asked the deacon what she should do
For the varmints that riddled her bushes through.

The deacon, scratching his head, said, "Well,
If I were you I would give them hell!"
He bore too hard on the fence as he spoke,
When suddenly, swiftly, down it broke;
And prostrate there, at the widow's feet,
Lay the fence, and the deacon pale as a sheet!

The deacon's pride was sadly humbled;
His teeth dropped out and he wildly mumbled,
As blindly there in the dirt he fumbled;
And the widow's faith as suddenly crumbled
When she saw how her good friend Brown had stumbled.
And her beautiful fence to the ground had tumbled,
While it seemed to her that an earthquake rumbled.
In fact, as you see, things were generally jumbled.
The widow turned pale, and well she might,
As she looked at the ruin with womanly fright;
But her pious soul was shocked still more,
As she thought 'twas an oath the deacon swore!

The deacon, too, in his grief intense,
Was afraid he had given the widow offense.
He looked around in a vague surprise,
While he tried to dam the tears that would rise
(Of pain and shame) in his dust-filled eyes.
But when he recovered his teeth and sense
He borrowed a hammer and fixed the fence,
And endeavored with meekness to explain
His late remark, which was cut in twain
By the fall of the fence and his own sad fall;
No man could say he ever swore!
He was only speaking of hell-bone.
A drug he could buy at What's-his-name's store,
To kill the bugs which her bushes bore.
I can not tell all that the deacon said,
But he started home with an aching head,
And a heavy heart that could not rest;
For a guilty feeling was in his breast
Which he couldn't get out, though he tried his best.

And the widow, she was ill at ease,
In spite of the deacon's apologies.
She left the garden, went up the stair,
Threw herself into her rocking-chair,
And rocked and rocked, till the soothing balm
Of the breeze and the sunshine made her calm.
Then she searched the scriptures to find a text
That should somewhat ease her mind perplex;
For her righteous soul was sorely vexed,
And she wondered, "Whatever will happen next!"
And she thinks to this day, as I've heard her say,
Brown shouldn't have spoken in just that way.
But as for myself, I question whether
If he'd just put his syllables nearer together,
There had been the least trouble of scandal. But then,
Such mistakes will occur with the wisest of men.

In viewing such things with our moral eyes,
There's a tenet always to moralize;
And this is the moral I offer for all:
When you think you are standing take heed lest you fall!

Shylock to Antonio.

Signor Antonio, many a time and oft
In der Rialto you haf abused me
About mine monies, and said dot
I took more interest in a year
Den der principal was come to!
Still haf I borne all dose mit
A patient shrug;
For, vat you call it? sufferance?—
Vas der badge uv all our tribe;
You call me bad names—
Mishelver, cut-throat, son ov a gun,
Cheep Shony, und so on.
Vell, den, it vas now appeared
Dat you need mine help!
You come to me und you said,
Mister Shylock, old poy, I would Like to borrow die dousand ducats
Till next Saturday! You said so?
You dat haf booted me
Two, drie, six, several times,
Und spur'd me from your threshold
Like a tog? Monies is your suit, den?
By goodness, you lie more cheek
As a book agent! Should I not said:
Haf a dog money?
Do son uv a gun
Keep a pank akound?
Didn't it been impossibility
Dat a eur should lend me more cheek
Dree dousand ducats? Or Shall I bend low, und in a bond-man's key,
Mit bated breath und whispered humbleness
Said this:
Fair sir, you spit on me on Wednesday last,
You spur'd me on me on Thursday,
On Friday you told me to vipe off
Mine shin off;
Anudder dime you call me
Old Stick-in-der-mud;
Und, now, for dose dings
I lend you—a five cent nickel
Und took a mortgage
On your old paid head! Don't it?
—Old City Derrick.

What we want is work, and pay for doing it,"
the tramp. "What kind of work?" said a bystander. "Unloading schooners," replied the incipient communist, "beer schooners."

MARBLEIZED

IRON MANTELS

—AND—

ENAMELED GRATES.

The perfection which the manufacture of Marbleized Iron Mantels has attained brings them in direct competition with the best qualities of slate for all purposes where mantels are used, and they are in a great measure taking the place of marble. The soft rich color in which these mantels are finished renders them a much more agreeable article of furniture to a room than the cold, repulsive-looking marble slab, and colors may be selected to harmonize with the furniture. In ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY OF FINISH, and DURABILITY OF MATERIAL, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

WHY SHOULD THE CHINESE GO?

PALACE HOTEL, August 2, 1878.

TO THE ARGONAUT:—You will doubtless gather from the superscription and general appearance of this letter that I am what Europeans, in the abundance of their vanity, would be very likely to regard as an anomaly—an educated Chinaman. In a word, I speak and write your language, as I believe, correctly. And it is because of this slight accomplishment that my general unworthiness has been overlooked by my countrymen residing in California, and I have been selected by them to communicate to the public the Chinese side of the Chinese question. The ARGONAUT has been especially preferred as the medium for the promulgation of these views on account of its reputed fairness to all.

The cry is here that the Chinese must go. I say that they should not go; that they can not go; will not go. More than this, that, were it conceivable that they went, your State would be ruined; in a word, that the Chinese population of the Pacific Coast have become indispensable to its continued prosperity, and that you cannot afford to part with them upon any consideration.

If this be true—and I believe I can demonstrate it even to your satisfaction—the truth is an important one. It concerns every element of the future social life of California; it lies at the basis of your industries; it is bound to subvert that demagogism by which your politics, as you call it, have been degraded to a level scarcely higher than incoherency, pillage, and murder.

Before I begin, let me describe the spirit in which I propose to discuss this subject. In the first place I intend to be just; to differ from you honestly; to be influenced by neither prejudice, hatred, nor resentment; to employ no specious arguments; to set up no weak issue, the easier to demolish it; to employ respectful language; to advance no facts which are not either well known to history or established in the course of the discussion itself.

Clothed in this dignity of discourse, I enter the lists without fear. I am upon your soil; I am surrounded at the best by unsympathetic spectators; my only buckler is the truth; my only weapon your language, the peculiarities of which can never be wholly mastered by a foreigner. Far from complaining of any disadvantage in these respects, I am free to own that no soil is freer, no assemblage more noble, no regulations more just, than those which claim the proud title of American.

And now let the heralds be heard and my grievance stated. Hear, oh, ye just and valiant men, ye beauteous and compassionate women, the plaudit of Kwang Chang Ling, a Ullente of the first class, a warrior and noble, a leader of the Chinese and a representative by authority.

The first intercourse in modern times between Europe and China took place in the early part of the thirteenth century, when Genghis Khan, our first Mongol emperor, carried an imperial army and the cause of Deism, or, as you now call it, Unitarianism (I use the word advisedly), through idolatrous Russia. In 1235, Oktai, son of Genghis, dispatched his nephew, Batu Khan, with 500,000 men, who, in the same cause, conquered Russia, Poland, and Silesia, including the strongly fortified cities of Cracow and Lublin. This prince met and overthrew in battle, Prince George II., of Prussia; Henry, Duke of Breslau; and Bela IV., of Hungary; only resting his victorious army after he had encamped in Dalmatia and floated the ensign of China above the Venetian sea.

In 1240, and while still occupied in that religious regeneration of Eastern Europe which had been commenced by the illustrious Genghis, Prince Batu died, leaving command of the army of occupation to Prince Barkah. In 1245, after news had reached Europe of the conquest of Jerusalem by the Khazarians and the treacherous massacre of the Knights Templar and other Christian inhabitants, the Seventh Crusade was proclaimed, and Pope Innocent IV., of Rome, and Louis IX., of France, united in an entreaty to the Chinese prince to combine with them in chastising the Moslem. This request he was inclined to grant for two reasons: First, the Chinese sympathized with Christianity, which had been tolerated and allowed to be preached in China since the advent of the Nestorian Olophen in 636; second, at the time of Prince Batu's death he was preparing a force to conquer Turkey and uproot Mohammedanism. But, insurrection breaking out in Russia, Barkah was compelled to march thither and forego the pleasure of uniting his forces with those of the Christian monarchs. When, at a later period, Pope Boniface VIII. sent a number of Catholic missionaries to our country, they were received with kindness and permitted to preach their doctrines without molestation.

So much for the first intercourse between China and modern Europe. To you, Genghis Khan was a cruel marauder at the head of an army of robbers and murderers, who overran Eastern Europe for spoil. To us, he was a great religious leader, who sought to uproot idolatry and establish a pure and simple deism in its place. The idea of leaving a rich country like China to find spoil upon the desolate steppes of Russia, or amongst the wretched peasants of Prussia or Hungary, is absurd. If our generals had been after spoil, they would have marched into Western Europe for it. There was no physical obstacle to stop them. They had more men-at-arms equipped and encamped in Dalmatia than all Europe could have raised in a year. But there was a moral obstacle in the way. Western Europe was a Christian country, and with the religion of Christ the Chinese leaders had no quarrel. And so, from the confines of Christendom, within whose borders they never entered, these half a million of warriors, with whom Prince Barkah had crossed the Danube, were marched back over five thousand miles, chiefly of arid wastes, to the Flowery Kingdom and their homes.

If you have anything in the history of your civilization to match the magnitude of these expeditions, the distances they traversed, the grandeur of their mission, and the sublime restraint they exercised toward Christian Europe, we Chinamen would be glad to hear of it. I am sure you will not find it in the expeditions of Cortes or Pizarro, who, between them and in the name of your religion, butchered several millions of the peaceful and inoffensive inhabitants of Mexico and Peru, and reduced the remainder to the cruel slavery of the mines. Nor is it to be found in the annals of the Thirty Years War, nor in the records of the Inquisition.

But it is not to invite such comparisons that these episodes of history have been introduced. My object is a higher one. This is to compare the military power and resources of China and Western Europe at three critical periods of their intercourse—at the period of the Chinese invasions of the thirteenth century, at the opening of maritime commerce by Europeans in the sixteenth century, and at the present time.

When the hosts of Batu Khan overlooked the Adriatic Sea, they were clad in steel armor and mounted upon fleet horses. Their arms consisted of the sword, battle-ax, mace, bow-gun, and culverin. With the exception of the pieces used by the Arabs in Spain, who had obtained a knowledge of gunpowder from China, through commercial channels, these culverins were the only artillery in Europe. In a word, the arms and accoutrements of the Chinese were at that period vastly superior to those employed throughout Europe generally; the numbers of their armies were far greater, and their discipline was perfect; and as to their prowess, this is attested by their conquests, and still more by the almost entire silence of European history concerning them.

At this period, save in Mohammedan Spain, Western Europe was steeped in poverty, ignorance, and despair. Its civilization had been long decaying; its population had dwindled from sixty millions, in the time of the Antonines, to thirty millions when the Inquisition was established. Society had become so debased that in the eleventh century human beings were employed as a circulating medium in Britain, and the price of a man was less than that of a hawk.

In the twelfth century, and as a sign of his superiority, Pope Celestine III. kicked the crown off the head of the Emperor, Henry VI. Kings then lived in huts, and peasants in holes in the ground, where they slept with the pigs. The common garment was a sheepskin, which was worn through life. That of Thomas a' Becket had to be peeled from off his back after he died. Woolen garments were worn at a later date, and at first only by the feudal lords and their principal retainers. As for undergarments, these were only known to the Arabs.

The continent was divided into a great number of petty kingdoms—in France alone there were twenty-nine, each with its own dynasty and history—and each kingdom into an infinite number of feudatories. The kings were mere figure-heads; the real power lay locally with the feudal lords, and continentally with the Pope. Indulgences were bought and sold in open day; the grossest sensuality prevailed, and every tendency toward progression was smothered in the folds of a sordid ecclesiasticism and a profligate aristocracy.

In a word, in the thirteenth century, China stood at the height of her power and magnificence; Europe at the lowest point of her decadence. Magna Charta was not written until 1215, and had to be confirmed above fifty times during three centuries before its reforms were assured. Coal—that illimitable reservoir of mechanical force, which has subverted the relations and revolutionized the history of races—was not discovered in Newcastle until 1239, nor made an article of traffic until 1381. The Crusades, the inventions of gunpowder and printing—both obtained from China—the discovery of America, the reformation; in short, all of those causes or influences to which the civilization of Modern Europe has been variously ascribed, had yet to occur. When these did occur Europe rose to power, whilst at the same time, China, from causes which I need not enter into here, fell into decay. We have seen how China behaved toward Europe when the latter was at her mercy. We have next to trace the attitude of Europe toward China upon the opening of Oriental commerce and since that time—that is to say, ever since Europe has become the stronger. This exchange of conditions had partly occurred before the Portuguese rounded the Cape of Good Hope. At this period China was in a decaying and feudal condition, while the causes referred to were soon to infuse fresh life, vigor, and resources into Europe. It was the Europeans who were now the better armed and equipped. Their ships, their artillery, their small arms, were all better than ours. We shall presently see what use they made of them.

Meanwhile, let us rapidly glance at the condition of the Celestial Empire. It was, as I have stated, in a feudal condition, and so, in great measure, it continues to this day. Although the just pride of the Emperor will not permit him to admit the fact, his power over the numerous provinces, islands, and vassal and tributary states, which compose his dominions, is far from complete.

Europeans do not appear to understand this condition of affairs; yet it has had much to do with their misunderstandings of my countrymen. The foreigners who have at various times sought and obtained imperial permission to trade at certain ports of China supposed, perhaps, when this permission was obtained, that they had a complete right to trade. But this by no means followed. There remained to be obtained the permission of the feudatory or local authorities of the territory in which the trading was to be done. This permission was not always sought after, and forcible attempts were made to trade without it—attempts that invariably gave rise to further misunderstandings.

As feudalism of the type now existing in China has been long since extinguished in Europe, it is difficult to illustrate the injustice of these attempts by reference to any governmental arrangements that now exist in the Western World. The best simile I can think of would be furnished by an effort on the part of foreigners to lay a railroad through the United States under a charter from the Federal Government, and without obtaining permission from the States. But, after all, the resenblance between feudalism and federalism is very faint. Happily for Americans the Federal Government possesses sufficient military strength to keep the States in subordination, and the States sufficient respect for the Federal Constitution not to defy its authority; but such is not the case in China, nor has it been for several centuries. The great vassals of the empire divide much of its power between them; sometimes they even create the Emperor.

It was in the year 1498 that the Portuguese, under Vasco de Gama, made their way around the Cape. In 1510, under Albuquerque, they treacherously seized the East Indian city of Goa, and leaving a garrison in it, sailed away to Malacca, which they had seen and coveted in 1508. This great city they treacherously and piratically captured. The superiority of their arms will be understood when it is stated that this act was committed by only eight Portuguese, assisted by two hundred Malabar natives. They plundered Malacca of "a booty so enormous that the quinto, or fifth, of the King of Portugal amounted to 200,000 gold cruzadoes, a sum equivalent to $5,000,000," exclusive of ships, naval stores, artillery, and other property. Malacca was at that time a vassal state of the Chinese Empire, and our first acquaintance with maritime Europe was, therefore, begun on its part by the greatest act of piracy the world has ever witnessed. Pizarro's plundering of Peru, committed a few years later, was nothing compared with it. Hearing at Malacca of the great Chinese cities to the northeast, and hoping no doubt to pillage them as his companions had pillaged Goa and Malacca, one of the Portuguese, Raphael Perestralo, sailed away in a junk to view our coast. Finding the Chinese better prepared for pirates than he expected, he returned to Malacca.

The result of this reconnoissance was that a pretended "embassy" was dispatched from Lisbon in 1518, under Ferdinand Andrada, to treat with the Emperor of China for permission to trade. Andrada, the first European to land at a seaport of China, appeared off the harbor of Canton in the same year, and was allowed to disembark and to send an envoy to the Emperor at Peking. This envoy, whose name was Thomas Perez, was kindly received, loaded with presents, and accorded the favors he sought. He at once visited all the sea-coast towns, and after a rapid survey of them returned to Canton and joined his colleague Andrada. Meanwhile, Andrada's brother Simon appeared off the coast in command of a piratical squadron, pillaging the inhabitants and seizing young women. He then built a fort on the Island of Taywan and extorted money from every vessel bound to or from Canton; not supposing but that his brother Ferdinand was on board of his own ship and safe from Chinese reprisal. Thus it appeared that this band of "ambassadors" were nothing but a lot of adventurers and cut-throats, whose sole object was plunder and rapine. So soon as their doings became known, Perez and Andrada were seized in Canton, tried, and condemned to pay a fine, and to leave the country—a mild punishment for their great offenses. Pending the payment of this fine a subject of the Sultan of Malacca arrived at Peking, and related the story of the pillage of that town by the Portuguese. The true character of these scoundrels was now clear beyond a doubt. They were again seized, this time on charges of high treason, and condemned to death; their lives being offered them on condition of restoring Malacca. Failing to do this, they were all executed in 1523.

I have related the particulars of this our first transaction with natives of maritime Europe because it is a type of all the others that followed from that time until the opium war of 1842. The naval commanders of the sixteenth century were little more than pirates, and so long as they succeeded in filling the royal treasuries of Europe with gold and silver, their sovereigns were quite ready to close their eyes to the means by which this wealth was acquired. Such was the character of Albuquerque, Andrada, Cortes, Pizarro, Sir John Hawkins, Sir Francis Drake, Sir Henry Morgan, and numerous others. The Portuguese, the Dutch, and the English came to China as the Spaniards had visited Mexico and Peru, and as the English afterward visited the West India Islands, the Spanish Main, and the East Indies—to plunder it. At first we did not suspect them of such designs, and being especially a peaceful and commercial people, we listened to their proposals of trade, and threw the whole country open to them. It was only after repeated evidences had convinced us that they designed to treat China as they had treated Spanish America and Hindostan that we adopted that policy of restriction which afterward came to be looked upon, however erroneously, as essentially Chinese. The real fact of the matter is that we desired to trade even more strongly than you did, only, observing that your guns were heavier and your men stronger than ours, that your traders were little better than bandits, and your naval commanders a parcel of swash-bucklers, we deemed it prudent to conduct this trade solely at Macao and Canton, where, confined to limited districts and to the management of the Honges, it might not be used as a means of gaining entrance to the country, and of tampering with our vassal states, as had been done in Mexico, Peru, and Hindostan.

Perhaps you may think that the Chinese question in California has little to do with all this. Well, we shall see. The trouble about the Chinese question is, that it has hitherto been viewed from too low and narrow a standpoint. It has been forgotten that nations have histories, and that their relations toward one another are not to be determined altogether by present or local considerations. This may not be perceptible to my friends of the sand-lot, who, as workmen, inspire my respect, while as historians and logicians they excite only my amusement. But it will be perceived the moment it comes to be practically decided, and it may then be too late to discuss the matter. For this reason, and because a peaceful solution of this question is desirable, both for your people and ours, I prefer, with your honor, to discuss it now.

A WASTED LIFE.

The Story of an Oregon Clergyman.

The Young Men's Debating Club of Portland, Oregon, had become deeply interested on the subject of intemperance in the use of spirituous liquors.

A debate between some of the more prominent members of the association had taken place, in which various arguments relating to the question had been brought forward. Of course temperance principles triumphed, as they generally do on such occasions.

The president of the club, the Rev. John Belden, in awarding the victory to the temperance people, took occasion to say: The arguments brought forward by the different speakers this evening are, to a certain extent, true. "I feel certain that the use of intoxicating liquors is the direct cause of a vast amount of misery and unhappiness. But, while conceding this, I am not prepared to admit the truthfulness of the statement made by several gentlemen this evening, that alcohol has been the ruin of all the dissipated sots, whose lives have been shown up to us. I consider that many of these unfortunate men have been ruined by other weaknesses. I have a case in my mind at the present moment which supports this supposition, and the story is both romantic and interesting:

I came to Oregon several years ago for the purpose of filling the position of Presiding Elder of a certain district of our church. My circuit ranged over a large extent of country, mostly uninhabited, the part that was inhabited being filled with a crowd of rough, rude men. I must acknowledge that the life was distasteful to me, but I conscientiously strove to fill the position and do my duty.

After quite a long time, I received notice that I was to be transferred to a more congenial field of labor, and to proceed on a farewell trip over my circuit. On this trip I first became acquainted with the principal character in this narrative.

It was nearing dusk of an April day. I had been riding from early in the morning and felt fatigued, and I noticed that my horse traveled as though he, too, was jaded. Under the circumstances I considered it about time to rest. The nearest house, however, on the trail which I was following was several miles away. I had heard, however, on one of my previous trips, of a ranch situated a short distance from where I was, to the right of the main trail. There I determined to go. I took a bridle-path over a grassy ridge, and, after a few minutes rapid traveling, I saw the rancher's house, nestling on the nearer bank of a small, narrow river, about half a mile below me.

As I jogged down the hill, I observed that there was a small patch of cultivated land adjoining the house. Here was an incipient orchard—a few young trees—apple and peach and plum, a few rows of strawberry vines, some gooseberry bushes, and the balance of the land taken up by corn and potatoes.

The house itself was built of logs, in genuine pioneer style, the chinks between the logs being plastered with mud. I passed through a large corral, rode up to the door, and, in the custom of the day and country, shouted out:

"Hello, house!"

A young man answered my call, in a clear, ringing voice, with the cheering words:

"Hello, yourself! 'Light, stranger, and come in.

I dismounted, and, after giving my horse into the care of the rancher, entered the house.

The house consisted of two rooms; the front one, in which I now found myself, was of fair size; the wall was papered, and pendent from nails, tacked here and there, were a few gaudy pictures. This room was separated from the kitchen by a board partition, in the middle portion of which was a door which was partly open.

Glancing through the half-open door I saw a squaw busily engaged preparing the evening meal. She was a big, fat, clumsy creature, of whom the only noticeable feature was the three straight, blue lines tattooed on the chin. While observing these facts, the young man returned from the barn.

"Stranger," he said, as he stirred up the back-log in the fire-place with the small fire-shovel, "my name's Campton, what might be yours?"

I mentioned mine, without stating my occupation.

"Glad to meet you, Mr. Belden," he cried, "and I guess you will be glad to meet a square meal after being in the saddle all day. Come, let us dispose of this grub."

We sat down before a table on which fried venison was the principal dish, and began a vigorous attack on the well-cooked viands. The squaw was standing by the stove watching us.

"Come, Susan," he said, in an authoritative tone, "sit down and eat." Then turning to me he said: "Mr. Belden, this is my wife."

At that day and in that section, it was no uncommon thing for white men to live with squaws. But nearly all of these "squaw-men" (as they were called, with whom I had become acquainted, were men of maturer years, who had come to the country when it was more unsettled, and who had taken squaws because of the scarcity of white women. But here was a young man, who, despite his slangy ways, evidently possessed a fair intellect and a lively disposition; one from whom much better things might have been expected. My surprise was extreme, and the squaw, who appeared well pleased with her situation, grinned at the look of astonishment which I could not conceal.

Campton was a genial host. That evening we seated ourselves in the front room around the fire-place, from which a huge back-log threw out a genial heat; and I passed the time listening to his recital of interesting incidents of the rude life in that backwoods country. But, notwithstanding the humorous nature of the narratives, and the happy way in which he told them, they were garnished with oaths of so mean a character and of so great a variety that I was oftentimes inexpressibly shocked.

The following morning I left early. Campton refused pay for my lodging, and cordially invited me to call should I ever happen to be in that section again. My interest in him being so great, I felt anxious to know what train of events had made so handsome a man to live with that coarse, —one of the most hideously ugly squaws I had

The duties of my position, however, compelled me to take a direction in which he was but little known; and in the excitement of travel and new scenes, all thoughts of him passed from my mind not to be again revived until some five years had elapsed.

I was about to start on a long-contemplated trip to the old world. On my way to Portland I reached a small town upon a Saturday evening, and remained there over the Sabbath. I accepted an invitation extended by the resident minister to preach a sermon in the little church belonging to our sect, and delivered one which I have since been told was eloquent. Whether it was or not, it most certainly came from the heart, and should have been effective. It was an appeal to all poor sinners, and I remembered that I entreated them, one and all, to do their duty and trust in God.

After the services a few of the parishioners remained for the purpose of speaking with me, among them was a young lady, a school-teacher, of well known religious tendencies, whose beauty was extreme. I have not seen her since, but now, after the lapse of years, I can clearly recall the pale, delicate features, the blue eyes, and the dark hair that fell in ringlets over her shoulders.

There was an expression of peace on the face that is indescribable; there was a pleading look in the eyes that would have induced me, had I been a young man, to do some very disagreeable things to please its possessor.

Her face was but the index to her mind, her thoughts were pure, her disposition kind, her behavior modest. I spoke a few words of ordinary civility to her, which she gracefully answered, and then introduced me to the gentleman accompanying her—a Mr. Hubert Campton.

In the few seconds spent in murmuring the usual compliments my thoughts flew quickly back to the "squaw man" I had met five years before, and, as our eyes met, I thought I could trace a strong resemblance between the features of the quiet, self-possessed gentleman standing before me and those of my profane friend of the hills. His actions proved to me that I was not mistaken, for he gave me a look—I may say an appealing look—and said in a very low tone of voice:

"Mr. Belden, I believe I have had the pleasure of meeting you before. I should like to see you this afternoon, if you have the time to spare, for a short talk."

I muttered an assent to this proposition, and, accompanied by the young lady, he passed down the aisle, and, in the departing throng, were soon lost from sight.

That afternoon he called upon me at my rooms in the hotel.

On entering he advanced across the room, and when I arose to greet him he grasped my outstretched hand and shook it warmly, saying at the same time:

"I am glad to meet you, Mr. Belden, and I thank you for the sermon which I listened to to-day. It has done me a world of good. But it is not of that I come to speak; I am here on different business."

I had placed a chair for him by the window while he was uttering these words and motioned him to a seat. I made no verbal reply to his compliment, though I assure you I appreciated it, and could not but favorably contrast his appearance and manner at the present time to what they had been when I last saw him. He seated himself by the open window and gazed out upon the people passing on the street below.

It was a pleasant day. The sky was blue, the weather warm, the atmosphere delicious. For a time the quiet beauty of the scene kept us both silent. Finally he spoke, saying:

"Mr. Belden, I came here to-day to explain to you why you see me here, and to request you to refrain from any mention of the peculiar circumstances connected with my past life, with which you are acquainted. In doing this, I intend to confide my life's past history to you, so that you will see that I am acting honestly with you and others."

"To begin at the beginning, I come of good but ignorant parents. I myself received a fair education during my early years. In my nineteenth, I came to Oregon. I settled upon a piece of land—the same that you saw five years ago. I was not of age at the time. But as I was strong, well built, and quite old-looking, this caused me no trouble."

"After living on the place for about a year and a half, I began to grow tired. The life became monotonous. I desired a release from it, and I particularly longed for the society of woman; but I dared not leave the place, as the land was unsurveyed—and you are probably aware that on unsurveyed government land it is necessary for the settler to be on his claim at least once in thirty days. In my letters home, I, of course, mentioned these facts; and I received several letters from my parents, commiserating my lonely condition. Finally I received a letter from home, in which even more than the usual sympathy was expressed, and I was asked, in a hinting sort of a way, if I remembered a certain young lady, who, in younger, happier years, had been a playmate. 'If you do,' the letter went on to say, 'she is single; she is a mighty nice woman, and as good a cook as you ever laid eyes on.' Of course, she ain't over-brite, but she's powerful handy to half around."

"Those are the very words, as they were written in that letter, in my father's cramped hand, with his very peculiar spelling. I thought over this thing seriously. I must acknowledge that I was somewhat inclined to be sentimental. I had on divers occasions allowed my mind to be filled with captivating thoughts of a possible future, in which a tender, loving woman and myself should play a leading part. And from such pleasant dreams I was invited to descend to the end that I might marry a girl 'who is not over-brite, but powerful handy to half around.'"

"I remembered the girl well; but the remembrance brought no pleasing fancies. A pretty, light-hearted creature, winning enough, to be sure, but yet lacking that indefinable something for which I was looking—that magnetic charm which produces love. It was repugnant to my feelings to marry her, and I do not think I would have done so had it not been for the fact that on a certain warm summer's night, after a hard day's work, I returned home wearied out; I looked around the cabin: I saw the half-cooked grub, the sodden bread, the dirty coffee—and my resolution was formed."

"I sat down and wrote a letter to Miss Florence Jones, frankly stating my position, and inviting her to leave the world and cleave to me, for better, for worse, etc."

"There was no foolish sentimentality about it. It was a purely business transaction, done in a purely business manner; and I sometimes think that if there had been a greater show of affection, it would have been better for us both."

He stopped speaking while he lit a cigar, after first offering me one, which, of course, I declined.

He paced up and down the room for a few moments, his hands clasped behind his back, and then continued:

"Well, she accepted the offer. The preliminaries, consisting of a draft for two hundred dollars to defray expenses and a few smaller trifles, were soon arranged. Then came a trip on the cars to New York for Miss Jones; an ocean voyage to San Francisco, via Panama, for the same young lady; then Portland; the Hills; a quick wedding; roast turkey; some cake; and the wedding tour was ended, 'store' clothes laid aside, and the hard realities of every-day life began."

Again he paused. He went to the window and looked out. There was an expression of sadness on his face which I could not help noticing, though I could not imagine the cause. I felt interested in his story, and I felt charmed with him. Soon he turned towards me and again continued:

"I purposely condense this statement as much as possible. Of course my own feelings and affections have but little interest for you."

I assured him that I was very much interested, and desired him to take his time and tell his story in his own way. "Thank you," he answered, bowing. "My wife and I lived quite happily, after a fashion. There was no love lost between us, but we did very well; and I really supposed I was happy and felt certain she was, until, after two years of wedded life, there came a night which I will remember to my dying day. A stormy night; a night of heavy rain and blustering wind; a gloomy night for the mind; one of those dismal nights on which the darker side of our nature comes to the surface and remains with us to render us sour and crabbed while it lasts; precisely the sort of night that I should select for a dark, bad deed."

"On that night the wife of my bosom left me, taking with her our child—the sole pledge of our married life—and accompanied by one whom I had, up to that moment, considered my dearest friend."

He sat down and buried his face in his hands, as though he would hide the evidences of passion that shone so clearly in his every feature. I sympathized with him, but I considered it best to say nothing, and so I waited. He arose once more, and paced up and down the room while he continued:

"I can tell this to you quite coolly now; but then—I was—well, what matter words—mad, crazy, out of my mind. I followed her and her partner in crime—unsuccessfully. Had I overtaken them, it would have been the worse for one or both, for I had the ancient injunction in my mind, 'an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth.' I returned home. My heart was full of the most deadly hatred for all womankind. I took that squaw whom you saw from the Indian with whom she had been living; I made her the mistress of my house. I wished to show my utter contempt for her faithless white sister, and that was my way of doing so. I gave myself up to dissipation. I am told that I made my name a terror to the quiet people in our neighborhood; for this I am sorry."

"A few months ago I met the lady in whose company you saw me to-day. I saw in her the ideal of my youth. I felt that she could lift me to a higher, nobler life, and I have learned to love her with all the strength of my nature. I believe she reciprocates this passion. But she knows nothing of my past life, and believes me to be all that is good and true."

Again he stopped for a moment, as if in thought, and then turning to me, he said:

"Now, Mr. Belden, I intend to tell her all these things, and I desire the information to come from me. For this reason, I ask as a favor that, for a few days, you will say nothing of these troubles of my past life. Perhaps her love for me will enable her to forgive my errors, to forget my past." He stopped speaking.

I was powerfully affected by his romantic story. I felt that the man was honest and sincere, I felt that he truly desired that one dark blot of his life to be effaced, I felt that he needed encouragement, and taking his hand, I said to him:

"Mr. Campton, you have my sympathy. All I can say to you is to assure you that I will be silent, and to repeat to you those stereotyped words, so easy to utter, so hard to live up to, 'Do your duty.' Your duty at the present time," I added, "is to inform Miss Ruddock of these facts. Though you have fallen, still it is possible for you again to rise. You may succeed; perhaps you may fail. In either case remember those words of Schiller's:

"What shall I do to gain eternal life?
Discharge aright
The simple duties with which each day is fire;
Yea, with thy might,
Ere perfect scheme of action thou devise
Shall life be fled,
While he who ever acts as conscience cries
Shall live though dead."

I believe I threw some feeling into these lines. I know that I wished to do so, and I am vain enough to believe that I succeeded. He listened attentively, and when I ceased he cried:

"Thank you, thank you, Mr. Belden; those words are sufficient. They give me new courage, and now I will leave you. Good-bye." After a few more words we parted.

The following day I left for San Francisco. I went to Europe. I saw the Holy Land, the Eternal City. Art, with its priceless treasures, detained me in Italy; reverence for the past, in Palestine; admiration for the bustling activity of the present, in England. Month succeeded month, until twenty-four had slipped away, and I sighed for home.

I returned. What joy it was to meet my friends once more! How bright, how cheerful all seemed. After a short rest in Portland I took a trip into the country. On a summer's day I once more drove down into the little town where I had last seen Campton, and the memory of the past came back.

That afternoon I accompanied my friend, the Rev. Mr. Strong, in a walk through the neighboring fields that were now a waving mass of grain. Grains of all kinds were growing near us, their slender blades blowing here and there in consonance with the light breeze that brushed so daintily by.

We talked of many things. My friend, of course desired to hear tales of the strange land from which I had but just returned, and in the description of the interesting scenes through which I had passed I, for the time, forgot my friend Campton.

We strolled along until taking a sudden turn in the trail we came in sight of the village cemetery, situated on a little hill above the winding river. A feeling of awe involuntarily came over me.

The cities of the dead always have a solemnity for me which I find it hard to explain. We walked along more silently until we reached a grave, over which daisies were growing in wild luxuriance. Mr. Strong stopped and, pointing to the grave, said:

"That is the grave of one universally beloved, but whose life was very unhappy. I firmly believe she is now an angel in heaven, for while on earth she was kind to the suffering, good to all."

"Her name?"

"Alice Ruddock."

"What! Not the lady to whom a Mr. Campton was paying his attentions?" I involuntarily exclaimed.

"The same," was the answer. "Campton subsequently became engaged to her, but a few days before the one fixed for the wedding facts came to light which justified her in breaking off the match."

"It appears that several years before coming to our village he had, in a fit of desperation caused by his wife running away with another man, killed an Indian who had objected to having his squaw taken from him. With this squaw he had afterward lived. More than this, he had not even attempted to get a divorce from his former wife. He was a man of the most abandoned character, and yet possessed a manner that pleased all. I myself believed firmly in his honesty, truthfulness, manliness, and nobility of character, until indubitable evidence compelled me to change my mind. These charges that I speak of were kept quiet for a time, but they at last leaked out. At first he denied, but finally acknowledged their truthfulness."

"She was thunderstruck. She had believed him to be all that was good and true, and you can imagine what a shock his crime and subsequent duplicity would be to one of her disposition."

"She loved him fondly, but detested his crimes. No sophistry could make her see them in any but their true light—that of open immorality, cruel, unprovoked murder, and the worst of duplicity to herself. She told him to leave her, and he finally did her bidding. Her physique, never very strong, became more delicate; her mind was preyed upon by brooding thoughts, conflicting feelings—but she never complained. Within that fragile body was an unbending will. There seemed to be but little change in her for a few months; then her health gave way; all that science could do was done; all that money could procure was at her service. But the wisest leech could not cure so subtle a disease; the wealth of the Rothschilds could not procure healing balm for a broken heart. And she died, with a serene smile on her lips and that old peaceful expression in her face—looking, for all the world, as though Heaven, in all its beauty, was before her. She was buried, and the school children planted these flowers on the grave of that teacher who, in her happy days, had been so kind to them."

"What became of Campton I know not. He has not been here since the day when she ordered him from her presence. I do not know that I can say more."

My friend ceased. I then told him of my acquaintance with Campton's history; of his visit to me; and we discussed his reason for making that visit. For my part, I believed then, and I believe now, that he was in earnest at that time. I think he was more weak than wicked. I think he was one of that large class of men who have a yearning for a better life, but who have not the self-control to curb their passions. Notwithstanding this, however, I have always regretted that I did not tell the young lady the little I knew of his story. It might have turned her thoughts from him and saved much misery to both.

"Now, young gentlemen, members of this association, in the course of your debate on intemperance, some of you instanced the case of a well known sot called 'Whisky Bill' as an example of a bright mind, a fertile genius, wrecked through the demoralizing power of alcoholic drink."

"My young friends, Whisky Bill was stranded in Life's voyage before he ever indulged in the fascinating demon of drink. That, certainly, was one vice which he had not."

"Whisky Bill—the drunkard, the bummer, the sneak thief—is none other than he whom I knew as Hubert Campton. His own evil passions have been his ruin, whisky being but an accessory to the act."

"I think this supports my theory, that many men are ruined by other weaknesses, become drunkards, and the world says: 'See what whisky has done!'"

SAN FRANCISCO, August 2, 1878.

The Cincinnati Saturday Night has found a solution of the Chinese problem as follows: "It is conceded that the Chinamen who come to our shores do not come to stay. Their intention always is to return to China when they have gained a certain amount of money. We think we discover in this a solution of that puzzling Chinese question. Find out the lowest amount of money that will induce John to streak it back to the Celestial Empire, then pay him to leave at once. The money can be raised by subscription, or voted by Congress. Then pass a law to permit no more Chinamen to come here. This plan is somewhat expensive, to be sure, but it is better than revolution, such as is threatened in California, or a bloody war of extermination. How much cheaper it would have been to have bought up the slaves of the South and given them their freedom than to have carried on a four years' war for their emancipation."

We have arrived at the third milestone of the second century in our journey through life as a nation.—Boston Globe. Yes, and a nice-looking tramp we are.—Courier-Journal.

CLEAR LAKE AND ITS ENVIRONS.

Believing that there must be a haven somewhere for lawyers, beyond the reach of business memories, where the nervous client and loquacious witness never come; where there are no calendars and law-days; where telegraph wires won't reach; and where they may find rest from the pest of demurrers, motions, and time extensions; somewhere beyond the jurisdiction of courts—where there are no statutes overriding law, and no codes in conflict with common sense—I left San Francisco tired, weary, heart-sore, and head aching to find rest, peace, and quiet. One party of friends kindly invited me to Bear Valley, where accommodating deer were waiting to be shot; another suggested the Summit, with grouse and mountain quail as provender for powder; and a third so fired my imagination with the fish and game of Cloud river, that I actually enlisted for a ten days' cruise, near the mountain peaks of Shasta; but the bustle of preparation, the anticipation of fatigue, and the dread that wit and repartee might entail mental exertion, decided me to abandon all these allurements, and seek repose beside what a nautical friend designated as the "stagnant pool of Clear Lake." I was tired, and sought rest; overworked, and longed for indolence—pure and unadulterated. I had lived in the tropics, and knew that heat was favorable to the one, and begot the other. So when I heard that the climate of Tophet was a freezing atmosphere compared to Lakeport, I at once took boat and in two hours reached Donahue, where the cars were in waiting, and in due time whirled us to Cloverdale (terminus of stages), from whence radiated the four-in-hands to every conceivable place, with springs of every conceivable character, flavored with every conceivable nausea, and warranted to cure every conceivable ache, pain, complaint, ailment, or disease. The population of this thriving city is of a very fluctuating character, and its number of congressional representatives would materially depend upon what hour of the day its census was taken; as the influx of passengers, rattling of stages, prancing of horses, pitching round of baggage, squabbling for seats, and scrambling to get them, the rushing about of irrepressible females and fussy masculines, ringing of dinner bells, and recurring shout of "all aboard," would, at one o'clock, convey an idea of population that is in startling contrast with the deserted streets and unbroken quiet of an hour later. Seated in a comfortable wagon, open at the sides, we again sped along, at first up, up, up, until we reached an altitude where the view of distant valleys and the lazy, slumbering lake, with its shimmer of light and glassy surface, presented a panorama of mingling colors, lights, and shadows that Tavernier or Keith might have coveted; then down, down, down, with short angles and abrupt turns that presented kaleidoscopic changes of scenery, mingled with a startling recognition of our road as, miles in advance, it frisks from one precipice to another, clinging to the mountain side as if suspended there, and hanging over chasms, where the breaking of a bolt or the loss of a wheel would prove to all an avenue to eternity. At eight o'clock we reached Kelseyville (another terminus of stages, on a smaller scale), the distributing point for Bassett's, Bartlett's, Soda Bay, Highland Springs, Lakeport, etc. Then, after the usual detention for whisky and the mail bags, we took another stage and reached Soda Bay at nine. But tired, sleepy, and hungry, I had little desire that night to investigate surroundings, to which I bore the relation of "a cat in a strange garret;" but, the next morning, I was delighted with its picturesque surroundings. In a forest of mammoth oaks, that reached the water's edge, the house and its cottages, like a planet and its satellites, clustered amid the green of its foliage. Shaded by the towering mountain that adjoins this forest—dark, shadowy, and frowning in its grandeur, as it rises 2,500 feet to the clouds' embrace—and cooled by the breath of the broad-bosomed lake, that sparkled in the glint of the rising sun, I realized the sought-for haven, cried "Eureka!" and anchored my furlough here.

The first immigrants to this region were Missourians, and, with the utilitarian spirit of their fathers (just as they cut down oak trees to plant beans), substituted Clear Lake for Kahula (bridal sheet), and swept away Kanocti—the Indian name of this monolith temple, with its clustering memories, of which God was the architect, and a now nearly extinct race the chroniclers—and substituted "Uncle Sam," with tales of silver, cinnabar, and sulphur as legends of its summit. But call it what you will, like ruined Coriolanus, its dignity is ineffaceable, and its patent of royalty bears the autograph of its Creator.

Grand Kanocti! The signal-ground of a now buried nation, from whose apex the beacon's blaze or curling smoke roused the war-whoop, and summoned to blood and strife the savage hearts of seven tribes. Proud Kanocti! whose sacred summit, with its legendary deities, formed the Mecca of the red man's worship, and in whose shadow the red man's God listened to plaint and prayer.

Traditional romance, too, bears its part, and tells of the captured White Dove, who, true to her plighted love, fled from the wigwam of the fierce Waquonekwhat, and, like Andromeda, was bound to a rock to expiate her sin; but no Perseus came to the rescue of the Spanish maiden, and her moans are yet heard in echo on Kanocti's height, craving drink from the unheeding lake, whose water in revenge has ever since been turbid; and it is said that even now a shell-fish dipped from the lake, and left upon the summit, insures success to sighing swains and despondent lovers.

At Soda Bay, beneath spreading oaks, with cigar and book, I realized "the lazy man paradise." Too warm for exertion, and too cool for discomfort, I dreamed away a week, uninterrupted by the din of crowds, and free from the presence of shoddy fashion, with its vulgar display of wealth, rudeness, and bad grammar. The guests were a few over-worked brokers, collegemen, and lawyers, with their wives and daughters. Thank God! there were no sick people, with querulous tempers and whining complaints—all were healthy, good-natured, full of fun, and redolent with spirits; hammocks swung on every piazza, and loungers rocked in every hammock; seats beneath the trees, and idlers on every seat. The morning hours were devoted to croquet and ten-pins; midday to boat sailing and siestas and repose; afternoon to boating and bathing, and the evening to billiards, promenades, and gossip.

Clear Lake, of which Soda Bay is an arm, was an indispensable factor in the comfort, convenience, and enjoyment of my quarters. With a cool breeze rippling its surface, it forms a pleasant highway to Lakeport, Sulphur Banks, Floyd's Landing, Lower Lake, etc., and the beautiful little steamer that traverses its waters is indefatigable in her rounds, making each landing at least four times a day. There are yachts, sail and row boats innumerable, to be had, and relying upon the assurance of my nautical friend, that Clear Lake was "a stagnant pool," I hired Captain Bundy and his yacht to take myself and party for a day's sail, but, as the sequel shows, mine was a misplaced confidence. We left at seven, and under the influence of a gentle breeze (which, by the way, mild or strong, always blows from the west), we reached Sulphur Banks, where the kind attentions of Messrs. Lightner and Tucker, the superintendents, enabled us to visit and satisfactorily inspect the largest quick-silver mine in America, with its vast machinery and reduction works, and the pleasure of this visit was very much enhanced by the presence of Professor Kising, of the University, whose modest but intelligent explanations were an interesting lesson on cinnabar in particular, and geology in general.

After a picnic lunch, and a three-mile walk to visit Borax Lake, which we finally saw from a high mountain, with probably as little satisfaction as the children of Israel did the Promised Land, the problem of return now became a serious question, for the gentle zephyr had become a respectable tornado, and "the stagnant pool" wore the white-capped aspect of our bay under the spur of a full-grown norther. However, as Bundy was captain and oracle, and he said "go," I overruled the timidity of the ladies, and we cast off; but five minutes buffeting brought to my recollection the courageous bovine that butted a locomotive, and as we keeled over, and scudded on our side, I knew that I was entitled to respect for neither courage nor discretion; however, to make a long story short, we rushed in among the tules, then worked our way to the lee of an island, and finally got ashore, thoroughly wet, and with a settled conviction that yacting is a fraud. We returned to Sulphur Bank, where a warm fire, dinner at the hotel, beds, and breakfast restored us to a sense of self-respect, and abandoning Captain Bundy and his yacht, we took the steamer and reached home in time for lunch. We here visited an encampment of twenty-five or thirty Indian lodges, with a council-house in the middle; the people were dirty and squalid, but with an abundance of food, consisting of wild oats and dried fish, both of which are plentiful—indeed, the lake is so overstocked with black-fish that they are scooped up with the paddles, and the shores are lined with the dried or decayed carcasses of millions.

Clear Lake is thirty-eight miles long and of varying width, with a succession of peninsulas that gives it the appearance of what it probably is, three or four continuous lakes broken into one, which collectively present a larger water area than Tahoe. Its name is a shocking misnomer; the water looks dirty, and tastes abominably; no one drinks it who can possibly get spring or well water, and yet some speculators had the impudence last year to offer its supply to San Francisco, and actually got the Water Commissioners to incur the expense of an inspection.

Opposite Soda Bay is the palatial dwelling and ornamented grounds of Captain Floyd (one of Lic's trustees). At a very large outlay the Captain has erected here one of the most elegant summer residences in America. With delicious water from a mountain stream, his grounds and gardens are made to bloom in beautiful forgetfulness of drought and summer heats. At the Captain's invitation I visited his "Villa on the Lake," and was entertained with that hospitality which is peculiarly indicative of the combined qualities of the gentleman, the sailor, and the sportsman. I here inspected the finest collection of firearms and bladed weapons that it has ever been my good fortune to see. Moorish daggers and Spanish poignards, Turkish scimitar and Russian sabre, Saxon scaxe, Scotch claymore, Japanese harikari, Malay crease, anlace, Lochaber axe, and swords of every shape, weight and size; dueling pistols innumerable, each labeled with its victims, one or more; rifles of every make, and shotguns of every pattern, from the match-lock to the breech-loader; Indian spears, Chinese knives, and non-descripts that were nameless, but looked wicked. To a genial kindness the Captain adds flashes of practical humor that are very amusing. For instance, every city masculine that visits that neighborhood has an idea that he may shoot a deer, and though they never breast mountain or forest for that purpose, yet the rifle is their frequent companion on lake or shore, as if they expected to find water deer. Well, for the accommodation of these gentry, he has erected near his house, on the mountain side, a full-sized prong-horned buck of wood, which looks so life-like that city Nimrods are forever banging at it, and, as the employees of the steamer are in the joke, they rather encourage deer shooting from her deck, which elicits roars of laughter at the would-be hunter's expense—and as each victim is initiated, he keeps the secret, and passes on the joke.

Before closing, I must refer to one of the peculiarities of this section of country. The most persevering, persistent, and never-let-up system of lying seems to have been adopted along the entire routes from Cloverdale to Calistoga, as to distances. Cloverdale is from twenty-seven to thirty miles from Kelseyville, and takes seven hours staging, but the drivers, hotel-keepers, and in fact every body along the line, say that it is only nineteen. Calistoga is forty-five miles from Kelseyville, and takes eight hours, but they declare it is only thirty. Bassett's is twenty-one miles from Soda Bay, but they vow it is fourteen; and Soda Bay six from Kelseyville, but they call it four, and so on. The real object is not lying for the mere love of lying, but a hope that shortening the distance will benefit his, her, or their particular interests; for every one in this region owns a spring of some sort, soda, borax, iron, sulphur, or salts of one kind or another—cold, tepid, or hot—and which they designate as medical, medicated, medicinal, mineral or mercurial, as their fancy or intelligence dictates. Of course they are all highly curative and of great value—some are special cures, and others are panaceas, but everybody expects to make his, her, or their fortune from his, her, or their particular spring; so, he, she, and they are actively lying it into shorter distances as really as they can; and I hope that they will all succeed in their mineral, hygienic, and water-cures, keep their money, and grow rich off gout, gravel, and all other ailments, and diet, lazy habits, and liquor-drinking begot.

DOINGS OF THE LAST LEGISLATURE.

BY ASSEMBLYMAN W. F. ANDERSON.

The last Legislature, or the Legislature which last convened in this State, has been the subject of more than common denunciation, not only at the hands of those opposed to its composition, in a partisan sense, but as well by those of the same political affiliation. It was a Democratic Legislature. It was overwhelmingly Democratic. For its acts and doings that party must be held responsible. The people will unquestionably hold the party so responsible, as they ought; for the sins of officials must and do, inevitably, in a popular government, fall upon the heads of the sect or organization which placed them in power. So let it be with this.

I have patiently sat down under the odium which has been cast upon the bodies which finished their labors on the first of April of this year, and when, superadded to the abuse heaped upon them by the journals Republican and journals Independent, came the fierce philippics of the only Democratic paper, arrainging them for a depth of iniquity never reached by any former Legislature, even those bearing the horrid front of what it would dominate Radical-Republican, I have, in common with my associates from country and city, exclaimed, what is it that we did, or omitted to do, which calls for this condemnation even from the judgment-seat of our friends? I find in your columns of the past week that a gentleman fresh and raw from England's nether world of Australia, signing himself "Anglo-Australian," in presenting for imitation in the formation of our coming Constitution the archetype of England's colonial governments, must even take a shy at California's parliamentarians, and join his voice to the howl of opprobrium which the press had raised with such unwonted harmony. And yet to do this Anglo-Australian justice, I am free to say, that I believe he had equally as well considered, as charitably and circumspectly examined, and as intelligently weighed the acts and doings of the one hundred and twenty citizens, gathered from the body of the people, who sat as their representatives at Sacramento during the last session, as had any of that daily press, whose office it should be to resort to the best sources of information, and to give the public for facts only that which is truth, for opinion and speculation only that which is just and rational.

Having possessed my soul in patience thus long, and having a little leisure which I do not know how else to employ profitably, it occurs to me just to collate brief memoranda of the more prominent legislative acts which emanated from the session referred to. Before commencing this synopsis, however, I venture this bold paradox, as it will doubtless appear to many; that is to say:

The last Legislature was the most economical which has assembled in California for years; perhaps the most so of any that ever convened within the State.

This I venture, although it has been denounced as the most prodigal and the most lavish in its expenditures. There is a very simple and inexorable mode of trial by which this question of economy or extravagance may be tested and determined, and that is by the record, the history of appropriation and taxation by the several Legislatures, embracing this, and those also which were its predecessors. The truth is that it carried economy to excess, as was evidenced by its refusal to continue the pension to Marshall, the discoverer of gold, which had been granted for a number of years by former Legislatures, and also that to General John A. Sutter—donations perhaps well merited. Nor do I believe that it can be justly retorted that in this they "gagged at a gnat and swallowed a camel;" nor is any other like wise saw in order in my judgment. At least I take the liberty of challenging a refutation of my assertion of exactness in economy by asking a specification of acts of extravagance.

I call attention to the following brief table of appropriations for State purposes, made by the last three Legislatures, with the rates of taxation resulting therefrom, in order that a correct estimate may be formed by comparison:

Fiscal Years.	Total Amount Raised.	State Tax on $100.
Twenty-sixth, 1874-75.....	$3,234,000	64.9 cts.
Twenty-seventh, 1875-76.....	3,066,000	60.5 cts.
Twenty-eighth, 1876-77.....	3,736,000	73.5 cts.
Twenty-ninth, 1877-78.....	3,223,000	63. cts.
Thirtieth, 1878-79.....	2,835,000	54. cts.
Thirty-first, 1879-80.....	3,015,000	55. cts.

From the above, it will be seen that in 1874-75 and 1875-76, the last two years of Governor Pacheco's administration, the aggregate appropriations (to say nothing of deficiency bills thrown upon Governor Irwin) were $6,300,000, giving an average annual tax of 62.7 cents on the $100 of taxable property; that for the first two years of Governor Irwin's, viz: 1876-77 and 1877-78, the total appropriations were $6,959,000, necessitating an annual tax of 68.2 cents on each $100 of taxable property; while the appropriations for the two years provided for by the last Legislature only aggregated $5,850,000, requiring a tax of only 54½ cents on the $100 of taxable property of the State.

This is the record. When it is borne in mind that this Legislature was burdened as none other has ever been, with $150,000 to pay for the extraordinary expenditure required for the Constitutional Convention, and that it made other unusual appropriations, such as that of $120,000 for Branch State Prison at Folsom, and $100,000 for a general reconnaissance and survey of the State, with reference to a general system of irrigation—where is there, it may be asked, a foundation for the charge of profligacy of expenditure and waste of the public treasure?

Bad legislation, evil legislation, ignorant legislation, have also been imputed to the same bodies by the voice of the press, irrespective of party predilections. To this I give an answer also from the record, as before intimated, and challenge a fair comparison with the work of its predecessor, and a specification as to which of the series should be wiped from our statute book.

It enacted a law by which a deserted wife may compel her husband to provide for her support and the maintenance of their children, without compelling her to bring an action for divorce. (Amendment to Section 137 of the Civil Code.)

An act to exempt for the benefit of the survivor a life policy, whenever the company may be situated in which it is issued, heretofore it was only exempt in case the policy was issued by a California company. See amendment to the Civil Code of Civil Procedure.)

It passed the best election laws that California has ever had, under which we are probably to be spared in future those frauds which from the beginning of our State have been a matter of reproach, and probably in several epochs the criminal cause of disorder and bloodshed.

It passed laws to suppress those prolific institutions known as "piece clubs," by which the honest were shocked and precluded from being candidates for office, to the great advantage of the unscrupulous and depraved.

It passed laws by which the crafty work of the low politician will hereafter be defeated, and the intent and purpose of the honest voter will be secured against the imposture of bogus and spurious election tickets.

It passed laws for the regulation of the Fire Department, pronounced by the Underwriters, and by all fair citizens who have examined it, to be the best ever enacted in this or any other State; by which, above all things, the Department is, as far as practicable, protected against the dangers and intrigues of politics.

It passed laws for the increase of the police, as demanded by popular sentiment, and embraced in the bill therefor a system of regulations very far in advance of any former legislation, by which the discipline and morals of the force must necessarily be greatly improved, besides removing it as far as possible from the sphere of politics.

It passed laws to regulate the fares on street railroads in San Francisco, and reducing the rate to five cents, to the great benefit of the masses of our citizens, and especially to the poorer classes.

It passed laws to regulate the price and quality of gas in San Francisco, and reducing absolutely the price therefor to the extent of twenty per cent. on their former rates—that is, from $3.75 to $3 per thousand—and empowering the Board of Supervisors, upon the report of the Gas Commissioner, if found to be justified, to cut down the price still further. The act to go into operation in six months.

It passed laws providing for checking frauds in banking by many regulations, and an act to prevent savings banks from purchasing or loaning money on mining stocks and other dangerous securities.

It passed laws to check fraud on the part of those engaged in life and fire insurance, and to secure the ability of companies to respond to all losses and in all events contemplated by the policy to the assured.

It corrected the legislation by which the expenses of the Supreme Court, held in San Francisco, were imposed upon our city, and placed it where it properly belongs, upon the State.

It passed an act so amending the Civil Code, that the legal rate of interest is reduced from ten to seven per cent. per annum, in the absence of special contract.

It passed laws greatly reducing the rate of business licenses of our mercantile and commercial classes, by what is known as the Broderick bill, as may be demonstrated by comparing the act, on page 442 of Session Laws, with Sections 3376 to 3387 of the Political Code.

And here I may remark that the anathemas against the last Legislature of the gentlemen who held meetings to resist the suits commenced by Mr. Sinton, the Tax Collector, were based in entire ignorance of the subject upon which they spoke. It will be seen, upon examination, that the law, to enable the Tax Collectors to bring suit, was put in the original Code in 1872, and that the last Legislature's only offense was that they cut down the license taxes on an average fully fifty per cent.

Such are some of the enactments emanating from the last Legislature occurring most readily to my mind. Upon a close scrutiny of the Session Laws, a number of valuable statutes of equal merit would unquestionably be developed, which after the lapse of months escape my recollection. It may perhaps be well in future to extend the catalogue. In the meantime, I would suggest that whosoever believes that the last Legislature is deserving of censure will with frankness disclose some ground for his belief, and enlighten the world by particularizing the evil deeds, the acts, and enactments by which he is offended.

By some, the law-makers have been bitterly arraigned because of the passage of the Act known as the "incendiary," or "gag" law; while others, equally vindictive toward them, applaud that legislation as wise and salutary. It is sufficient to say of it, that the law is general and discriminates in favor of no person or class of persons. It restrains equally the orator of the sand-lot, the minister in the pulpit, the lawyer in the courts, the lecturer of whatever persuasion or of whatever degree. It regards, as good laws should, every citizen equally and is no respecter of persons. While common charity would certainly make allowances, and treat with more lenity, the ravings of the ignorant than of the cultured, the law must know all alike, and punish those who preach violence, sedition, and insurrection, without regard to wealth or station. This law was made for all; and, since its passage, all men have enjoyed the same liberty of speech which the founders of our government aimed to secure to themselves and to their posterity. Some have, since its passage, exercised a very large liberty in this respect without rendering themselves amenable to its provisions or penalties. The singular thing is, that those who have exercised and enjoyed the greatest amount of liberty and license are the only men who complain of the law, or who think they have not got enough of freedom for their tongues. All of which but shows that the love of talking, like some few other appetites, does not fatigue by indulgence, but that excess only invigorates to greater excesses.

Amongst the omissions and commissions complained of by many, was the action of the Legislature with reference to the subject of the water question rates and supply of this metropolis. If no bill was passed, it was rather the fault or merit of a gentleman who is now far from California. A bill passed in both houses, and an immaterial amendment made by the Senate, in which the Assembly stood ready in an instant to concur, which would have ripened the measure into a most excellent law—a law much better than the extreme radical measure proposed and advocated by him—was taken off and condemned to defeat by the original author, because a majority of obstinate men in the Senate and House would not follow his peculiar philosophy on water. That philosophy was, that there is no property in water, and, therefore, that water works are not protected by sanctions of the Constitution of our State, which declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without due compensation, and that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law. The gentleman to whom I refer, and for whom I certainly entertain a very great respect, being absent in a foreign land, I am restrained from those criticisms upon his philosophy, his conduct, and his motives, in which I should otherwise feel myself at liberty to indulge. A history of the attempted legislation upon this subject, fairly and squarely put, is, however, demanded by considerations of justice to the representatives from San Francisco, and I may find time to afflict you with a full and extended account thereof.

One other matter has doubtless contributed to the course of popular animadversion upon the Legislature, and is certainly as much misunderstood as any with which it was called upon to deal. I refer to the subject of the control by legislation of railroads, embracing a great variety of topics, such as freights and fares, eminent domain, etc. It may, perhaps, be interesting to review this subject of periodical agitation and alarm, and give a brief exegesis of it as of some "hydra or chimera dire."

Our hearts are stirred by daily narratives of the struggling poor. More deeply moved by the stories of those who have seen better days; who struggle with their pride against a disclosure of their wants; women well born, well reared, too virtuous to sin, too proud to beg, and who in their heart-broken despondency and shame know not what to do. There is a time when in the transition period from wealth to poverty that the refined, delicate, and cultured lady suffers pangs more inexpressibly painful than comes from hunger. To such it is a relief when the depth is reached and the possibilities of poverty are fully fathomed. We know of a case, and would not write of it if our purse was as deep as our sympathy. We write in hope that it will move generous and wealthy people to interpret the stories that are written in the sad eyes and hopeless despair of face of those who will not, unquestioned, speak of their poverty. We knew her as a young girl, the wife of a prosperous gentleman, the mother of a promising boy, the petted leader of fashionable society, a welcome guest at the homes of the highest social class, cultured, refined, and elegant. Adversity came, and the husband lost courage, and was lost. The wife and boy struggled on in a small room poorly furnished. Gifts, jewels, dress, went slowly out for rent and food. The lad obtained employment, sinned, fell, and fled. It was not a crime—it was a struggle to help his mother. The angel will record the effort in the Lamb's book of life. She begged, pleaded, and cried, and the wronged employer condoned the offense. Then she struggled on for days and weeks. She was hungry. At midnight she picked up sticks to cook her food. Wearied, she sat upon the door-steps of luxurious homes where she had been a welcome guest, and whose owners (let it be hoped) would have helped her if she had had the courage to make her desolation known. This is not a romance; it is not an exaggeration; it is true. It is not the only case. Christian ladies, you of happy homes, you loved and honored wives, you who visit summer resorts, you who indulge in dress and equipage; gentlemen, you men of affairs; of wealth, of millions, you generous, chivalrous men; Christians, you who think the sentiment an inspired one that declares that of all the virtues the greatest is charity, look around you, organize a relief for the proud poor. Do it secretly, delicately; and if there is a reward for generous deeds, you will receive it; if there is a heaven, you will attain it.

A man forty years of age came into our office this week seeking employment. His story is this: Native-born, married, no children, wife can sew, make dresses, cut, and fit. He has been in the boot and shoe trade, is sober, industrious, intelligent, and willing to work; can not work on a farm; does not know how; is not strong enough to labor in the forest, nor in a quarry, nor in the mines; lost in stocks; is flat broke; no money, no furniture, nothing—nothing left but a wife and an appetite. We suggested a shoe store. His answer was, no money for rent, fixtures, stock, or start. We inquired concerning him, and found his story a true one. Now, if he was a Jew his co-religionists would take care of him. They would make a pool for him; club together, raise him a hundred dollars, and establish for him a credit. He would pull through, pay back the money, escape shame, beggary, and the poor-house. This man honestly wants work, and can not obtain it; his wife wants employment, and can not get it. He is desperate. Christians and Americans are a thoughtless, heartless, selfish class. They are not as good as the Jews in this respect. The Jews exhibit more sense, more business instinct, more humanity, than do Christians. They help their poor to take care of themselves. We wish somebody would organize a secret benevolent society to aid Americans who have seen better days; to lend them a little money to start them in some trade or employment; help them tide over hard times. We say secret, in order that it may not be imposed upon by the worthless. There are plenty of men and women to whom a little aid would give heart. A little advice and encouragement would afford assistance better than money. It is not charity nor alms that such people want. It is advice, encouragement, and a temporary loan. If the right persons will move in this matter, money will be abundant. Wealthy men would be glad to aid such an organization; but they are begged at, cried at, talked at, and bothered by professional adventurers and mendicants, till they weary of listening. They are imposed upon by frauds and tramps until they are callous to the stories of honest poverty, and shut their ears and purses to the deserving poor. This secret aid society for deserving American poor who have seen better days must have no paid officials. It ought to have a directory of wealthy and generous ladies, and its stockholders should be millionaires and moneyed men who are willing to pay assessments. Its active agents and almoners should be men of benevolence, wealth, and business sense, who will give their time in aid of those who have been less fortunate than themselves.

EXTRACTS FROM THE DIARY OF AN EARLY CALIFORNIAN.

BY JAMES C. WARD.

YERBA BUENA, OR SAN FRANCISCO, IN 1847. VIEW OF COVE, WITH GOAT ISLAND BEYOND.
(FROM AN ORIGINAL SKETCH.)

SAN FRANCISCO, April 30, 1847.—We cast anchor before this town, called by the Spaniards Yerba Buena, on the 26th March, at 5 P.M. The Independence, Cyane, and Lexington, vessels of war, were near us, besides several merchantmen. I slept that night at the Portsmouth House, on the Plaza, kept by a man named Brown, where I met the Alcalde, Leidesdorff, late American Vice-Consul, Dr. Robert Semple, a six-footer in buckskin, one of the bear-flag party and editor of the Californian, other residents, and several navy officers—our old friend, Frank Conover, among them. As six months, to a day, had passed since we left New York, I sat up till the small hours listening to the news. From all accounts, Stockton and Fremont have disturbed rather than quieted the people of the country, who were favorably disposed toward us at the time Commodore Sloat raised our flag at Monterey. Everything seeming peaceful, he went home soon after, leaving Stockton in command of the squadron. About the same time, a lieutenant of marines, named Gillespie, arrived here, and proceeded north with dispatches for Fremont—probably letters from Senator Benton, informing him of the intentions of our government. Fremont was on his road to Oregon when Gillespie overtook him. He turned back, and, reinforcing his band with a party of emigrants who had raised the bear-flag, seized horses from the rancheros to mount them, and cattle to feed them, and marched toward Monterey. At Sonoma, some of our best friends—General Vallejo, his brother, his brother-in-law, Mr. Leese, an American, and a Colonel Prudhon—were made prisoners. At this place, where Stockton was received with honors—procession, dinner, etc.—numerous Californians assisting, he informed them that he and his army would wade ankle-deep in blood, if necessary, to conquer the country. The officers of the army, and of the navy outside of Stockton's own ship, believe the late troubles have been caused mainly by those who wanted to make history for themselves. They say there is no question as to Stockton's bravery; but that he was disappointed in not having the glory of taking possession, and "spoiled for a fight" afterward. Our government seems to have acted cautiously in the matter, and the proceeding of Sloat, watched as he was, must have taken Admiral Seymour quite aback. While the Commodore and he were at Mazatlan, they were on the pleasantest of terms, entertaining each other, apparently with little thought for the morrow. One morning, after leaving the Admiral's ship, the Commodore had just touched his own quarter-deck, when the anchors were shipped, and the Congress was on her way to Monterey. Seymour followed only soon enough to see the stars and stripes waving over the Plaza. I hear he sent the Commodore word that he would return his salute, but he must not ask him to salute the flag on shore. He undoubtedly intended to hoist the British flag there. The Independence and Cyane left here the early part of the month. We do not know their destination, but suppose they are to blockade Acapulco or Mazatlan. I have dined on board the Cyane, and have called upon Commodore Shubrick to whom letters of introduction for us were sent by Commodore Bolton. Last Sunday I rode to the Mission of Dolores, three miles from here, in company with Leidesdorff, Captain and Mrs. —, etc., etc.—eight in all. The priest, Padre Santilan, is an Indian. He was assisted in the service by several boys clothed in priestly garments. A numerous congregation of well dressed Californians were kneeling as we entered the church door. The interior was decorated with pearl shells and many gilt and tinsel ornaments, and illuminated with candles. As the women were dressed in rich colored silks and satins, with colored mantillas or rebozos drooping from their heads, and the men in blue jackets and calzoneros with silver buttons, and red and blue serapes on their shoulders—the effect was beautiful. The priest's voice was grating, so was the music. We did not remain through the service, but walked about to examine the Mission buildings. They formed three sides of a hollow square, and were all built of adobe; some of the garden walls are composed of bullocks skulls and horns piled up and stuck together with adobe—all in ruins, with the exception of those near the church. A corral shows where the bull fights are commenced. I hear the animal is not confined to it, but often rushes through the plaza; not being selected for his ferocity, and having the points of his horns sawed off, he is not formidable. As there are but few of us resident here we are very intimate, meeting at each other's houses unceremoniously, often inviting ourselves to breakfast, dine, or sup, as we happen to fall. Besides Americans—principally New Englanders—there are a Dane, two Russians, a Swiss, and a Sandwich Islander in our little circle. Of an evening we congregate accidentally here and there; have music from S—'s guitar, or Don A—'s piano. Both sing. Their comic songs draw tears from our eyes; and they are capital actors, too. Sometimes Dr. Powell, surgeon of the —, drops in, and we have his stories and ventriloquism—which is wonderfully perfect—to amuse us. He was at our house last evening, when W. H. Davis came in with a bottle in his hand—one of a dozen found during the day under the floor of his store, which was being repaired; the box must have been there several years, and came from Los Angeles; the wine had as much body as port, resembling it in taste and color. Very often whist and vingt-et-un and poker are played—the latter limited by general understanding. Lately M—, from the Islands, has broken into this good rule. Whereas, the lovers of the game here played for amusement and with great consideration for each other's means, he seemed inclined to make money, and carried it so far that he received a lesson. One night G— had lost an unusually large amount to him; other players had dropped off, and the game was left between the two. Both, at last, either had good hands or were bluffing most courageously; when M— had up an amount sufficient to cover G—'s losses he called him. Both were very cool and quiet, though it was a more serious matter for G— than for M—. The latter could have lost without inconvenience. "Well," said M—, smiling patronizingly, as he took his cigar from his mouth, "What can beat four kings?" G— paused a moment—looked at him seriously—laid down his cigarrito and answered, "Nothing—but four aces." M—'s smile faded, and his eyes in "wonder grew," as he realized his defeat. "Now," said G—, "the time has come to inform you that we play here for the pleasure of the game—not for profit. I find by my little memorandum that I am, at last, even with you. You know I could have led you very far. If I had won from you, I should have been obliged to play with you again; at present, I am free to say that I never will." M— was never afterward invited to take a hand. He was also of the kind that never takes offense; so things have returned to the "even tenor of their way." Next door to the hotel lives Don Juan Vioget, a native of Switzerland, at one time a lieutenant in the Brazilian navy. He speaks four or five languages, draws skillfully, and has surveyed and made the plans of this Pueblo of Yerba Buena. The ceilings of his parlors have been painted by him in tasteful designs; and a panoramic view of the Bay and City of Rio Janeiro, in pen and ink, exceeds anything of the kind I have ever seen. He is very entertaining and hospitable, and his house a great resort; a hearty welcome and a cup of delicious coffee await his visitors at any hour. There is only one garden in the place—Leidesdorff's—which has been made by scraping the decayed leaves from under the scrub oaks and forming flower-beds of the loam. His Scotch gardener has succeeded wonderfully in this enterprise. You must know that the land hereabouts is covered with sand, excepting in the heart of the town. At the Presidio, and about the Mission, where the winds have full sweep—a northwest gale blowing daily during the summer from 11 A. M. till sundown—the sand hills are thickly covered with scrub-oak woods, which lean away from the winds as though they would avoid them.

MAY 31, 1847.—This letter will be brought to you by General Kearney's party. Every one regrets his leaving. He has the esteem of all who inhabit this country, Californians as well as foreigners. Fremont is with him under arrest. Colonel Mason is, of course, left in command. News of the taking of Vera Cruz by General Scott, and of General Taylor's great victory over Santa Ana, sent by the British Minister at Mexico, has come to us from Mazatlan. We celebrated here with the greatest enthusiasm by illuminating the town, firing salutes, burning tar-barrels, etc. If military successes, such as any army might be proud of, fill your soul with joy, think of the effect they produced upon us, children of the republic, in an unfriendly territory, and so far separated from it. But for all this glory, how much we shall rejoice in peace—a peace that adds California to the Union. If it is restored to Mexico, you may depend upon it that we shall fight for it upon our own hook, for wherever an emigrant has obtained a piece of land he will defend it till death. There are many in the country, and as the current is this way there is not power enough in California to turn it back. Farms of the Spaniards, lands that have never been cultivated before, are worked on joint account, and will eventually be in their possession. The Californians work but little, and receiving large incomes from their growing farms, are enabled to lead easy lives. Bob gave a fandango at the Mission of Dolores last week. There were some thirty señoritas present besides the Mormonitas; three of them were quite pretty, and one of whom was married to a man named Andrews, of Salem, Massachusetts. Two of her brothers were shot by Fremont's party after being made prisoners, it is said. Notwithstanding their gracious manners I could not help thinking they hated us for our American blood; and who could blame them? The dancing commenced at nine o'clock, and we left them still at it at five in the morning. Some of them waltz well, always the slow Spanish waltz, but they pride themselves particularly upon their execution of the son, javané, and gola, the steps of which are not easily acquired by foreigners. The music was from guitars, accompanying songs often improvised and complimentary to the belles of the evening. Although drinking and card-playing were among the diversions of the occasion, every one behaved well. Indeed, good manners are common to all, and a large portion of those who appear so well, and converse and sing so wittily, can neither read nor write. We ride on horseback almost every day, each resident having a cavallada of from two to a dozen horses, cared for by a vaquero. On the few days when the fog will allow us to catch sight of them the views from the road to the Presidio are very fine and varied. At one moment you are picking your way through the thickest scrub-oak shrubbery, and the next galloping over a beautiful plain; your path through the woods in the early morning before the northwester has set in, and while the sun is unveiled by fog, is overrun with rabbits and quail, and if you choose you may give chase to the coyote, who jogs along unconcernedly not very far ahead of you. Wild flowers are scattered far and wide over the plain, brilliant in color, and beautiful enough for the choicest garden; and madules (strawberries), just ripe, are waiting to be picked here and there, and all along the road. Of a clear day the beauty of the Bay of San Francisco, and of the hills and mountains which encompass it, are beyond my powers of description. Our rides extend to an old fort near the entrance to the Bay, but on our return we always call upon the officers at the Presidio to tell the news or to listen to one of Captain Lippitt's stories.

SONOMA, June 29, 1847.—Last evening I was introduced to Commodore Stockton, at General Vallejo's. He has just purchased a large and valuable estate near Santa Clara, and is on his way home over the mountains. Commodore Bidle, his commanding officer, says he has not granted him leave of absence, nor has he deigned to ask it. Major X— of his suite I have met often. He will call on you and give you news of us and of the country. You must remember, however, that his story is different from General Kearney's, and that the latter has the support and confidence of the largest and best portion of our community, including military and naval officers. We have heard of the capitulation of San Juan d'Ulloa, and of our army being within one day's march of the City of Mexico. Where will you find laurels sufficient to cover the victors? We have had glory enough; send us peace. Business is dull. Land speculations occupy every one's attention at present. Think of fifty vara lots (one hundred and thirty and a half feet square) in San Francisco being sold for seven hundred and fifty dollars! It seems like 1837 on a small scale. I expect to ride from forty to fifty miles to-day to reach either San Rafael or Saucelito.

Sitting Bull has made overtures to this Government for permission to return and make his home with us once more, but it has been pointed out to him that race prejudices are pretty strong among the Palefaces, and for the present it would be better for him to remain across the border. To this he is understood to have replied that he and his constituents are no worse than Kearney and his merry-men—whom, with doubtful taste and imperfect respect, he describes as "Irishmen not taxed." The Red Man, although the sun is his father and the mountain his brother, should not bandy words with the Great Grandmother at Washington.

Estrangement.

Only a "something light as air,"
Which never words could tell,
Yet feel you that between your lives
A cloud has strangely fell;
Though never a change in look or tone,
A change your heart is grieving;
You sentient feel the friend you love
Has deemed you are deceiving.
A promise rashly given has bound
Your lips the truth to screen, <sup>whereof</sup>
The nameless something gathers fast
As mist the hills between;
You wrap you in your cloak of pride,
The words are never spoken
That might have thrown the portal wide,
And friendship's tie is broken.

SAN JOSE, August 2, 1878.

MADGE MORRIS.

A Chinaman up in Solano County declares that if he hears any more of this "Chinese must go" nonsense he will discharge every white man in his employ. Up to the present time he hasn't heard any more, and the man who keeps the corner grocery has hung a placard in his window reading: "The Sign Language Spoken Here."

It is deferentially suggested that mining presidents and superintendents have too long been permitted to conceal the actual condition of the mines with the veil of publicity. What is needed is a law making it felony to mystify the public by free access to the mines and permission to sample ores.

A Santa Clara County coroner's jury has found that the deceased was one hundred years old, and that the causes of death were unknown. Perhaps it was neglected by

ECHOES FROM THE ESOTERIC CLUB.—VIII.

Interlocutors.—URSUS, POLYGLOT, VIVID, AGRESTIS, ATOM.

URSUS.—I agree with Polyglot, that discussion on the subject of the immortality of the soul—or, as I should prefer to state it, the possibility of a continuation of individual existence after physical dissolution—is altogether vain and unprofitable. To begin with, the question can never be determined. I don't see that the problem is a whit clearer, or that our knowledge in regard to it is greater, than it was when Cicero and his friends talked it over at his villa, or when Job dubiously asked: "If a man die, shall he live again?"

Polyglot.—Nay, not dubiously. It is clear that he believed death to be the end. He longed for it as a dreamless sleep, a rest untroubled by consciousness. "For now should I have lain still and been quiet, I should have slept: then had I been at rest." "As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more." "For now shall I sleep in the dust; and thou shalt seek me in the morning; but I shall not be." "Before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death; a land of darkness as darkness itself, and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness."

Vivid.—Those are weird and powerful strains. The author of them was assuredly one of the grandest of poets.

Polyglot.—It can not be gainsaid. But it is equally clear that he had no belief in the prolongation of individual existence beyond the grave.

Vivid.—To that I oppose an unhesitating negatur. The piece is a dramatic poem. Job, Zophar, Bildad, and Eliphaz are as truly dramatis personae as "Hamlet" and "Polonius," "Othello" and "Iago." It would be the height of absurdity to hold a dramatic author responsible for the sentiments he puts into the mouths of his characters. It is in the nature of things impossible that he should agree with all of them when they differ diametrically, as the interlocutors in the drama of Job do. Eliphaz attacks Job very much as our modern Doctors of Divinity have attacked Ingersoll. As King James' translators express it in their head lines, he "reproveth Job for want of religion." Bildad follows in a similar strain: "How long wilt thou speak such things? and how long shall the words of thy mouth be like a strong wind?" As for Zophar, he waxes positively abusive: "Should not the multitude of words be answered, and should a man full of talk be justified? Should thy lies make men hold their peace, and when thou mockest shall no man make thee ashamed?" And Job's language, when the controversy waxes warm, is not a whit more parliamentary: "Ye are forgers of lies; ye are all physicians of no value."

Polyglot.—And the tone of the theological discussion does not appear to have perceptibly improved since Job's time. But to come back to the point: I said the author of Job had no belief in immortality, and cited the language of the chief character in the drama in proof of it. Vivid replies that the other interlocutors contradict the one whom I quoted. I rejoin that they do not contradict him on that point. There is nothing in the whole poem—no word uttered by any of the speakers—to indicate a belief in a future life.

Vivid.—Again I say, Negatur. What can you make of the famous and most wonderful passage in which Eliphaz speaks of his "vision of the night," but a clear intimation of spiritual existence?

URSUS.—I fail to see the relevancy of all this. If the book of Job is a dramatic poem, what value in this discussion is to be attached to the opinions put into the mouths of the characters? They have no weight except what they may possess intrinsically as arguments; and they are not arguments at all, any more than Cicero's rhapsody about the "glorious day when he shall depart to join the divine congregation of spirits." I don't remember the words of the original, and possibly my rendering is inexact.

Polyglot.—It is, as you say, a mere rhapsody: O preclarum diem, cum ad id divinum concilium ceterumque animarum proficiscar! What an overated fellow that same Cicero has been all these generations! A mere wind-bag, a dealer in words and phrases and high-sounding declamation. Demosthenes was eloquent. There is sense, and pith, and manly force in his orations. But the "eloquence" of the Roman was mere rhetoric, and his "philosophy" a feeble, dilettant echo.

URSUS.—I always secretly regarded him as a verbose spouter, from the time my soul was first vexed by the attempt to construe: Quousque Catalina abutere nostra patientia? etc. But as I was not then the member of an esoteric club, I sagaciously kept that and other heresies to myself.

AGRESTIS.—Somehow, we do not seem to take hold of the question of the evening. All that has been said so far is purely discursive.

Polyglot.—Because there are no data for argument, and perhaps, also, because there is a general feeling that it is not "a live topic." For my part, I acknowledge that I take no interest in it. Wordsworth's "Recluse" very well describes my mental attitude on the subject:

For I, without reluctance, could decline
All act of inquiry whence we rise,
And what, when breath hath ceased, we may become:
Here we are, in a bright and breathing world!
Our origin, what matters it?

And I will further acknowledge that the idea of an unconscious rest at the termination of this life is more attractive to my mind, at least in most of its moods, than that other idea of continued consciousness under new conditions:

"If I must take my choice between the pair
That rule alternately the weary hours,
Night is than day more acceptable; sleep
Both in my estimate of things appear
A better state than working; death than sleep,
Feelingly sweet is stillness after storm,
Though under covert of the wormy ground."

And I can moreover affirm, as a fact of my individual experience, that even in my earliest youth, a season when the ideas of death and annihilation are most dreadful and abhorrent—

"Those dark, impervious shades that hang
Upon the region whither we are bound
Never weighed so I caviily upon my mood
As to exclude the power to enjoy
The vital beams of present sunshine."

ATOM.—After the period of middle age, I think the majority of men do not shrink from the idea of ceasing to exist as a repulsive one. It then generally becomes, at worst,

"A thought which may be feared, though comfortable."

The old Pagans, a sound, healthy-minded set, did not bother themselves much about death and the hereafter. They enjoyed life, I fancy, much more keenly than we do:

"Were humbly thankful for the good
Which the warm sun solicited, and earth
Bestowed; were gladsome, and their moral sense
They fortified with reverence for the gods."

I know that Wordsworth says, "They had hopes that overstepped the grave," but if they had, such hopes had no very large part in their lives or feelings.

Polyglot.—Henry Ward Beecher says that Bryant's "Thanatopsis" is a Pagan poem. His language is: "A sweeter Pagan song was never sung." And then, by way of showing the superiority of Christian poetry, he reads Dr. Watts' hymn, "Unveil thy bosom, faithful tomb!" Well, "Thanatopsis" is Pagan; nearly all the true poetry, the tender poetry, that has ever been written—to say nothing of the great poetry—is Pagan in the same sense. Burns, Beranger, and most of the sweet singers of modern times, are as thoroughly Pagan in their songs as Sappho or Anacreon. And it must be so in the nature of things. For to be wholesome-minded and human, without morbidness, is to be Pagan. Some one has said—and there is a volume of meaning in the apothegm: "Paganism is simply humanity unspoiled by Christianity." What a fine, pure Pagan feeling runs through Tennyson's "Miller's Daughter!" The old miller himself is a magnificent Pagan—though he doubtless never suspected it:

"I see the wealthy miller yet,
His double chin, his portly size,
And who that knew him could forget
The busy wrinkle round his eyes?
The slow, wise smile that round about
His dusty forehead dryly curled,
Seemed half within and half without
And full of dealings with the world."

Vivid.—I can see nothing distinctively Pagan in that. It is simply a graphic picture of a not-uncommon type of man.

Polyglot.—Wait a minute:

"In yonder chair I see him sit,
Three fingers round the old silver cup—
I see his gray eyes twinkle yet
At his own jest—gray eyes lit up
With summer lightnings of a soul
So full of summer warmth, so glad,
So healthy, sound, and clear, and whole,
His memory scarce can make me sad."

That is intensely human, without a suggestion of morbidness, without a hint of any need, of any quality, or of any feeling that is not natural and earthly. Therefore, it is Pagan in Beecher's sense. Can you conceive of that miller as singing Dr. Watts' hymns? Can you conceive of him as "telling his religious experiences?" or as having any spiritual megrims? or as being distressed about "the state of his soul?" On the other hand, can you conceive of him as a hypocrite, or a sneak, or as doing a mean or unmanly thing? Of course you can't. His "soul" is

"So full of summer warmth, so glad,
So healthy, sound, and clear, and whole,"

that even thoughts of death and the grave associated with his memory bring no sadness. That, I say, is distinctively Pagan.

Vivid.—You appear to me to have a peculiar idea of what constitutes Paganism. I fear it is only when viewed from a great distance and through a poetical haze that it will appear the charming thing you paint it. Your process is a most amazing one. You take all the fairest natural attributes of man as man, group them together, and glorify them as Pagan attributes. Then you segregate all the weaker and meaner characteristics of man—characteristics, mind you, which have belonged to all races of men in all ages, under all conditions of creed and culture—and by plain implication you call them Christian attributes. Paganism, I take it, is a deification of nature; and all crimes, and vices, and abominations are common to man in a state of nature unrestrained by religion. Talk about Pagan purity! You are a scholar and are familiar with Juvenal. Tell me if Paul's fearful picture of Pagan morality in the first chapter of his epistle to the Romans is any stronger or more repulsive than that drawn in the Satires. You have read the history of the ancient nations. Tell me, if in any of them, under the "sound, and wholesome" Pagan beliefs, the masses were as virtuous as those of the most priest-ridden community in Christendom?

Polyglot.—This is not reasoning; it is declamation. You propound interrogatories, and afford no opportunity for reply.

ATOM.—It is one of Vivid's "brilliant flashes of silence." This sounds like old times. You have waked him up at last. Don't you see, man, that he doesn't hear a word you say? You might as well try to dam Niagara as to stop him now.

Vivid.—What conception had the noblest and most elevated Pagans, equal in its effect for good on the human race, to the Christian conception of one God, the Father of the whole family of men, and of one law of universal love, transcending all bonds of country, tribe, or family?

Polyglot.—If you will allow me to squeeze in a word or two edgewise, I will tell you.

Vivid.—Can you tell me the origin of the idea of the moral brotherhood of man? Dare you deny that it is exclusively due to religious development? Is not modern humanitarianism, in all its manifold forms, with its vast outgrowth of benevolent institutions, its associations for ameliorating the condition of the human family, and even of the brute creation—is not all this the product of Christian civilization?

Polyglot.—It is the product of civilization; of the increase and diffusion of knowledge. It is humanitarian, not ecclesiastical. Crusades, inquisitions, autos da fe, religious wars, persecution, pilgrimages to holy shrines, winking and weeping virgins—you may legitimately claim these as the development of Christian ecclesiasticism.

Vivid.—There is no word for "home" in any but the Christian languages.

Polyglot.—What do you mean by "the Christian languages," I wonder? How would you translate domum adire, and res angusta domi?

ATOM.—The last is not a good instance, most learned Polyglot. In the language of Touchstone, I demand "a more sounder instance." Res angusta domi is simply "poverty," as I have been taught; "straitened circumstances," whether at home or abroad.

Vivid.—Home! oh, precious name; redolent of all sweet and holy, all sacred and saving associations! The institution, as well as the name, was unknown to the Pagan world. It is unknown to-day outside of Christendom.

ATOM.—He pauses for breath. Now's your chance, Polyglot.

Vivid.—And Paganism is so "sound and healthy!" And religious emotion is "morbid," forsooth! Alas! is it indeed so? Is the dissatisfaction that the best of us feel with what we are, the aspiration toward something higher and better than we attain; are contrition for the past, good resolves for the future, the consciousness of sin, the yearning for pardon, the recognition in Jesus of a higher ideal than has ever before or since found realization on earth, the love of man, the fear of God—are these the offspring of disease and hypochondria? Is the untroubled, purely objective life of the "happy brutes," the highest life for man? Is self-condemnation, weakness, repentance a sickly quail, and conscience a "megrim?"

"Conscience, revered and obeyed,
As God's most intimate presence in the soul,
And his most perfect image in the world."

AGRESTIS.—All this is beside the question, which thus far has been scarcely approached. Our subject to-night was the immortality of the soul, not the relative merits of Christianity and Paganism. On the former question both Christians and Pagans have been divided, for there have been sects that hold the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked. All the talk to-night has been mere skirmishing at the outposts, and I am of opinion that the law under which this discussion was appointed has not been complied with. In order to secure a less desultory treatment of the subject, I will request Vivid, at the next meeting, to open the argument in favor of a future existence, and Polyglot to follow on the other side, after which the discussion will become general. This will tend to narrow the range of conversation.

Vivid.—I think Polyglot will agree with me that he should open the debate. The side assigned him is, in reality, the affirmative.

Polyglot.—I do agree with Vivid in that view of the matter, though for a reason probably different from that he would offer. That physical dissolution terminates individual existence is the natural, spontaneous belief of all who witness the phenomenon of death. No one ever yet looked upon the lineaments of a deceased friend without a fear, if not a conviction, that all conscious existence had ended forever. All the analogies point that way. It is the fair and obvious presumption. Therefore it is a natural affirmative. The contrary proposition is a violent one, and the difficulties in the way of maintaining it are such as to entitle its advocates to the advantages supposed to belong to the negative side in an argument.

Vivid.—It is true, I should claim the negative in the discussion upon a different ground from that stated. But, as we agree in the practical conclusion, I am content.

JAMES F. BOWMAN.

The City after Midnight.

'Twas past the noon of night, and the clanging monitors in yonder towers tolled off in brazen notes as tick by tick the minutes reached to hours. The ebon wings of darkness were folded. One by one lights disappeared, and save a glimmer here and there all were gone. The few remaining convey to thoughtful minds the curse we know, When death by sin crept in. Yon attic window speaks a tale of woe Where sorrow reigns and fading hope at last expires. Why hope? Why pray? Why all these fond desires? A spirit takes its flight and leaves the senseless clay; It soars away unseen from this dark sphere to brightest day. Yonder where revelry, and song, and senseless mirth, And ribald jests, and darker deeds have birth, The flaming jets and dazzling rays of crystal chandeliers Proclaim the tree of knowledge; and 'neath its branches there appears With ripened fruit Eve's daughters tempting men. While he, the first of human kind, a willing victim falls again. The loathsome dens from whence a few faint struggling rays Creep forth, like coward thieves, their import well convey. Like the life-long prisoner's gloomy, reeking cell, It proves that even here on earth mankind may make a hell. What more? What worse? And yet the pious bid us warning take, And shun the horrors of their self-made burning lake. The city sleeps, and the drowsy watchers hourly tell The wakeful listening few that "All is well!" Those restless spirits doomed to suffer thus by an all-chastening rod Neglect to help themselves and vainly call on God. He hears their impious prayer, but haply answers not, While the poor suffering wretch believes himself forgot. He sees in darkness, and the unuttered soul-felt prayer He answers—not literal, but by the sweet assurance He is there. Who keeps these slumbering thousands? Where now are they? True, their earthly bodies rest, but their spirits soar away. In sleep we forget all, and while we slumber on our bed, What more like death? We to all worldly things are dead. A city of the living dead, who in a few brief hours may Awake to life again, and waking greet the day. But a few more nights of darkness, a few more hours of pain, And we shall sleep—perchance never to wake again.

LITTLE JOHNNY ON BEECHER.

How the Writer's Sister came near Dying of Ennui, and the Rude Method of her Cure.—A Question as to the disposition of the Door Money at Mr. Beecher's expected Lectures.—The Writer's Discouragements in the Pursuit of Instruction and Elevating Reading Matter.—A Literary Dog of Low Taste.—Grand Lecture by the Writer's Uncle Edward on what Not to Read in the Newspapers.—Billy takes the Liberty to Wink with Disastrous Effect, etc.

The other day we had et our lunch, crab sallid, but lobster is mity nice too, I can tell you, and my mother she lay onto the sofy a sleep, cos it was a warm day, and Uncle Ned he was readin a newspaper, and my father he was doin jest nothin at all, and Missy she was at that biznice too.

And bime by Missy she spoke up and yawned, and father he said:

"My gurl, dont you konaw its implite for to yon?"

And Missy said: "Yes, poppy, but you must forgif me, for Ime jest sicken tired of evry thing in this world. Sech a stoopid world I never see, and I kno I shall die of ongwee this minnit!"

Jest then Uncle Ned, wich had the paper, he began to reed very lo an soft, like to hisself:

"The follern new facks a bout the Beecher's candle case is vovch for by Mrs. Tilting, and we—" but Uncle Ned didnt git no further, cos Missy she jump up and said:

"Wots that!" and snatch the paper for to reed the rest her own selluf, and mother she rose her hed from the sofy piller and rubbed her eys wild, and Bildad, thats the new dog, wich was lyin on the rug, set up and thumped his tail, and Mose, wich is the cat, wocked out from under the pian O.

Then Uncle Ned he laughft and said:

"Missy, if you shud die of ongwee fore you find that in the paper I hope you wil forgif me with yure last breth for sayin it was there, and disturbin yure peeceef end."

Then my father he spoke up and said: "O, thats ol rite, Edard, and the rockn chairs in this house wude thank you for doin it more frequent, but for hevins sake dont disturb the end wich talks."

Yesterday Misses Pitchel, thats the preachers wife, was to our house, and sed:

"Wot a blessn that the Lord is a goin to bring Mr. Beecher to Californy."

And Uncle Ned he said: "No mom, its Tom Maguire thats doin it."

But Missis Pitchel she said: "Mister Maguire is only the humble instment of the divine wil; its the Lord wich does it for the techin of the peeple."

Then Uncle Ned he said a other time:

"Wel, we got to pay a doller a hed for to be tot, but taint worth while to dispute a bout who gits the money."

Jest gimme a cirkis with a ephalant, and a calown, and a lady wich can take sight a long her back, and I dont want any teechin at all, and neither does Billy.

Billy he said: "Johnny, I kanow some thing wich you dont."

And I said: "Billy, wot is it, cos I kanow how many kitins Missis Dopypy's ole cats got, and I kanow were ole Gaffer Peterses hens nest is, wich is more than he does, and I kanow that the ephalant is the king of beests, and I kanow that George Whashington was the father of his country and the boy that stude on the burnin deck."

Then Billy he said: "I kanow wot it was wich Beecher done."

Then I sed: "Wot?"

But Billy he wank, and sed it wasent fit for to be tole to any body, I must read it in the papers, and I woud find out all a bout it in the Cronicle ten collums and some conclund remarks and a editorial.

But wen I ask my mother to give me the Cronicle reel quick, rite a way, cos I must reed a bout Beecher, she sed: "I think youre father has took it a way for to shafe hisself, mebbly you better ask him."

So I got a ole Ally and carried it to my father, wich was a smokin in the garden, and ask him wude he shafe hisself with thatn, and gimme the other so I cude read a bout Mister Beecher.

My father he looked at me a while, and then he tuke the pipe out his mouth, and he said, my father did:

"Johnny, the subjeck naterly divides its self into 2 heads; ferst, wil I shave myself with the Ally, and, seckend, wil I let you hav the Cronicle for a stated purpess?"

"Regardin the former I wil only say, that if you kanew yure father like a wise chile ot you mite spared his feelins the painfulness of bein ast wether he wude shafe hisself with sech a paper as has ben mensioned, as long as it was opn to him to whipe his razer into his hair. ar on Moses tail, wich is the cat.

"To the latter question I repli yes, with al my hart, certinly, to be shure, wy not, cos it is readin wich makes fokes good and smart.

"But, Johnny, Ime sorry to say yure mother has took awa the Cronicle for to rap up Franky, thats the baby in it."

Wen I seen thay was both in a fog I went to Uncle Ned and ast him did he hav it, cos I wanted to read a bout Mister Beecher, so I wude be good and smart.

Uncle Ned thot a while, and then he got up and dident say nothin but went and looked in the cole skuttle and shaked his hed.

Then he looked be hine a picter on the wall and shaked his head a other time.

Then he went to the fire place and loked up the chimmy and shaked his head like be fore.

Bime by he said: "Wot a storny thing, wot ever has went with that paper?"

Then Uncle Ned he went out of the rume, but pretty sune he come back a shakin his hed a other time, same way, like he was sorry, and he said:

"Johnny, its jest as I speckted, Mary, thats the house maid, she has gone an giv the paper to Bildad, thats the new dog, for him to read the pound-keepers vertisements, and that animel has devoured it all with an absorbin intrest, yes, Johnny, the wrasle has went and et it!"

Wen Uncle Ned see me bust out cryin he said: "Come, now, Johnny, me an Billy an you better go for a wock to see wether them nut megs has come up wich I giv Gaffer Peters for to plant."

Wile we was a wockin, me an him an Billy, he stopt, Uncle Ned did, and said ol to once:

"Now, luke here, you little fellers, and hark to a man wich has ben in Injy and evry were.

"Wen ever you take up a daly paper for to read and git wisdomd like you ot, of corse you dont want to read it evry little bit up, clear thru, but only wot is good.

"Wel, wen you see a article wich is long like yure leg, and has got big black aphabet letters to the top, and the lines is far apart, and the words him and her is in it all thru, wy, dont you read it, cos its ded shure to be stoopid."

Then I spoke and said wot for did my mother read them stoopid things more than any other kind. And Uncle Ned he said:

"Johnny, my lad, Ime glad you hev ast that conun drum, cos it givs me oppertunity for to explain a delekit matter.

"It is ol rite for yure mother to read them things, for some thing ails her, but dont you tel any body, I aint wispered it to a soul but you boys.

"My lads, its a sad and sollem trooth that yure mother is afflikted with the spirrit of inquiry!"

Then I busted out agin, but he said: "Dri yure eys, Johnny, mebbly she wil liv thru it, tho its mostly fadle, I confess.

"But them rticles like we was speakn of in the papers: you see taint no use for you to read em cos thay aint made for to be under stood, lots of things in em wich no body dont kano wot means only jest the fellers wich rwote em.

"Billy, you notty boy, dont you kanow it is wicked for to wink?"

Then Billy he said: "Pleas Uncle Ned its a nat flue in my eye."

And jest then Bildad, thats the new dog, wich et the paper, and Mose, wich is the cat, thay come up, like to hear wot more Uncle Ned had got for to say, but a other nat got in Billy's eye and he wank so fast and fewrquis that the meetin was broke up in disorder!

A Flower for a Friend.

I can not give you roses,
Cream white or crimson hued,
With virgin love pale blushing,
Or passion's glow imbued.
The blind god, Cupid, keeps them still
For those that bend them to his will.

I can not give you lilies,
Too pure and cold are they;
Their stainless, fragrant whiteness
In dear dead hands we lay;
Emblems of faith and heaven, they bloom
By the dark doorway of the tomb.

No orange bloom I'll gather;
Another hand than mine
Shall crown you with its blossoms
And think you all divine.
Let that one flower be still untrod
Until we say, "God bless the bride!"

Forget-me-not is tender,
But touched with doubting pain;
Leave that for parting lovers
Who pray to meet again.
See! on the blue-eyed flower this dew,
Poor, wounded Love, it weeps for you.

I would not give you violets;
Each fragrant, purple leaf,
A sad and chastened spirit,
Breathes out its soul in grief.
Lay them upon the widow's heart,
For memories sweet, to ease its smart.

I do not bring you daisies;
Half hidden in the grass,
They romp with shine and shadow,
While warm winds kiss and pass.
Where in their leaves they play "bo-peep,"
Leave them for children's hands to reap.

I bring you only pansies,
Dark, dewy, as your eyes,
Hiding in all their beauties
Some ever fresh surprise;
But constant through the changing year,
In sun and rain—like you, my dear.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, August 4, 1878.

Cantaloup.
Green Corn Soup.
Boiled Fresh Cod. Mashed Potatoes.
Beefsteak a la Bordelaise. Spring Beans. Cauliflower.
Roast Lamb, Mint Sauce.
Tomato and Cucumber Salad.
Cream Meringue.

Fruit-bowl of Apples, Peaches, Pears, Plums, Gages, Apricots, and Grapes.
TO MAKE CREAM MERINGUE.—Put into a pint of sweet milk the thin rind of a lemon and five bitter almonds. Boil three minutes, and place where it will not be reduced, but will keep hot, until sufficiently flavored. Sweeten it with three ounces of lump sugar. When dissolved, strain and mix the milk with half a pint of cream; then stir the whole gradually to the well-beaten yolks of six fresh eggs, and thicken like boiled custard. Put when cold into a deep dish. Beat to a solid froth the whites of six eggs, mix them with five tablespoonfuls of pulverized sugar, and spread evenly over the custard. Set at once into a moderate oven, bake half an hour, and serve immediately.

A CALIFORNIAN GIRL AT THE PARIS FETE.

The day before the fête one was constantly running into people, whose eyes were fixed anxiously upon the clouds. I wonder if the Bonapartists wished for a storm. Their papers had sneered about the fête for weeks before, and they would have had a fine opportunity to display their wit and sarcasm had the day turned out badly. The malicious Figaro did try so very hard to find something to object to. The Bonapartists haven't had a very pleasant time of it so far. They predicted that there would be no fête, and said there was no day to commemorate which was not black with murder and bloodshed; but France arose superior to the difficulty, and chose a fair, clean, new day, that was an anniversary of nothing. They declared that the republic was too young and too poor to celebrate it properly, and last night, with its brilliant illuminations, its wild gayety and noisy patriotism, was a good answer to the controversy. The Tuileries gardens became fairyland. Arch after arch of gas-jets glittered away into dim prospective. At one place a red light would brighten the sky, giving a strange, unearthly glow to the trees, and people from all parts of the garden would run toward it, like needles to a magnet. Then it would die out, and a green light blaze forth somewhere else; away rushed the crowd, as if drawn by invisible strings. The Seine was beautiful. Its dark, calm surface was dotted with red and blue lights, which cast long, trembling reflections into the water. Long, narrow streets led away into the distance like torchlight processions. The towers of Notre Dame rose tall and grand against the sky, which looked cool and gray in contrast with the brilliant scene below. How different was this fête from any I have ever seen at home—no fights, no rows, nor angry words, nothing but laughter and light-hearted merriment. The man who, in any other country, would become riotous and drunken, and find himself in charge of the government next morning, here took his wife and babies along with him, and was gayly, enthusiastically happy in a manner delightful to look upon. One poor tired fellow, staggering along under the weight of two happy wide-awake children, very naturally grumbled a little; his wife, a bright, chipper little body, was heard to exclaim cheerily: "Ah, we are amusing ourselves! We're not going home till one o'clock." Paterfamilias shook his head despondently, and staggered on. Another father led his little girl by the hand; she had lost her shoe, and was limping and crying pitifully; but the noise of the crowd and her father, loudly singing the Marseillaise, drowned her baby voice. Everybody seemed to be amusing themselves, from the great folks riding carriages to the little gamins, happy over a fire-cracker. A friend of mine passed one of the chambermaids of his hotel on the stairs, beaming with smiles and fluttering with anticipations and ribbons. "Ah," said she to him, in her pretty French, "there is no one like me for love of country; I shall see all the illuminations!" I asked our garçon, Jules, next day, how he enjoyed the fête? He sighed, saying, "I had but one hour of it, mademoiselle." Gayety reigned supreme in the Latin Quarter. I hardly believe there was a window, however near the clouds, that had not its lantern and flag, and very likely the owner went without his dinner to purchase them. One little garret window near here, that could not possibly be seen from any street, and looked out upon the roofs and back courts of other houses, sparkled brilliantly with lights and flags and evergreen—a shining star of patriotism. I saw a deformed girl, Saturday evening, limping cheerfully home, her pale face beaming with smiles, her weak arms filled with flags and lanterns. Perhaps that little window belongs to her, and her artistic fingers arranged the flags and hung the evergreen. Her father, brother, some one dear to her, may have lost his life for the republic, and she, in her garret window, lights a lantern to his memory. The happy-go-lucky students hung up their palettes, threw aside their scalpels, forgot their compasses and modeling tools, and entered heart and soul into the sport. They wore neckties of, and tricked out their hats with the national colors. They formed little processions, and carried lanterns hanging aloft on the ends of their canes. They sheltered their gayly dressed lady loves with umbrellas, from every point of which hung a lantern. They laughed and joked amongst each other, and sang the Marseillaise with fresh young hearty voices. Crowds of people sat around the little tables in front of the cafés, and clicked their glasses and clapped their hands, joining in the song. Omnibuses rattled by, fluttering with flags and fireworks spurring from the knife-boards; passengers caught up the air, singing as they passed. One place, where the crowd was dense, a rollicking fellow, overcome by patriotism and the generous wines of France, sang the Marseillaise loudly, and enthusiastically kept time upon his neighbor's back. I saw many a good-looking fellow with an American flag in his button-hole, and the dear old stars and stripes waved forth from many a window—a delicate compliment from a sister.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } Editors.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 3, 1878.

On the fifth page we print the first of a series of articles from the pen of Mr. James C. Ward—being extracts from letters written in 1847-48, and illustrated by drawings made by Mr. Ward at the time. We think the narrative a most charming one, and intensely interesting, not only to those of our readers conversant with California in the olden times, but also to the more recent comers. The correspondence on the first page concerning the Chinese problem is something that should be carefully and dispassionately read.

Mr. Clitus Barbour is not altogether wrong when he declares that if an error of a word in the law that licenses bankers shall authorize them to avoid the payment of $40,000 to the city treasury, and to that extent shirk the responsibility of government, the workmen will be justified in sending their own men to make laws, and to elect their own men as executive officers to enforce them. The discovery of this technical error is attributable to the astuteness and research of ex-Governor Burnett, President of the Pacific Bank. This gentleman has held the highest executive office in our State. He has been honored with places of emolument. God (as he believes) has blessed him with wealth. For thirty years at least, he has been well fed, well housed, well clad. He has escaped the primal curse of labor. In his luxurious bank parlor, on his cushioned easy chair, he hires out his money at usury. He is the head of a large and highly respectable family, whose welfare is involved in the preservation of order and good government. He is (we believe) the president and managing trustee of a corporation having under its control a million of money. His home and his bank are guarded by the police. His business controversies are settled in the courts. His children (if he is not too devout a Roman Catholic) are educated in the public schools. He is a humane man, and would not have our hospitals discontinued. He would have our sewers flushed, that his family may escape typhoid fevers. He would have our parks watered and improved, for there he drives his carriage. His bank and private residence are protected by our fire department. As a business man, he recognizes the necessity of revenue to support government. As a Christian gentleman, a man of honor, he knows that this duty devolves upon all according to their means. Yet he finds a technical excuse for the avoidance of his duty as a citizen, a gentleman, and a Christian. He refuses to pay a license for his bank, when he knows that the man who owns a horse and dray, or express wagon, must pay; and the toiling woman, who fights the wolf from her door with a sewing-machine, must also pay. It is just such conduct as this, on the part of the rich, that arouses the just resentment of the poor. If rich men, in defiance of duty, shall employ their money to avoid their share of the responsibilities and burdens of organized society, they must not be surprised that brute force will counsel with passion, and organize in a rude way to correct wrongs of which it alone feels the injustice. We hope our bankers are generous and magnanimous enough not to follow the example of the Pacific Bank in invoking a technical error to avoid the payment of a just municipal tax.

Wealth has its duties and its responsibilities. One duty is to live well, to spend money, to build palatial residences, to drive elegant equipages, to dress, dine, keep servants, go to operas, give balls and banquets, buy jewels, and distribute generously. The more money that is spent the better. Luxury and extravagance are only other names for charity and generosity. The rich man who builds a gorgeous house, fills it with servants, and keeps one or more expensive establishments, we admire. The rich man who is economical and frugal, who lives moderately, and does not spend his money as a miser and usurer, as a selfish being who does no good. The more generous and extravagant rich man, who lives high, eats well, and drinks well, is more apt to die soon and distribute his wealth. This is good. The economical and prudent rich man is liable to live to an extravagant old age, and to cumber the earth for a long time with his vices of sobriety, temperance, economy, thrift, and accumulation. This is bad. Every rich man ought to keep fast horses and bet on them; ought to gamble in stocks; ought to get intoxicated every day at his own table. But these are not his only duties. There are other duties that he owes to organized society, and that he owes to his fellow-men. These duties are reciprocal. The man worth a million never sits upon a jury; he is never summoned in time of trouble upon the posse comitatus; he is never drafted in time of war; he is never chosen as judge or inspector of election; he never joins the volunteer militia; he never goes to the Legislature, or Board of Supervisors, or becomes a member of the Board of Education. These duties are performed by the great middle class of society. Still, he, more than any other individual, enjoys the protection of organized government; he has more property to protect, more rights to guard, and more lives to lose; hence, in our judgment, he should perform the duties of his station. He should charge himself with thinking for those who can not think; he should give employment to those who have not the brains to find it; he should manufacture, build, engage in industrial enterprises. In self-defense he should see that no honest worker is unemployed. There should be around him no empty stomachs if he can avoid it. He should educate the children of the poor; he should establish technic schools; he should administer his wealth—in part at least—as a trust; he should hedge himself round with a prosperous community; he should pay his taxes, and not seek to evade the responsibilities of his position; he should make his will and handsomely endow some institution for the public good, and then he should either die early, or, having relinquished his desire for accumulation, live a life of generous expenditure. As a matter of course, his sons and daughters will amount to but little, and this is well. The chances are that the sons of this rich man will become either profligates or milk-sops. They will grow up either without restraint or they will have too much. If they have too little they will be wild—spendthrifts and debauchees. If they are good and obedient they will be educated at home by private masters, abroad at Heidelberg or Oxford, and will, in idle worthlessness, enjoy their inherited estates. The daughters will be put up at lottery to other rich men's sons. We know the number of blanks and prizes in this game of matrimony. We of the middle class are holding the fort between the villains of the sandlot and the barons of the hills. Upon the great, intelligent, middle class devolves the duty of maintaining government and social order. There are two vicious elements—two dangerous powers—in society. One is the very rich, and the other the vicious poor. The first is indifferent; the second is desperate. The first is above the law; the second sets it at defiance. The first shrinks its duties and shirks its responsibilities; the second transcends its rights, and in its insolence grasps at remedies that are revolutionary. The first will not vote; the second votes often. The first hides its money in cowardly fear of its loss; the second refuses to labor, and strikes for reduced time and higher wages. The first occupies our courts in settling its disputes, and subjects the community to heavy taxation to maintain the machinery to arbitrate concerning its wealth; the other demands the establishment of a costly police to keep it in subjection to the law. The first combines, and by hiring attorneys learned in the law, by technicalities and subtle subterfuges, evades the payment of taxes; the other has nothing to tax. Thus the burdens of government fall upon the middle class. It is ground between the upper and nether millstones—corporate wealth and selfish greed at the top; poverty, crime, and discontent at the bottom.

I live in the suburb of the city; have lived in the same house twenty-three years. My neighbors are, many of them, poor, industrious workmen, who would gladly toil for two dollars per day. They have families, wives, and children dependent upon their daily labor for their daily bread. Last winter I went to the Legislature and asked for an appropriation for Lobos Square, in order to give my neighbors work. The work is the shoveling and removal of sand. The delegation promptly acted, and $30,000 was appropriated for it. Senator Rogers was especially active in passing the bill. After the act had passed I found that it was exceptional in this, viz: it took the whole control of the work away from the Board of Supervisors and gave it to the Superintendent of Streets. I came to San Francisco and urged Mr. Manzer to begin the work. My neighbors were pressing and anxious for employment. Again, and again, I interviewed the Street Superintendent, and urged him to diligence in setting the work on foot. I was met by excuses and delays. "The bill had not come down." "The survey had not been made." "The grade had not been established." "There was no money in the treasury." I offered to remove all these obstacles—the last by placing $30,000 in the Bank of California to the credit of the work, and wait reimbursement by the city. Still the matter hung fire. The Legislature adjourned, and then for the first time I found that Senator Rogers was to superintend the work. I urged him to begin, and he hung fire. In June a stable was constructed at the corner of Green and Octavia Streets. Rumor said it belonged to Senators Rogers and Nunan. Rumor said, also, that these two Senators were to handle this money. In July, from this stable there came horses and carts to do this work. I saw eight carts at work, with eleven men. There was no room for carts and horses. They were in each other's way, and unemployed. The labor could be better done by men and hand-carts. These horses and carts work eight hours per day. The pay is four dollars. The pay goes to horses that ought to go to men; money is expended for hay and oats that ought to go for bread and meat. The horses are owned, as I am informed, by two Senators—two legislators who passed the law—ex-Senator Rogers and ex-Senator Edward Nunan. My neighbors think the work is improperly and extravagantly done; that five thousand dollars honestly given to men with hand-carts and wheelbarrows, with ten hours labor, would move more sand than the $15,000 that is to be expended this year. My neighbors think there is a job in this thing, and that there are two ex-Senators in it. My neighbors are indignant, and the poor laborers who need this work, and who think themselves more deserving than a politician's horse, have asked me to write about it, and I have done so, in the hope that this business is on the square, and, if not on the square, that some way will be found to arrest the crime before all the money is squandered on these ex-Senators' horses. My neighbors are very good people, and have never been guilty of incendiary speech or riotous conduct, and they despise those demagogues who would incite insurrection against the law; but they hate and denounce intriguing and heartless politicians who would steal the bread from the mouths of willing workers, that they may live in idleness and ease. I agree in opinions with my neighbors, that this matter should be inquired into. P.

A serious charge is that made under oath by Messrs. Spaulding, Pinney, and Crawford, against Mr. E. W. Burr, President of the Clay Street savings bank. Mr. Burr is an old resident of San Francisco, and is the executive officer of a bank holding some $12,000,000 of the people's money in trust. The charge against him is that he loaned from the bank to certain navy contractors hundreds of thousands of dollars upon naval pay-certificates, which he was informed were worthless as security; that he knew the borrowers were engaged in mining stock speculations; and that, secretly and without the knowledge of his co-directors, he received from the borrowers five per cent, which he appropriated to his personal use. No more serious accusation can be brought against a person holding a fiduciary trust. If it is true, Mr. Burr is guilty of a most heinous crime; if it is untrue, he is the victim of a criminal conspiracy. That he loaned the money, we know; that he took navy pay-certificates as collateral, we know; that the bank lost $240,000 we also know. Mr. Burr will, at his convenience—and that should be very soon—make a full explanation of this business. He owes it to his own good name; he owes it to depositors and stockholders in his bank; he owes it to the community in which he has lived for nearly thirty years, and which has honored him by its confidence as mayor and banker. Until he makes that explanation—if in reasonable time—it is proper that the public should suspend its opinion and that the press should be silent. The trial in the United States court in which this testimony was brought out resulted in the acquittal and honorable discharge of William B. Carr from any complicity with Mr. Pinney in these money transactions.

If the ARGONAUT had been Governor of California, and Mayor of San Francisco, and there had come to our shores from the Empire of China, on its way to our national capital, an accredited diplomatic commission, charged with representing an imperial dynasty 4,000 years old, a population numbering 400,000,000 of people, a civilization like that of the Chinese Empire, and a commerce as rich as that of Asia—a nation with whose officials we have serious questions to consider and determine—we should have paid it some marked and special attention. We should not fear to have compromised our personal dignity by polite and courteous attentions to the minister and suite of this barbaric power. We should have delighted to show to this heathen magnate the superior courtesy of our Christian training, and to have demonstrated to his darkened intellect the chivalrous and polite deportment that so eminently distinguishes us of the Western and higher civilization. But then we should not anticipate being a candidate for re-election to the office of Governor of California, or Mayor of San Francisco.

The "National," or Greenback, party is a growing power. Peter Cooper is its corner-stone. Its organ, The Advocate, has the largest circulation of any paper in America. Clubs are forming in every State. It will make a formidable contest at the next presidential election. National paper currency, and plenty of it, is the leading plank of its platform, and the panacea proposed for the hard times. The official designation of this new political organization is the "National Labor League."

PRATTLE.

We read of hot weather in the Mississippi Valley, performing drowsy purrs of satisfaction with our better climate. This comes of imperfect reflection. Did not the heat in St. Louis knock over a newspaper "humorist?" When has our mild temperature done as much for us? Have we not newspaper "humorists" by companies and regiments, delivering ghastly grins and voluble cackles, baring snaggy teeth, agitating dirty shirt-fronts, and telling us this elaborate performance is wit? A few have been hanged, a few have gone to the State prison; but as a rule the "humorist" has too little respect for human life to die, and for the comforts of home to go abroad. Nothing can abate the gelid rigor of his effrontery but a climate that will drop him in his tracks.

Lo! "humor" penetrates the air,
As frost in regions polar,
To make us at each breath aware
Of every hollow molar.

Remark, good Satan, we entreat,
The freezing up of laughter;
Advance us ten degrees of heat,
Deducting them hereafter.

The "funny man" now rules the roast
In letters—pray thee take him,
And singe, and stew, and boil, and toast,
And fry, and grill, and bake him.

Speaking at the dinner given him by the Carlton Club, Lord Beaconsfield described Mr. Gladstone as a "sophisticated rhetorician, inebriated with the exuberance of his own verbosity and egotistical imagination." This terrible indictment may not "live as long as the language," but it cannot be entirely forgotten while the affectation of polysyllabic volubility dominates the vituperative vocabulary determining the ambidextrous applicability of its characteristically convertible equivalents.

Dr. Shorb having resigned his commission as Surgeon-General of the State militia considerable public solicitude is felt for the warriors who may be disabled in the next parade. The chaplain of the forces piously suggests that they receive the prayers of the church, but the commander-in-chief, with the coarse, practical wisdom distinguishing the man of action, favors putting their heads under a pump. The effect of this heroic treatment would depend somewhat on the manner of man at the pump-handle; if he should be a person of sense and patriotism the prayers would be all the more necessary, for he would assuredly drown every mother's son of them.

Bismarck and Grant, in friendly chat,
Considered gravely this and that.
Each gave his own peculiar twist—
Republican or Monarchist—
To everything discussed, and bent,
To match his bias, each event.
Said Bismarck: "Things are looking dark
O'er there since Kearny made his mark."
"All bright o'er here, I hope, Herr Bismarck,"
Said Grant, "since Nobel made his mark."
Both laughed, and both resumed, as one:
"Tis plain there's nothing to be done
Save listen to these beggars' cries,
But kill the rascals if they rise."
What! Nothing? Why, we here discuss
The plan of letting them kill us!

One day last week a journalist of this city was severely beaten for something—I do not know what—that had appeared in a newspaper with which he is connected. As it is not my habit to discuss in print matters that are to receive judicial investigation, I find it entirely easy to accomplish a forbearance that others have failed to achieve. But without reference to this particular case I beg leave to state, in the character of an expert who has a practical acquaintance with both methods of redress, that it is more agreeable to a journalist to be shot than beaten. This serious objection to the former method is, it seems to me, more than counterbalanced by considerations of safety to the avenger, who is commonly an extremely prudent man; for if the victim of the fist or bludgeon choose to prosecute his assailant that gentlemen will almost certainly be sharply reprimanded, and if very wealthy may even be fined; whereas there is no recorded instance of punishment for shooting a newspaper man. The restrictions of the game-law do not apply to this class of game. The newspaper man is a bird that is always in season; sportsman and pot-hunter alike may with assured impunity crack his bones with a bullet, or fill his skin with buck-shot, compiling his carcass in a bag and exposing it for sale. Whether his female and young are protected by statute I do not know, but should suppose they would be considered sufficiently protected by the liberty to kill him.

I am quite serious in the statement that nobody in the United States has ever been hanged for killing a journalist; public opinion will not permit it, and if there is any one who is committed to that mangy-dogma, vox populi vox Dei, it is your journalist. I am myself but indifferently reverent of public opinion, but in this particular I maintain its righteousness because it so accurately squares with my strongest propensity. I am sure I never saw a journalist without secretly wishing to kill him; equally sure I was never seen by any without him wishing to kill me. This kind of feeling between persons who so perfectly understand one another's merits and deserts can not be altogether wrong. Being natural, necessary, and intelligent, it must be altogether right. Moreover, it is universal, which is better. That it commonly exists as a mere tender sentiment, begetting no action, is nothing; so do some of the most radiant virtues that distinguish the good and great from the mean and base—as compassion for the poor and ambition to subdue a stage-robber.

After all, there is a certain rough justice tempering the terrors of even the cruellest practices. The bull in the arena, his shoulders gay with inserted flags, is permitted to add festoons of human entrail if he can; and although the American public will not deny itself the pleasing pageant of some blameless citizen accomplishing serpentine contortions under the editorial pen, neither will it inhibit the flight of the blithe bullet through the editorial body. It is a good-natured public, easily amused, or, if offended by the bloody blundering of some quite as easily appeased. It were ungracious in us, "the mob of gentlemen who write with ease," to complain of our "dreadful trade" and its hard conditions, when our fatal mistakes are as avidly relished and sincerely applauded as any shining conquest of our most consummate art.

"unperfect actor on the stage,
Who with his fear is put beside his part,"

I am almost ashamed to confess that my thesaurus of obituary poesy contains, this week, no gem of lustre superior to this:

"Softly the church bells were tolling
When dear little Sammy was born,
And as purely and calmly he left us;
Our darling, our pride, and our joy."

These are not luminous lines; their penury of rhyme alone would condemn them. Compared with some of the crystals of the early Pickeringian period their luculence is as the ghostly glimmer of a dead fish in the moonlight to the beamy dazzle of a toper's noonday nose. I hope somebody will die next week whose decease will be so poignantly regretted as to inspire a more moving strain.

While on the subject of obituary literature—a theme that always brings out my tenderest emotions, like the appetizing odor of toasted cheese eliciting rats from their holes—I may mention with admiration, unmixed, I hope, with envy, that the Bulletin is the pioneer in a field of literary endeavor not hitherto explored, but promising romantic adventure and abundant profit. The discovery of the Political Obituary is indeed a feat rivaling in splendor and magnitude Raleigh's failure to find El Dorado, and Ponce de Leon's abandonment of the search for the Fountain of Youth. I venture reverently to quote: "Our departed friend was therefore from education a Democrat of the school of Jefferson, and never swerved from his political bias, although he was keen enough to realize, and frank enough to acknowledge, the great mistakes which have been committed by his party from time to time during the last thirty years." This is "improving the occasion" to "get a lick in" at the Democrats, certainly, but I hope those miscreants will be still more insufferably plagued by some such inscription as this, blazoned on "our departed friends' headstone:

"Weep not, my friends, I'm freed from gross decay,
And, purged of error, bask in endless day:
Death laid a Democrat beneath this sod,
But gave a bright Republican to God."

Said the Moon to the Earth: "You're deluded—
Your swaggering Sun is a cheat;
When my shining bulk is obtruded
I quench all his splendor and heat."

"Your power," said Earth, "is conceded
Some beams of his love to keep back;
You're looking as big, too, as he did,
But looking disgustingly black."

Made visible out of his season
By smirching superior fame,
The dunce in the day of his treason
Exposes the night of his shame.

"As a dog returneth to its vomit," saith the Scripture with magnificent coarseness, "so a fool returneth to his folly." In the "fierce light" of this splendid simile it is difficult for feeble eyes to determine if the Bulletin is a dog or a fool, but in the spirit of compromise let us give it the benefit of the doubt, and consider it both; for as its writers appear to think as thriftily with their bellies as honestly with their brains, their deliveries have the double character of rejected food and discredited reason. More head-strong than strong-headed, this persistent journal renews its argument on the proposition that Congress has the right to set aside our treaty with China without the consent of that Power—that "a nation parts with no element of its sovereignty by treaty with another nation." It has, moreover, the boreal impudence to adduce the instance of the Winslow Extradition matter, in which the British Legislative power modified the conditions of a treaty which the British Executive power had concluded with us. But it prudently suppresses the facts that our Government, incensed at the breach of faith, came near breaking off diplomatic relations in consequence, and that the British Government surrendered the point at issue with something like an apology, and, ignoring the act of Parliament which had caused the entire correspondence, asked us to conclude a new treaty. But there is no suppressio veri or suggestio falsi too base for an editor who has made up his cowardly mind to piously perform whatever abominable rite the rubric of public opinion worship may prescribe.

His foot-ball conscience, tossed among men's toes,
This way and that obediently goes;
To nowhere tending and at nothing sticking,
Though moved by kicks, indifferent to kicking.

If the President should deem it necessary to recommend that Congress legislate upon the terms of the Burlingame Treaty I have the honor to suggest that his message be written on the back of the official copy (from the archives of the State Department) of one of Mr. Fish's communications to the British Foreign Office during the controversy mentioned. After the document had served its second purpose it could be relegated to its pigeon-hole, and would have an added value as a beautiful and instructive record of national consistency.

It is to be noted that this offensive doctrine of the right of a nation to cancel with its left hand the solemn obligation that it signed with its right is, in America, of purely local and contemporary growth. Until within a year it was never heard of except as a device of "perfidious Albion" in the Winslow matter. True, Congress once did (as Mr. Horace Davis had the folly to "point out") declare (under "severe provocation," as the Bulletin has the stupidity to confess) that certain treaties with France "were no longer obligatory on the United States." It is not the only time that Congress has practically declared war, and the "legality" of so doing may be readily conceded without reading the learned decisions of the Supreme Court thereon. But we are claiming, here in California, the moral right and present expediency of repudiating a national obligation deliberately assumed and faithfully observed by the other signatory power. And this claim we base on the ground that that power might have known, and must be assumed to have known that admirable principle of our simple system whereby our Legislature may at its sweet will upset any arrangement which our Executive may have made with the implied advice and consent of one branch of that Legislature, and the actual advice and consent of the other; and this at the dictation of something known as a popular majority. In other words, in concluding a treaty with us a foreign nation must remember at its peril that we are fools by nature and rascals by impulse.

But it is legal, quoth 'a! That is the misleading word that has fastened our clumsy feet in this bog. In discussion of international obligations it has neither place nor meaning. International "law" is not law; there is no tribunal for its enforcement, no penalty for its violation. It is "legal" for a nation to do whatever it dares do; "legal" for it to abstain. Whether it shall observe its agreements with others is a question of honor; whether the others shall resent its failure to do so is a question of expediency. Singly to abrogate a treaty is to declare war; the aggrieved party may accept the defiance or not. If we repudiate an undertaking with the Akhoond of Swat, the decision of our courts that it was legal to do so is exactly as relevant and valuable as the decision of his Lord Wiper of the Ineffable Nose that it was not.

A whale with a cold harpoon standing in his vitals makes himself ridiculous; his pranks are dangerous to the men in the boats, laughable to those on the ship. Underneath the foam and fury there is a certain pathos. We are in our flurry; the Chinese iron has entered our very soul. To rid ourselves of these aliens we have left no stone unturned and few unflung. We have abraded our knees and torn our hands groveling and groping for the clue that is to conduct us out of this maze. "Catching at straws," "leaning on broken reeds," "building on shifting sands"—bah! the whole battered and thin-worn mintage of spielmark metaphor occurs for passage. In plain, coarse speech, we've done our level best to beat the Johns, and they've got away with us. Disappointed, chagrined, surlily under the apathy of our Eastern brethren, or stung to madness by their sneers, we have now the misfortune to have lost both judgment and dignity, and are become dangerous to ourselves and ridiculous to others. Convinced that our material welfare is going to the dogs, we petulantly fling our reason after it, and our conscience after that. I think, my friends, we can better afford to part with our property than with our honor, though the Bulletin is of a different opinion. Each is sincere, because selfish: for I have no property, and the Bulletin has no honor.

The Boston Herald is cold and unloving toward those "who are as bitter against the reaping machine as against the Chinaman, spending their talent in burning; one and abusing the other." Well, there has been too much abuse of the reaping machine, that's a fact.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

I know you will think me a sad gad-about, dear Em, but the fact is, our stores are—some of them—such delightful places to lounge in, and why shouldn't we women be allowed to loaf in our own way, as well as the "lords of creation"? I am sure we don't do half as much mischief, as a general thing, and we get quite as much fun out of it, il est ce pas vrai? Louise came in yesterday morning, bound for a day's shopping, and nothing would do but I must leave everything and go with her, and when I found that it was to include a visit to Chadbourne's, in search of furniture, I was ready enough, for I had been longing for some good excuse to go through their new place. Well, my dear, it was just charming. We began at the first floor, and went on by easy stages—on the elevator—clear to the very top, five floors, where we saw, among other things, Mr. C.'s designing young man at work on those to-be-famous lambrequins of Mrs.—well, I won't tell you the name, because I am going to tell you the price, which is to be a cool thousand a window. They are of blue satin, with flowers of satin and velvet in applique and silk embroidery, and ever so much lovely lace-work in between. Louise is refurbishing entirely this fall, and very wisely, I think, has decided on having a variety of styles instead of confining herself to one. Mr. Michaels, who is a model ciccone, pointed out all the newest things, and helped us wonderfully in their selection. He discourses of furniture con amore, and, I assure you, I felt quite wise before we left. The Eastlake, Queen Anne, and Gildowski are the three most popular styles, and one bed-room set of Queen Anne, in French walnut inlaid with marquetry, captivated me completely. The Eastlake you are familiar with, of course. I fancy Eastlake himself must look something like the fashion he has inaugurated—very square in build, somewhat stern, and full of character. The Gildowski is later than either of the others, and is best suited to ample rooms and high ceilings, for it is massive, literally as well as figuratively—a single set weighing a thousand pounds. It is a specialty with this firm. But the quaintest, prettiest thing in the way of chamber furniture is what is called the ladies toilet chamber sets, the bureau of which has a square, hanging glass, with side stands and drawers, quite high up on both sides. In ornamentation, there seems to be a decided tendency toward marquetry, the handsomest articles, such as work-tables, buffets, bookcases, and desks, being extensively inlaid; and one of the choicest bits of imported work there was a desk of ebony and this style of finishing. A work-table of ebony, marquetry, and inlaid work of different woods, is another gem; but the loveliest thing there is a closed music-stand of ebony, with figures in bronze relief. I tried to select a desk, but, with twenty varieties to choose from, I became so bewildered I finally gave up in despair. I think things in this world ought to be so arranged that one could furnish every three or four months say, or every time anything new strikes one's fancy. There is a sense of power in the mere fact of choosing beautiful things and saying, "You may send this, and this, and this, if you please," that nine women out of ten prefer to any amount of political power. Why is this so? Give it up? So do I. There is nothing new, and there can be hardly anything richer, in the way of upholstery goods than the Turkish and Persian tapestries, and as Mr. C. always has plenty on hand already made up, it is no trouble to choose. Eastlake rockers—sensible man! no horrid points to tumble over, but the easiest of springs instead; lounges, easy-chairs, to lose yourself in after dinner, with the last new magazine or novel; divans, and so on, ad infinitum. The parlor set in Turkish goods and ruby velvet that stands in the window this week is for Frank Stewart, President of the First National Gold Bank of Sacramento, and displays excellent taste. Oh, yes; there is something new—the "Valley Flower," it is called. It is a satin brocade goods, in ashes of roses, with sprigs and sprays of wild flowers. The parlor set being made for Mrs. Mackintosh is one of the loveliest things you ever saw. Each piece is finished with puffings of crimson velvet, and it will be as elegant as it is costly. Mr. Michaels says they find plenty to do to keep forty workmen always busy, and then there is the house at Portland, Oregon, doing a thriving business, so it is no wonder there is never anything but smiles and good temper there, for success is a great beautifier and—well, both Mr. Chadbourne and his chief-of-staff are as round and as rosy as winter apples. Miss Stauffer, of San José, you know, is to be married on the 3th of September to Judge Gilfoy, of Salem, Oregon, and Samuels, of the Lace House, has had the importing of some of the wedding trousseau. Now, I know you are dying to hear all about it, so I will not keep you in suspense. The first-day reception dress—for she will be married in a traveling suit—is a combination costume of corn-colored silk, known as grain poudre, and white brocade gauze, from Worth's. The body is quite unique, being a corselet of the silk, cut square back and front, with very small ends at the back, and ornamented by a lined bow of the same, from which the high-necked waist of brocade rises as if from under a separate bodice. The latter is made surplice neck, and trimmed, as are the plain elbow sleeves, with puffings and very wide Valenciennes lace. The underskirt is of the silk edged with a narrow pleating of the same, over which falls a shell ruffle of the gauze finished with lace, and above that still another plain ruffle. The drapery is long and flowing in front, and caught back by shells of the silk. The bride-elect is, you know, a demi-brun, slender, and exceedingly graceful, and admirably suited to carry off an elaborate toilet. Another costume is of black brocade velvet, trimmed with narrow cord fringe and heavy Turkish tassels. It is an open-coat waist, Pompadour neck, filled in with a plastron of plain silk, and has the long ends of the basque at the back, gathered in and finished with tassels of chenille. The overdress, which covers one side only, being fastened high up on one hip, is in the "Turkish drapery" fashion, and falls in a long, graceful sweep low on the train of plain silk. Mademoiselle Trouffé showed me some elegant cloaks Mr. Samuels brought from Paris with him. They were made by Abel, the Worth of cloak-makers, who died suddenly the other day. Mr. Samuels, chancing to be the only San Francisco merchant on the spot, purchased the most of the stock. They are of camel's hair, or cashmere, and are all modifications of the Dolman (only Mademoiselle Trouffé says we must not say Dolman any more), and trimmed with lace, passementerie and beads. Abel was a genuine artist, and would draw a design for your cloak or mantle right before your eyes, while you were giving him your order; and, as he, like Shakspeare, never repeated himself, the consequence is that no two garments are ever exactly alike. An ermine cloak from Worth is something in the same form, and is lined with peach-colored plush and edged with quillings of silk of the same color; it may be worn either side out, and is only $400. A white cashmere, lined and embroidered with blue, and trimmed with pearl-beaded lace and swan's down and feathers, is less expensive, but very handsome. I happened in just in time to assist at the opening of some new morning wrappers that were just too sweet for anything. Some were of ecru camel's hair with jabots of lace and cardinal bows; others of blue silk serge, made with the "Watteau" fold in the back, and ornamented with Torchon lace. To wear with them were the daintiest of breakfast caps, of every shape, color, and material—crêpe lisse, muslin, silk—and, prettiest among them, a Turkish silk of pale blue and gold arabesque design, and made exactly like a gentleman's smoking cap, only that instead of a tassel to hang at one side, there was a long end of the silk fringed out, and a bordering of crêpe lisse where it rested on the hair. The "Charlotte Corday" in print bourette gauze, and the "Italian peasant" of white muslin, are very pretty also. You have heard of the rainbow trimming that Worth is using so extensively, and that is to be the rage this coming season. It consists of a fine silk cord, in which, as in the beads to be used with it, the predominating color is golden, although every other color is combined, making a tint describable only by the term "rainbow." The cord is put on like braiding, the beads following every turn, so that the effect is of beaded embroidery. The most unique application of it is on the front of the corsage, which must be long and pointed, à la Rubens' portraits in the Louvre. En passant, the extreme of the mode in Paris will be, this winter, the looped-up over-skirt of the same period. But, if I run on at this rate, I shall leave myself no time to tell you of anything else; and, really, although the cry is "nothing new," everywhere I go I manage to find a good deal that is not only new but very pretty besides. Arthur is just getting into regular boys' clothes, and I took him down to Figel's for his first suit. You should see the airs he puts on! He does look too sweet for anything in it, too—a bottle-green cashmere, kilt-pleated at the back and plain in front, with the cutest little pockets. The nobbiest thing in trimmings, Mr. Bine tells me, will be the seaweed fringe. It has been used this past summer, but it comes now in a solid fringe, very full, and is an improvement on the first. Don't you wish you were a bold Briton, so you might have a hand in the grand presentation to be made to Lord Beaconsfield by his countrymen here? The description of the design—for, of course, it is only in embryo as yet—reads quite elaborately. It is to be a gold casket, with the Beaconsfield coat of arms in gold relief on top; cabinets, containing specimens of California ores, on each side; on one end, also, an Indian soldier grasping the hand of a British ditto, with the motto, "Defense, not defiance," underneath; and on the other a British sailor, with the motto, "Ready, aye, ready." The rose, shamrock, and thistle will be on the centre of the front, and the arms of California on the back, while around the edges an endless cable indicates Britannia's boasted rulership of the seas. Inside the casket is a roller on which the address and the names of the givers will be photographed—the handle of the spring which works the roller being in the form of a crossed pen and sword, surmounted by the Earl's crest. Anderson & Randolph's design was the one chosen, and the value of the concern when finished will not fall far short of four thousand dollars. The address is to be gotten up in a somewhat novel manner, and is to be done by Mr. Sterndale. Hamilton and Jackson, the artists who made Rose Wood's picture I mentioned week before last, have a full-length of Maud Granger, in the California Theatre vestibule, even better, I think, than hers. They have a delightful studio in "St. Ann's Rest" building, corner of Powell Street, and opposite the side entrance of the Baldwin. Crayons are their specialty, although they do a great deal of fine work in other lines, and they do all of Houseworth's orders, many from the other leading photographers, as well as direct orders. When you come home you shall see one of "Yours truly," now just begun. You asked in your last letter for some suggestions as to neck wear, so I stopped in at Chester's, on Montgomery Street, to hunt up any possible novelties for you, and found Mr. C. about to start for the East in a few days on a combined pleasure and business tour. Knowing your utter destitution (you must have left town two months ago, with no less than a dozen different styles, then quite new!), I made the case as urgent as possible; indeed, I must have been quite tragic, for he laughed heartily at my despair—hard-hearted wretch!—and said, "Tell your fair friend to possess her soul in patience, for there will surely be something new in a month from now. Meantime, here is a prophecy for her private ear: Deep round or square collars of satin and lace, or lace and crêpe de chine, with satin bows and loops, will be one of the new fancies, and square linen ones, edged with the hand-made lace, crocheted from the pearl braid, and of the same shapes as the lace ones, are to be worn with morning costumes. The bouquetière fichu, made of white silk grenadine with embroidered wreaths of wild flowers in natural colors, and mossy foliage for a background, the edge finished with a fall of Mechlin lace, put on without gathers, and, the bouquetière cravat, in the same style, but in form like a tie, will probably come in the fall stock, as well as a variety of the Irish lace cuffs and fichus, and the more expensive laces in the same shapes." If there is any one thing I like more than another it is a man who can speak with authority on these momentous subjects. That's the secret of business success, to know not only what has been and is, but what will be, as well, and I think Mr. Chester has learned it completely. Ever your own, LILIAS DUBOIS.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

XXXIX.—Measuring the Baby.

We measured the riotous baby
Against the cottage-wall;
A lily grew on the threshold,
And the boy was just as tall;
A royal tiger lily,
With spots of purple and gold,
And a heart like a jeweled chalice,
The fragrant dew to hold.

Without, the bluebird whistled
High up in the old roof-trees,
And to and fro at the window
The red rose rocked her bees;
And the wee pink fists of the baby
Were never a moment still,
Snatching at shine and shadow
That danced on the lattice-sill.

His eyes were wide as bluebells,
His mouth like a flower unblown,
Two little bare feet, like funny white mice,
Peeped out from his snowy gown;
And we thought, with a thrill of rapture
That yet had a touch of pain,
When June rolls around with her roses,
We'll measure the boy again.

Ah me! in a darkened chamber,
With the sunshine shut away,
Through tears that fell like a bitter rain,
We measured the boy to-day;
And the little bare feet, that were dimpled
And sweet as a budding rose,
Lay side by side together
In the bush of a long repose.

Up from the dainty pillow,
White as the risen dawn,
The fair little face lay smiling,
With the light of heaven thereon;
And the dear little hands, like rose-leaves
Dropped from a rose, lay still,
Never to snatch at the sunshine
That crept to the shrouded sill.

We measured the sleeping baby
With ribbons white as snow,
For the shining rosewood casket
That waited him below;
And out of the darkened chamber
We went with a childless moan—
To the height of the sinless angels
Our little one had grown.

XL.—Oh, Why Should the Spirit of Mortal be Proud?

Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
Like a swift fleeting meteor, a fast flying cloud,
A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
Man passeth from life to rest in the grave.

The leaves of the oak and the willow shall fade,
Be scattered around and together be laid;
And the young and the old, and the low and the high,
Shall moulder to dust and together shall lie.

The infant a mother attended and loved;
The mother that infant's affection who proved;
The husband that mother and infant who blessed—
Each, all, are away to their dwellings of rest.

The maid on whose cheek, on whose brow, in whose eye,
Shone beauty and pleasure—her triumphs are by;
And the memories of those who loved her and praised
Are alike from the minds of the living erased.

The hand of the king that the sceptre hath borne,
The brow of the priest that the mitre hath worn,
The eye of the sage and the heart of the brave,
Are hidden and lost in the depth of the grave.

The peasant whose lot is to sow and to reap,
The herdsman who climbed with his goats up the steep,
The beggar who wandered in search of his bread,
Have faded away like the grass that we tread.

The saint who enjoyed the communion of heaven,
The sinner who dared to remain unforgiven,
The wise and the foolish, the guilty and just,
Have quietly mingled their bones in the dust.

So the multitude goes, like the flowers or the weed
That withers away to let others succeed;
So the multitude comes, even those we behold,
To repeat every tale that has often been told.

For we are the same our fathers have been;
We see the same sights our fathers have seen;
We drink the same stream and view the same sun,
And run the same course our fathers have run.

The thoughts we are thinking our fathers would think;
From the death we are shrinking our fathers would shrink;
To the life we are clinging they also would cling;
But it speeds for us all, like a bird on the wing.

They loved, but the story we can not unfold;
They scorned, but the heart of the haughty is cold;
They grieved, but no wail from their slumbers will come;
They joyed, but the tongue of their gladness is dumb.

They died—aye, they died—and we things that are now—
Who walk on the turf that lies over their brow,
Who make in their dwelling a transient abode—
Meet the things that they met on their pilgrimage road.

Yea! hope and despondency, pleasure and pain,
We mingle together in sunshine and rain;
And the smiles and the tears, the song and the dirge,
Still followed each other, like surge upon surge.

'Tis the wink of an eye, 'tis the draught of a breath;
From the blossom of health to the paleness of death,
From the gilded saloon to the bier and the shroud—
Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud? KNOX.

Among the Zulus, a nation of the Caffres, according to etiquette, the mother-in-law can not face the son-in-law, but must hide, or pretend to hide, when she sees him. In this country it is reversed. It is the son-in-law who does the dodging.

An Eastern exchange says: "Every once in a while we hear of a California woman killing a bear. This is all right. But we challenge the world to ransack the pages of history and show us where a woman ever got away with a mouse."

INTAGLIOS.

Fickle Fortune.

FROM THE GERMAN OF GEIBEL.

Fortune is not won by wooing—
Fickle coquette from her birth—
Nor is caught by one pursuing,
Though he seek her round the earth.

Lying in the fragrant grasses,
Singing songlets to thyself,
Chanced suddenly from heaven
Right beside thee falls the elf.

Then thou'lt seize and closely bind her,
And tell none thou hast the prize,
Lest at last she should escape thee
And regain her native skies.

N. W. TUNSTALL.

Wait.

For years we pray, but pray unheard;
For years we hope, but hope deferred;
For years we yearn, but yearn in vain;
Yet pray, and hope, and yearn again.

The day comes when we pray no more,
When hope and yearning both are o'er;
When heart and soul we yield to doubt,
When faith in life has faded out.

Then lo! within our easy grasp,
Unwilling to elude our clasp,
The joy for which we long have cried
Stands, all unsummed, at our side.

B. E. W.

If You and I.

If you and I were birds,
And in some nook there was a downy nest,
Just made for two,
Would you fly heedless by, all uncared,
Because my rippling song lacked words
To tell the careless world I cared for you?

If you were some sweet rose,
And I a butterfly—would you at dawn
Unfold for me,
Or take the dewy jewels of the morn,
And all your winsome petals close,
To wait till fickle suns should smile on thee?

If you and I were dreams—
Of Heaven you, and I of Earth—would you
When tender love
In some poetic mind should link the two,
Be raptured skies to murmurous streams
Or stay still far, so scornfully, above?

If you were laughing Day,
And I the mourning Night; when vesper hour
Drew gently near,
Would you entrance me with your magic power—
Or shroud yourself in sullen gray,
And keep your kisses for another's tear?

And if you were the sea
Beloved by gorgeous, tropic isles, and I
The dreary Pole,
Would you reach passioned arms where I should lie,
And lift the icy grief from me—
Or keep the wealth of warmth within your soul?

And O, if you and I—
Mere man and woman—just by chance should meet
In some dear place,
Would you turn from me then—ah, would you, sweet?
Or never say the same good-bye,
But welcome gladly back the olden grace!

HENRY GUY CARLETON.

What of That?

Tired! Well, what of that!
Didst fancy life was spent on beds of ease,
Fluttering the rose leaves scattered by the breeze?
Come, rouse thee! work while it is called to-day!
Coward, arise! go forth upon thy way!

Lonely! And what of that?
Some must be lonely; 'tis not need to all
To feel a heart responsive rise and fall,
To blend another life into its own;
Work may be done in loneliness. Work on.

Dark! Well, what of that?
Didst fondly dream the sun would never set?
Dost fear to lose thy way? Take courage yet!
Learn thou to walk by faith, and not by sight;
Thy steps will guided be, and guided right.

Hard! Well, what of that?
Didst fancy life one summer holiday,
With lessons none to learn, and naught but play?
Go, get thee to thy task! Conquer or die!
It must be learned! Learn it, then, patiently.

No help? Nay, 'tis not so!
Though human help be far, thy God is nigh—
Who feeds the ravens, hears his children's cry;
He's near thee, whereso'er thy footsteps roam,
And he will guide thee, light thee, help thee home.

Dead Love.

All other griefs may find a voice for song,
Love dead is dead beyond the reach of prayer,
The tender flower your careless feet have crushed
May bloom again, nursed by the summer air.
Above the broken sod, where sleep your dead,
Whom tender watching could not wrest from death
Some hope of hope may shine through all your tears,
And loving prayers ascend with every breath.
For faith divine sees through the darkness cloud
The glorious reflex of eternal light,
The promise that beyond the valley dim
Arches the glory of the Infinite.

But love, dead love, the saddest death of all,
Leaves not the shadow of a hope behind;
Torn from its native soil by tempest shock,
Its tendrils scattered by the cruel wind.

No after summers with their breath of balm
Can win back that which perished in an hour;
For love, alas! there is no risen Christ
With promise of the resurrection power.

D. M. JORDAN.

Gone in Rage.

Oh, God! how bitter are the wrongs of love!
Life has no other sorrow half so acute;
For love is made of every fine emotion,
Of generous impulses and noble thoughts;
It looks up to the stars and dreams of heaven;
It nestles 'mid the flowers and sweetens earth.
Love is aspiring, yet humble too;
It doth exalt another o'er itself.
With sweet heart-homage, which delights to raise
That which it worships, yet is fain to win
The idol to its lone and lowly home
Of deep affection. 'Tis an utter wreck
When such hopes perish. From that moment, life
Has in its depths a world of bitterness
For which there is no healing.

Music.

Hear what, now loud, now low, the pining flute complains,
Without tongue, yellow-checked, full of winds that Wail and sigh, saying, "Sweetheart, the old mystery remains."
If I am I, thou thou, or thou art I.

FROM THE PERSIAN POET HILALI.

THE MYSTERIOUS GONDOLIER.

The clocks of Venice had just struck the midnight hour.

An old man and a youth were standing on one of the wharves, engaged in a low conversation and in looking earnestly toward the Lido.

"One spirit has been repeatedly seen, Paulo," pursued the old man, "and I can give you the proofs. No longer ago than last evening a veracious friend of mine, the Count Bertram, was in the vicinity of the Lido a little after midnight, but by a mere chance, and not with the intention of investigating the matter. He affirms that he saw the spirit, the night being clear, and that his gondola passed within a few rods of that in which she was silently floating over the waters."

"Padre mio," responded the youth, "do you think this mysterious being is really a spirit?"

"I have no doubt of it whatever. But why?" said he, characteristically, taking the youth by the button-hole. "Firstly, because I know that spirits can communicate with mortals in the flesh. Secondly, because spirits, having the power of communicating with mortals in the flesh, have also the power of revealing themselves to mortals in the flesh. Thirdly, because I have seen spirits myself. Fourthly, and lastly, because the reality of communications of this kind has been established by the wise and good of all nations."

The listener smiled, while he looked thoughtfully at a gondolier, a few paces distant, who was waiting for a fare. He then looked at the moon, marking the exquisite loveliness of the night, coughed audibly, and finally said:

"I thank you, Padre mio, for the kindness with which you have responded to my queries. I wish you good-night."

"Stay, my dear Count. As an old friend of your late father, I must give you a little advice. Young blood is rash, and particularly when beauty and mystery are concerned. Nothing good can ever come of attempting to raise the veil by which this hapless maiden is enshrouded. I confess to you, in this private way, that I have a way of explaining the matter to my own satisfaction."

"Will you give me the explanation?"

"With pleasure, if you promise to keep it secret. The daughter of the Duke de Montellani, as you are aware, disappeared suddenly, five weeks since, without leaving a single clue behind her to the mystery of her disappearance. Every possible investigation has been instituted by her father, but with no result. Many theories and suspicions have been broached, and received with more or less respect, and some of them, by an occasional person, with credence. My suspicion is this, that the Countess of Montellani was seized by a ruffian whom she had offended, subjected to indescribable outrages, and drowned in the vicinity of the Lido!"

"Terrible!"

"Hence it is that her unhappy spirit is seen in that vicinity. Take my advice, my dear Count; do not trust yourself on those accursed waters. That is my parting counsel. Good-night."

As the old man walked away the Count of Lontano looked searchingly around. A few persons were perceivable here and there, but a profound silence—such a silence as is unknown in every other city of the world—reigned around him.

The Count was on the eve of embarking in the gondola he had previously noticed, when a party of three persons appeared on the threshold of a palatial-looking mansion behind him—one of them an elderly gentleman of pleasing exterior, the second his wife, and the third a young and gloriously beautiful maiden of seventeen summers. The Count started as if shot the instant his eyes rested upon the maiden's features.

"The Countess of Montellani!" he muttered. "There is a mystery in this affair worthy of a solution!"

The Countess entered a gondola and seated herself within the canopy. The gondolier, disguised from head to foot, placed himself at the oars. The elderly gentleman and his wife placed themselves in a second gondola and took the lead toward Lido. The party had advanced but a few rods ere the Count, snugly ensconced in a third gondola, was silently following in their wake.

"Perhaps," said he to the gondolier; "perhaps I shall annoy the Countess and her friends. If you detect any signs of such a circumstance you will return to the city."

But, as the Count soon discovered, there was no occasion for attention to be directed to his solitary vessel, the sea being covered with gondolas, advancing from all quarters to the Lido in silence.

"The mystery has been circulated in the city," whispered the Count's boatman, "and hence this assemblage of the curious."

"I had an idea, as soon as I saw the Countess of Montellani, that she could give us an explanation, but it seems that I was mistaken."

"O, she is not the spirit," was the reply. "The story of her disappearance—but perhaps, my lord, you have heard only a single version of the affair. The Countess eloped, leaving a note for her father, which contained all necessary information on the subject; but, by some chance or other, he failed to receive it, and hence the fearful stories resulting from her absence. When her father found that she had married a man so obnoxious to him (by reason of an old family feud) as the Count de Varre, he did not care to contradict the story which had gone abroad respecting the drowning of his daughter by some ruffians in the Lido."

"And the Count de Varre?"

"Is very ill at his residence. This gentleman and lady attending the Countess are a very respectable couple, who have long been intimate with the Varres."

"And what are they all doing here?"

"The same as we are doing," replied the gondolier, with a smile.

"The attraction of the mystery?"

"That is it, without doubt."

"But do you think we will make any discovery with regard to the identity of the spirit?"

"I do not. Spirits, my lord, do not ever appear in the midst of such a concourse as is now assembled hereabouts; and if, as some are bold enough to declare, the reputed spirit is a young woman of our city, she will not be very likely to exhibit herself to such a promiscuous crowd as has been attracted hither."

A large assemblage of boats had now arrived in the vicinity of the Lido, taking up their positions around the supposed locale of the mysterious disappearance, in such a manner as to leave an open space in the form of a circle, and half a mile in diameter, as the centre upon which all eyes were fixed.

"There has been a small collection here for several evenings," said the Count's gondolier, "in expectation of seeing the spirit, but their curiosity has not been gratified. In fact, the spirit has not appeared within a fortnight, and not at all since the attention of the public was directed to the affair."

As the gondolier ceased speaking, the Count of Lontano saw that a great deal of attention was being bestowed upon a gondola advancing from the direction of the city. He was not able, on account of the intervening boats, to discover the exact occasion of the excitement, which began to go the rounds of the circle, the more especially as not a word was uttered aloud.

It was not long, however, ere that portion of the circle of boats which was on the side next the city parted in twain, leaving an open space between them, by which the approaching gondola might advance to the centre of said circle.

A few minutes later, the cause of the excitement was apparent to all observers.

"It is the spirit!" said the gondolier of the Count of Lontano, in a whisper. "Its appearance agrees with all the reliable information I have gathered on the subject."

The reputed spirit of the Lido was alone in an uncovered gondola, which she herself sculled slowly through the water, keeping her eyes fixed in the direction of the spot where the tyrants of Venice have drowned so many of the noblest of men. She wore a long and flowing garment of snowy whiteness, and her unbound hair floated in wavy ringlets around a neck and shoulders of exquisite beauty.

"Good heavens! is it possible?" cried the Count of Lontano, after gazing long and earnestly upon the mysterious being. "I could swear, without any scruples, that I am gazing on the face and figure of Signora Ludovico, my own betrothed, whom I have not seen for two months," he added to the gondolier, "having been absent from the city!"

"Does the lady walk in her sleep, my lord?"

The Count started—arose to his feet with considerable excitement—continued gazing, rubbing alternately his eyes and his glass—then sat down with a smile upon his features.

"Mera's grandfather was drowned by the government in the Lido," he muttered, "and that must be the reason of her visits!"

The gondola of the reputed spirit was now resting motionless in the centre of the encircling boats, while she herself remained silent and motionless therein, her arms folded upon her bosom, and her eyes turned toward heaven.

It was not long ere a strange feature was given to the scene.

The gondola and the mysterious being therein, while all eyes were fixed so intently upon it, suddenly disappeared beneath the surface of the sea. But few of those who witnessed the event could realize its actuality, ere the closing waters were as placid above the sunken gondola and its burden as the brow of a smiling babe.

There arose from all those spectators a wild cry of horror and astonishment, not unmixed with fear and superstition, while boat after boat shot forward in the direction of the spot.

"Hasten, hasten!" cried the Count of Lontano to his gondolier. "I was probably mistaken in thinking I knew the lady; but it is my duty and privilege to make some effort to save the mysterious and unfortunate being!"

The gondolier regarded the Count fixedly, without touching the oars, while a singular smile rested upon his features.

"That is not a woman, my lord!" said he, with a quietness peculiar to himself.

"Not a woman?" cried the Count. "Would you attempt to make me believe it was a spirit?"

"It was not a spirit!"

"What! Would you have me distrust that I have seen any woman or gondola at all?"

The boatman repeated his earnest scrutiny of the Count's features, and replied to his question by asking another.

"Can your lordship keep an important secret?"

"Certainly," responded the Count, in much wonder and curiosity, again assuring himself by a glance that the other gondolas were doing all that could be done for the rescue of the mysterious being.

"Do you pledge yourself to keep the revelation I make an inviolable secret?"

"I do!"

"Know then, my lord, that the gondola and woman is—an automaton of my own manufacture!"

The Count was too much astonished to reply. The gondolier resumed his oars and commenced rowing toward the city.

"Wonderful man!" exclaimed the Count, at last, "it is a pity that such a piece of skill should be forever lost!"

"Have no anxiety upon that point, my lord," was the reply; "in about three hours that boat and woman will return to the surface, and I shall be on the spot to receive it."

"I do not see," said the Count, musingly, "why I mistook the figure for Signora Ludovico?"

"It is because the figure is a perfect likeness of that lady."

The Count started to his feet, motioning to the gondolier to cease rowing. He then extended his hand.

"You are not only a wonderful genius," said he, "but I perceive you are a friend to me and mine!"

"Your father, my lord," responded the boatman, "saved my father from an ignominious death. Moreover, as another reason of my attachment to your lordship, my betrothed is in the service of Signora Ludovico. Perhaps"—he added suggestively—"perhaps, when your lordship weds your ladyship—"

"You and the bride you have chosen shall not be forgotten!" interrupted the Count, again pressing the hand of the boatman.

In conclusion, we have only to say that the Count Lontano and the Countess are living in elegant style upon the grand canal of Venice. Each has a faithful and confidential servant.

As to the mystery of the "Spirit of the Lido," to the generality of the Venetians it is as dark as ever. A few of them, however, have gained an idea de plus by seeing the automaton gondolier in the Vatican, where you may see it at your leisure, the next time you visit the Eternal City.

They were standing at a window. "In looking out doors do you notice how bright is the green of the grass and leaves?" asked an elderly gentleman of a little girl whose home he was visiting. "Yes, sir." "Why does it appear so much brighter at this time?" he next asked, looking down upon the bright sweet face with tender interest. "Because ma has cleaned house and you see out better," she said. The elderly gentleman sat down.

The excesses of our youth are drafts upon old age, payable with interest, about thirty years after date.

The Wonderful Geysers!

THIS WONDERFUL SPOT OF CAL-

ifornia should be visited by all residents and tourists. The Geysers of Iceland and the Geysers of the Yellowstone have their counterpart in the remarkable Canyon of the Pluton in Sonoma County. Wonderful as a curiosity of nature, wonderful as a health resort, and delightful as a resort of pleasure. By steamer, train, and coach, over a beautiful Bay, through beautiful valleys and romantic hills, the trip alone more than compensates for the cost and time. Leave San Francisco daily at 3 p. m., by steamer for Donahue; take train for Cloverdale; stay all night at Cloverdale, and leave in coach—four-in-hand—at 7 A. M. for the mountain drive over the hills to the Geysers. Returning passengers reach San Francisco in a day by the Calistoga way. A trip to the Geysers is the easiest, most inexpensive and most delightful of any in California. The hotel accommodations, the trout fishing, the hunting, the walks drives the bathing, the everything, are perfection.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 1, 1878.

MY DEAR MADGE:—When Jack and I dropped into Baldwin's the other night to see The Long Strike, the outlook for an enjoyable evening was not delusively brilliant. All the best names were out of the bill, and all the best members of the company were variously disposed about the auditorium. Rose Wood was having a rest, and so were Mackay, and Mrs. Farnen, and pretty little Kate Corcoran, and James O'Neill. When you take the leading man and leading lady out of a company, together with the best character actor, one of the nicest of old ladies, and the pretty juvenile, what is left is like the Bismarckian Turkey after diplomatic dissection. Mackay, O'Neill, Corcoran! Have you ever observed, Madge, since some people began the sensible custom of playing under their own names, how extremely Celtic in character the list of a company becomes? Then we have Sullivan, McCullough, Dargon; or to descend a peg, Emerson, Dougherty, Murphy. Truly, the green isle has contributed generously to pleasure-making. There was a time when the California Theatre Company was a Johnny Bull conclave, with the Paternans, Harry Edwards, Jennie Lee, and for a period a long succession of English stars. But they have changed all that, and all the companies are wonderfully cosmopolitan. Mr. Stoddart, the new star at Baldwin's—ah, have I come back to Baldwin's?—is a Scotchman. They do not send us many actors from the land of Bruce. After having seen Mr. Stoddart, I am not surprised. Such tremendous reaction from the traditional phlegm and cold gravity of the Scottish character would soon wear the population out, yet Mr. Stoddart is as unmistakably Scotch as when his foot first pressed the heather, and the accent hangs upon his lips in all its round richness. I suppose I ought to tell you that he is a wonderfully fine actor. Every one says he is; in fact, they call him an artist. Gustave Doré is the first artist of the age, though his every line is grotesquely long. I will do Mr. Stoddart the honor to place his name in close juxtaposition to Gustave Doré's in this scrawl, and say that his lines are grotesquely broad. Perhaps, in this instance, they were broader than usual. I fancy he stood at the wings during the two tame acts which preceded his entrance and gauged the temper of the audience. I can not say that it was a spirited audience. People lounged gloomily lack in their seats with that listlessness which a thin house and dull action are sure to bring about. Mr. Stoddart saw that it was necessary to startle them into interest, and he did so. He came in as if he were shot in, and when he got in I assure you, my dear Madge, he did not permit the action to flag. I heard people talking about his school—every actor is supposed to have a school nowadays. Jack suggested that he belonged to the boisterous school, where antics and gyrations are important items in the course of study. Mr. Stoddart really is a clever contortionist. He can collapse into a heap, sprawl over more stage, drop himself down and pick himself up again quicker than any one I ever saw outside the ring. The people were wild with infantile delight. They screamed with laughter, they stormed applause, they called him before the curtain again and again. And the more they laughed and applauded, the more he rolled his eyes and tumbled into a little heap, and straightened up into a string, and bolted in and out, like a violently propelled shuttlecock. You will be astonished after all this, Madge, when I tell you that he was playing the part of a crusty, irascible, tetchy old lawyer, one of those old fellows, you know, whom we always find in fiction and never in fact, with a heart bubbling over with goodness, and an aspect as stern as the laws of the Medes and Persians. I must say, that in the midst of all his extravagance of action—and anything more wildly absurd I can not imagine—that he managed to convey the idea of such a man perfectly. His conception was artistic, even though his acting outraged the natural. It is difficult to reconcile two such extremes, but in this case they were reconciled. He is no clown, careening wildly about, however whimsical his antics; no buffoon, however tumultuous the delight he excites in the gallery. His picture is in good drawing, though the lines are too strong; and his colors are true, though too loud and too lavish. I suppose the fact that he is professionally an eccentric character actor must account for his deepest plunges into the improbable. Eccentric is a most comprehensive word. In fact, Madge, I fear eccentricity covers a greater multitude of sins than any other. It is my practical experience that when people become insufferably ill-natured and disagreeable, and mildly insane, they are called eccentric. On the stage, when they transgress all reasonable bounds, they are called eccentric character actors. Once, all plays were either comedies, tragedies, or farces; all actors were either comedians, tragedians, or clowns. They are so thoroughly classified nowadays that no man, however original the bent of his genius, can fail to fall in some niche. I was much struck by Mr. Herne's "Noah Leroyd," in the Long Strike. For once he disposed of the incipient apoplexy which frequently distinguishes him, and which was more marked than usual in his nondescript "Col. Colpepper" last week. As "Noah Leroyd," his make-up was really as complete as a genre painting. He was earnest and really impressive, and his dialect was better than fair. The other's dialects reminded me of the dahlias at a flower show. You know what long lines of them they have in glass bottles at the Mechanics' Fairs, each one different from its neighbor in some subtlety of hue, size, and shape. The dialectic variations lasted as long as the dialectic cast did, and only ceased when it became necessary to double up for the court scene. And what a farce was this court scene, Madge, in a theatre where they have picked up such a high reputation for thoroughness in their settings! Jack mildly intimated that they looked like a lot of amateurs on a lark in the wardrobe room. Mr. Stoddart had a bit of wig about the size of a small lamp-mat perched gracefully on one eyebrow, and the dignity of the entire scene concerted harmoniously with the position of this wig. I need hardly say that it was not a fac simile of an English court. The hedge scene was very prettily gotten up, and its picturesqueness heightened by a distant view of the mills. The mills in both scenes looked like the Palace Hotel isolated on a heath and illuminated for the Chinese Embassy. The resemblance, it is but fair to say, is the fault rather of the architect of the Palace than of the scenic artist. The run of Diplomacy comes to an end on Saturday night. I am sorry to part with it. Take it for all in all, we shall not look upon its like again—that is to say, very soon. I presume some one will eventually brush up his wits and get up another good play somewhere within the present cycle, but the prospect is not enlivening. There was either war or rumors of war up at the California early in the week, and it was whispered on Monday that the gentle Zieka had been slightly infuriated in real earnest, for some reason or other, and refused to play the strategic "Comtesse." Here was a dilemma, for Diplomacy in this city, without Jeffreys-Lewis would be like England without Disraeli. Who could take her place? Not pretty Eleanor Carey, who has lost her spoiled baby ways since she went to New York, and who sometimes does better than one expects. What a pretty throat she has, by the way, and how rare a beauty it is. But fancy her as "Zieka"—"Zieka," who is a pantheress, but who would in such hands become simply an angry kitten. Rose Wood might have filled the breach, and how the little woman would have reveled in the part. I am almost sorry she could not have had a chance just for one night. I should like to have seen her bend her best energies to it, and I'll engage she would have managed to make a hit of it somehow or other if she had been obliged to make a new departure and remould the high-strung "Zieka." Luck did not favor her, however. Jeffreys-Lewis came off her pedestal of untimely wrath, and played with more spirit, perhaps, than ever. I believe they are going to give us a new bill on Monday night—False Shame; perhaps another but a milder Wallackian success. We are spoiled for anything but a superior article; but of course I must see it and tell you all about it.

Yours, always, BETSY B.

Shakespeare gives an admirable description of the commonwealth of bees as the type of a well-ordered State:

For government, though high, and low, and lower,
Put into parts, doth keep in one consent,
Concreting in a full and natural close,
Like music.
Therefore doth heaven divide
The state of man in divers functions;
Setting endeavor in continued motion:
To which is fixed, as aim or butt,
Obedience: for so work the honeybees;
Creatures that, by a rule in nature, teach
The art of order to a peopled kingdom.
They have a king and officers of sorts;
Where some, like magistrates, correct at home;
Others, like merchants, venture trade abroad;
Others, like soldiers, armed in their stings,
Make boot upon the summer's velvet buds;
Which pillage they with merry march bring home
To the tent-royal of their emperor;
Who, busied in his majesty, surveys
The singing masons building roofs of gold;
The civil citizens kneading up the honey;
The poor mechanic porters crowding in
Their heavy burdens at his narrow gate;
The sad-eyed Justice, with his early hum,
Delivering o'er to executors pale
The lazy, yawning drone.

WAR OF THE CYCLOPÆDIAS.

A Statement and a Challenge.

The California State Board of Education, at its last meeting, with but one dissenting vote, declared that Johnson's Cyclopædia was not sectarian. This action was taken by the Board in the face of the fact that the agent of D. Appleton & Co. had deluged the Board with communications from prominent Catholic clergymen and laymen, editorials from the Monitor, and legal opinions from their paid attorneys, in all of which the allegations were freely made that certain articles in Johnson's Cyclopædia were sectarian, and unfair to the Catholic Church in their treatment of its dogmas and history. The same Board, at the same meeting, on motion of Professor Allen, who openly declared Johnson's to be the better work of the two under consideration, voted to rescind a resolution passed at a previous meeting of the Board, recommending Johnson's Cyclopædia as the best obtainable book of reference for the Public Schools of the State. This strangely inconsistent action of the Board can only be attributed to the persistent importunity of Appleton's canvassers, and to want of backbone on the part of members of the Board, who are more anxious to secure political preferment than to maintain their consistency. This action of the State Board strikes the last prop from under the falling fortunes of Appleton's blighted and doomed Cyclopædia. D. Appleton & Co. have for months been endeavoring to prove that Johnson's Cyclopædia is sectarian. This was their last ditch, and the State Board has effectually buried them in it. I dare them to bring this question before the courts for their decision.

H. D. WATSON.

All who are interested in knowing which cyclopædia is the best will read the following challenge to D. Appleton & Co., or their agents on the coast, which, if accepted of which there is no probability, will permanently settle the question as to the value of a work which can now only be kept afloat by Catholic patronage. Let Appleton's people choose three scholars of well known, varied ability on the coast; I will choose three; the six to choose three more; and if this committee decide that Appleton's Cyclopædia is the best, I will pay $300 to any charitable institution the committee will designate, and publish their decision in all the papers in San Francisco at my own expense. If the decision is the other way, and Johnson's is declared the best, I require of the Appletons, or their hirelings, exactly the same conditions. If those interested in this ancient cyclopædia (ancient as compared to Johnson's) wish to trust their work to such a comparative examination as I propose, let them so state it in next Saturday's edition of this paper, or forever keep quiet about the superiority of a work of reference which I can furnish, bound in sheep, sixteen volumes, for $60, and make money, while its prices from the agents is $56; and I wish to say right here to every man or woman who is thinking of purchasing a cyclopædia, and likely to be enticed into buying either of the Appleton's cyclopædias by unscrupulous agents, that I will furnish the Condensed American Cyclopædia, a work in four volumes, selling by the agents for $35 in sheep, for $19 in the same binding. This is the work which D. Appleton & Co. hoped to head off Johnson's Cyclopædia, which had by its unprecedentedly low price and great excellence ruined the sale of their "Revised American." This condensed fraud was principally used to swindle teachers, and was sold to them for $5 down and $3 per month for eleven months. Easy terms, but two-thirds of all the teachers who subscribed for it repudiated their subscription to it upon finding out the character of the work; and I have in my possession several insulting letters from the agents of D. Appleton & Co. to refined ladies in this city, teachers in our public schools, who labor hard for their money, because they would not consent to be swindled. These letters I will publish when called upon. Please recollect now, all who read this, and tell your friends, that I will furnish Appleton's "Revised American Cyclopædia," in sixteen volumes, sheep, for $60; and see to it that you pay the agents no more, for both this work and Appleton's "Condensed American" are a drug in the East, as is evident by the prices at which I offer them to the public. Remember, that Johnson's Cyclopædia is now the standard work of reference for the schools of this city, and that the Classification Committee of the Board of Education were, after months of investigation and comparison, unanimously of the opinion that Johnson's was the best, and what little opposition the work received in the Board was entirely on the ground that the Catholics objected to the work. Please bear in mind also, that the Board of Education of our fair sister city across the bay have also adopted Johnson's work as the standard for the schools of their city, and that they were unanimous in this vote, as well as in the other ordering the "Appleton's now in use in our schools sold off, and Johnson's substituted." Johnson's Cyclopædia is found in eight as well as in four volumes, and is sold from $43 a set, upwards.

ARTHUR BIRD.

"Gif der Gheese a Vair Chance."

The man swaggered into a tidy lunch house over the Rhine, flopped into a chair, slapped his feet upon the table, shoved his hat on the back of his head, and called for beer, bread, and Linburger. The proprietor hustled around and filled the order himself.

The man picked up a bit of the cheese on a fork and smelled it derisively.

"Take that away," he said, "and bring me some decent cheese. It's Linburger I want—this is no good."

"What's de matter mit dot gheese, mine frinde? Vas id doo sdrong? I haff zoom dot vas vresher," said the German, anxious to please.

"Strong! Naw! That's what I want. This cheese is no 'count at all. I want something I can smell clear across the room. Trot it out, and be lively. This don't stink a bit—fetch in the rankest you've got. I've got a Dutch stomach, if I was born in America," and the man smelled at the cheese again, and threw it down in disgust.

The proprietor bowed over the table, and also sniffed a few times. He then turned an injured look on the capacious customer and persuasively said:

"Dot was not fair, mine frinde; dook down dem doots off der dable und gif de gheese a vair chance."

Iced Tea.

At twilight the other evening a thirsty citizen entered a new restaurant on Gratiot Avenue and inquired for iced tea. He was handed a glass of liquid which tasted like tea, but was almost warm enough or the table.

"I inquired for iced tea," he said, as he put down the glass.

"And you've got it," was the reply.

"Do you call this tea cold?" indignantly exclaimed the citizen.

The man tasted, smacked his lips, tasted again, and said:

"Well, it isn't very cold, but I can't afford to ice my tea every fifteen minutes, can I? I melted up at least ten pounds of ice and poured it into that jar at noon, and I don't see what ails it. Stand back and let me fan the tumbler with my hat!" —Detroit Free Press.

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNUAL FAIR
AT SACRAMENTO,
MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1878.

THE ABOVE FAIR OF THE STATE

Agricultural Society will commence at Sacramento on MONDAY, Sept. 16, 1878, and will continue to and include Saturday, Sept. 21. The attention of exhibitors is called to the Premium List, which is the most liberal ever issued in the State, presenting very attractive features. Every accommodation will be provided for exhibitors of all kinds. An abundance of motive power will be furnished, and every attention paid to the requirements of those desiring to exhibit products of their own handwork or otherwise. The artisans, artists, manufacturers, and mechanics of San Francisco, and all others interested in the development of the State, are particularly invited to display the result of their labors at the Fair. Every facility will be offered by the Central Pacific Railroad Company for free transportation of goods and articles to and from the Fair. Any further information can be obtained at the office of the President of the Society, Room No. 17, Phoenix Building, S. W. corner Jackson and Sansome Streets, San Francisco, or from Robert Beck, Secretary, at the Pavilion, Sacramento.

WHY SHOULD THE CHINESE GO?—II.

A Pertinent Inquiry from a Mandarin High in Authority.

PALACE HOTEL, August 2, 1878.

TO THE ARGONAUT:—In my last communication I showed that when, in the thirteenth century, China was superior to Europe in population, civilization, and arms, and that although she was able to, and did, march half a million of well equipped men to the shores of the Adriatic, she paused there out of respect for Christianity and the social progress of mankind, and led her vast hosts back to their distant homes without molesting the West. I showed, also, when, in the sixteenth century, these conditions of strength had become reversed—when China had become the weaker and Europe the stronger—what had use the latter made of its superiority, and how nothing short of rigorous exclusiveness on our part could have saved our country from being desolated by European arms and enslaved by European adventurers.

It will not do for you to claim that you Europeans had no intentions of this sort; for history would belie you. What was Columbus' objective point when he sailed to the West? Cathay, that far famed China, whose riches had been portrayed in the glowing pages of Marco Polo. To his dying day the great Captain supposed the shores of Hispaniola were those of Cathay, and that he had only to explore farther in order to reach the civilized portion of that vast empire. What land did the Spaniards suppose they were upon when they ravaged the Mexican Empire? China. It was always China of which you were in search, and had you found it there can be no doubt that you would have despoiled it as you despoiled the lands which you mistook for it.

Nor will it do for you Americans to claim exemption from reproach on the ground that these atrocious transactions were the work of other nations than your own. You are all as one nation in your attitude toward China. When one of you obtains a concession from the Imperial Government, no matter how unjustly—witness the treaties after the wars of 1842 and 1858—the others are sure to demand similar concessions.

When one of you gains an advantage from us, the others are certain to claim a similar advantage. Because the Portuguese obtained a footing at Macao, the British must have the Island of Hongkong. When any misfortune happens to us, you are all so eager to profit by it that you stand by one another as a single body. Thus, when the Taiping rebellion threatened to subvert the Empire, your war-ships all swung coldly at their anchorages in our harbors, like so many vultures waiting for their prey to expire; and so far from offering to help us, you helped the rebels. More than this, you took advantage of the occasion to make war upon us. I do not blame you; I merely state a fact. You are united by the bonds of a religion which you fancy to be the source of your greatness, and to be filled with the promise of more. The Spanish conquistadores used to carry the symbol of this faith in front of their armies; modern Europe more discreetly smuggles it into the "most favored nation" clause of its treaties with China.

The inferiority of our arms to yours at the period of our early maritime intercourse is evinced, not only by the easy fall of Malacca, but also by the fact that, chief among the goods we used to purchase of you, were European muskets. It is also proved during the bombardment of our ports in the opium war, when the British found our batteries to contain only cast-iron three-pounders, and sometimes only representations of guns painted on canvases.

When we came to acquire a knowledge of European arms, and the way to make them, the fear of invasion and subjection became lessened; but it has never wholly passed away, nor can it pass away until China wholly emerges from that feudal condition in which she still lingers. This condition is one of great peril to her imperial autonomy. The efforts of the central government have to be continually exercised to keep the great feudatories in subjection. When I state that there are lords in China who own greater domains, and are more wealthy, than any individual in Christendom, whilst the people are extremely poor, you will understand me. For instance, when Prince Keshen was condemned in 1841 for having suffered defeat in the opium war, there was confiscated of his property $7,500,000 in gold, $2,667,000 in silver, and other goods worth still more—in all about $25,000,000 worth. A country whose lords are thus rich is easily subdued. Her millions of soldiers count for nothing, because they belong to the feudatories, and these may be easily divided by a crafty foe. Witness the operations of Cortes in Mexico and Clive in India.

From these facts and considerations; from the absence on our part of hostility toward European civilization, as evinced by our forbearance toward you when, in the thirteenth century, we were the stronger; from the existence on your part of hostility toward our civilization, as evinced by the bad use you made of your superiority when, in the sixteenth century, you had become the stronger; from the feudal condition of our empire and the fear entertained by our government even now, when our weapons are the same as yours, that China may be conquered and reduced by you as have been Mexico, Peru, and India—from these facts and considerations, I say, we would much prefer to have no dealings you; we would rather close our ports and maintain a policy of entire isolation from the European world.

The trouble with Europe, however, is that such a policy would not suit its interests. You desire to possess every conceivable privilege of trade, residence, religion, etc., for Americans in China, whilst you would deny all of them to Chinamen in America. And this brings us directly to the Chinese question in California.

Let it be fully understood at the outset that we Chinese have never sought to obtain leave for our people to live in your countries, except as a counterpoise to a similar permission first sought on your part,

Nearly two thousand years before a Chinaman ever settled in Europe, Europeans settled in China. Not only this—they were protected in their persons, their property, and their religion. Furthermore, the Emperor, Tienpan, went so far as to build a Christian church for Olophen and order it to be supported out of the public coffers. And this was five hundred years before Christianity was introduced even into some parts of Europe—for example, Russia.

When the elder Polos visited us, we treated them well. They remained with us for more than fifteen years, and then departed freely, carrying away great wealth. When Marco Polo came, he was similarly treated. He remained twenty years, and when he departed, which he did at his own request, he was loaded with presents and other favors. During all this time we sent none of our people to Europe. It was you always that sought permission to dwell with us, whilst we never came to you. And observe what you gained by it. You took from us the inventions of the mariners' compass, sails for ships, rudders, gunpowder, paper, printing, and many other useful things. All these came to you from China, either by the hands of the Arabs, or, later on, with the expeditions of Genghis Khan or Batu Kahn, or through the Polos; for these inventions were not known to Europe in the Middle Ages, while they had been long used in our country.

When, at a later period, the western nations made their way to our ports, it was they who came to us and sought permission for their merchants and artisans to dwell among us, not we who desired to send colonists to you. The whole burden of the negotiations sought by European nations with the Imperial Court has been—permission to live in China. In these negotiations, Americans have ever been foremost. You sent Mr. Caleb Cushing to us in 1844, Mr. Reed in 1858, and Mr. Burlingame in 1867. When the last-named gentleman resigned from your diplomatic service to enter ours, and effected the treaty that goes by his name, he was rewarded by you for his part in the transaction with the highest encomiums and the warmest welcome.

Let me read you two or three clauses from this treaty.

Article VI. guarantees every privilege and complete protection to Americans in China, and this is carried so far that Article I. forbids the employment of the foreign establishments on the coast of China—for example, the Portuguese establishment at Macao, the British island of Hongkong, etc.—as a means of aggression against the United States; in case of a war between that country and Portugal, or Great Britain, etc.

Article IV. grants entire freedom of religion, protection of sepulture, etc. And Article VII. the right to establish their own schools, etc. to Americans in China.

Article VI. confers equal rights upon Chinamen in the United States. Under these articles a numerous body of your citizens have established themselves in China, possessed themselves of the coasting trade, and many other branches of navigation and traffic, and thus deprived thousands of Chinamen of employment. The complaints of these poor people are not conveyed to you; because our government has too much respect for its treaty obligations to permit you to be annoyed with any expression of regret concerning the working of its compacts with you. On the other hand, while the profits of which the Chinese coast and river junk trade have been deprived, by American steamers, go to swell the dividends of your navigation companies and afford employment to your maritime classes, your shipbuilders, and your machinists, your newspapers are filled and your halls of legislation resound, with outcries against Chinese labor in America.

Thus it appears that the United States maintains precisely the same position in respect to China as the other European nations do. You all desire to possess advantages in China, which, at the same time, you would deny to Chinamen in America. You have bombarded our ports and forced us into an unwilling commerce with you, which now you desire shall be entirely one-sided. Your reason for this unfairness is not a sordid one. You are clear-headed enough to perceive that the benefit to commercial intercourse cannot be unilateral. But you fancy that the advantages of social intercourse may be monopolized by one party. You will not permit us to shut ourselves up. You demand every privilege for Americans in China, but you would deny the same privileges to Chinamen in America, because, in your opinion, the presence of the Chinese amongst us is a menace to your civilization. You shrink from contact with us, not because you regard us as mentally or bodily inferior—for neither fact nor argument will support you here—but rather because our religious code appears to be different from yours, and because we are deemed to be more abstemious in food, clothing, and shelter.

If our religious forms, our daily bill of fare, and our demands for wages were the same as yours, it would be difficult to see what grievance, either real or fanciful, you would have to complain about. Since you profess in your political constitution, your pulpit declamations, and, more than all, in your manner of living, that you are not bigoted and care nothing for religious forms, the menace to your civilization appears to resolve itself into a fear of losing your accustomed roast beef, white shirt-collars, and carpeted houses. It is a menace to the sensual indulgences to which you have been accustomed during the last three centuries—that is to say, since the opening of sea trade to the Orient.

There is a significance in this coincidence, to which, in another place I shall have occasion to allude more fully. Meanwhile, let us agree upon the grounds of your hostility to the Chinese in California. I say it is chiefly the fear of having to descend (as you would regard it) to your notion of the Chinese level of subsistence—rice, one suit of clothes, and bare walls. This is the substance of your 1300-page Report of the Joint Special Committee to investigate Chinese Emigration. If it is anything else, I shall be glad to shift the issue with you.

Treating this as the essence of the Chinese question, let us see what there is in it. Substantially, Asia desires seclusion from the European world; substantially, Europe desires commerce with Asia. In India this commerce is carried on by force. In China and Japan, because you cannot employ force, you desire to so arrange it that, while the commercial benefits may be mutual, the social advantages, as you regard them, may all be on your side. You insist upon trade with China, but you want no contact with her people, for fear of their pagan influence and their economical mode of living. Can you be gratified in both respects? Impossible.

The same God that made you, made us; the same inexorable laws of nature that govern you, govern us. Foremost among these laws is that of gravitation. When a substance falls to the earth, the earth rises at the same time to the substance. All action and reaction are reciprocal. This law holds good throughout the physical world; it also holds good throughout the moral and political world. Nature forbids one-sided arrangements. If you must trade with China, you must come in contact with Chinamen and be subjected to the influence of Chinese morality and Chinese civilization. The influence may be small, may be remote, may be inappreciable—as is the rise of the earth toward falling substances—but it must take place, and neither you nor we can help it. You may drive us out of California, but we shall influence your social affairs all the same. The goods that we now manufacture in San Francisco will be fabricated in Canton; and, no matter how high you may raise your tariff, you will walk in Canton shoes, wear Canton shirts, smoke Canton cigars, and shoot each other with Canton revolvers and gunpowder; for we can make all of them cheaper than you can.

If you have debauched us with opium, we have got even with you by acquiring your mechanical arts; and henceforth, unless Europe and Asia shall fall back upon a now impossible scheme of strict non-intercourse, their fortunes must go together. If, as you believe, your civilization is superior to ours, it will have to fall a little in order that ours may rise a great deal; and this must take place whether the few Chinese now in California shall remain or not. It is God's law, and can not be averted. It is the means by which He has and will continue to slowly knit together the diverse threads of all human life.

In my next and final letter I propose to show how mistaken you are in regarding your civilization as, on the whole, superior to ours; and, on the contrary, how much your civilization owes to ours, and how rapidly it would decay without the support which our civilization affords it, even at the present time. After this I will endeavor to draw a picture of what California would be were the Chinese driven from it, and to justify this delineation will refer to the expulsion of the Moors from Spain and the Chinese from Manila. And when I shall have done this, I will rest my case.

Let me in this place, however, endeavor to correct one great misapprehension in respect to the Chinaman. You are continually objecting to his morality. Your travelers say he is depraved; your missionaries call him ungodly; your commissioners call him uncleanly; and your sans culottes call him everything that is vile. Yet your housewives permit him to wait upon them at table; they admit him to their bed-chambers; they confide to him their garments and jewels; and even trust their lives to him, by awarding him supreme control over their kitchens and the preparation of their food. There is a glaring contradiction here.

The plain truth is, that what you have regarded as evidences of immorality and depravity are simply evidences of indigence and misery. China is in a feudal condition. Her nobles are enormously rich and powerful; her peasants are extremely poor and wretched. The unpleasant things which your travelers and missionaries have observed in China, are not common to Chinamen. They have never been observed in connection with rich Chinamen. They are peculiar only to poverty. They belong to the miserable—to the miserable of all countries. What Mr. Griffis, in his recent chapter on the "Heart of Japan," says of that country, is true also of China: the peasantry are very poor. The nakedness of the towns, of the houses, of the people, their scant fare, their degradation—which were only to be fully perceived when he reached the interior of the country—made him exclaim, with disappointment: "I began to realize the utter poverty and wretchedness of the people and the country of Japan" (p. 415). Yet everywhere he found some education and abundance of good nature (p. 420).

It is the same in China. The nobles are the richest in the world; the peasants are the poorest. What little of the latter's habits and surroundings has proved repulsive to Occidental eyes, is the result, not of inferior morality, but of inferior wealth. The European peasant was in the same condition three centuries ago, and in some countries—for example, Russia, Eastern Germany, Roumania, Ireland, and parts of Italy and Portugal—he is very nearly in a similar condition to-day. Yet you not only tolerate him in America, you share with him your political privileges; you admit him to social communion; he is your brother; while the poor Chinaman you would drive away with blows and contumely. What if it should appear that, after all, there was nothing defensible beneath your hatred of Chinamen but ignorance and religious bigotry? Where would then stand the bases of your vaunted civilization?

The slender fare of rice and the other economical habits of the peasant class, which are so objectionable to your lower orders and the demagogues who trumpet their clamors, are not the result of choice to Chinamen; they follow poverty. The hard-working, patient, servants you have about you to-day, love good fare as well as other men, but they are engaged in a work far higher than the gratification of self-indulgence; they are working to liberate their parents in China from the thralldom of feudal vilenage, and so long as their labor continues to strike off the fetters from their beloved ones will they continue to practice their noble self-abnegation. When this emancipation is complete, you will find the Chinaman as prone as any human being to belly and cover his back with good things. KWAN.

JACK AND JILL.

Adapted for the Argonaut, from Mother Goose, without Permission.

"It's the very thing," cried Jill, exultantly.

And while she is leaning back in her own easy rocking-chair, building any amount of lofty air-castles, let me tell you just how it was.

Jack and Jill lived in a charming little house in a lovely location, not too far out of town—just right, in fact. And they lived in a delightfully comfortable way—which means that they were not rich. They went to all the places of amusement, and had nice little suppers and charming drives in Jill's own trim phaeton.

And they had a good many pleasant friends. What more could anybody ask? But Jill was an ambitious little woman, and Jack—well, Jack was led mildly around, without feeling the thread which pulled him this way or that. Men are such moles, aren't they?

His mother lived with them. She was a person whom Mr. Sparkler would have immediately identified as "a doctored fine woman, with no nonsense about her." She accepted her son's alienation, her daughter's ambition, and their combined, careless, selfish affection, with the God-given patience mothers have.

It is a bitter law of Nature that bids the children we have nourished and trained push us aside as soon as their wings have been tried, with much the indifference of the insect toward the chrysalis-shell from which it has just emerged. And yet I presume it would be unorthodox to say that the selfish animal instinct overbalances the soul-power when it comes to life questions and life struggles.

Jack's mother accepted the inevitable, shouldering the dependent, unsatisfactory existence which was, after all, Hobson's choice with her, and shipping from Jill's plump shoulders to her own all the cares of the household.

For, as I have said before, Jill was ambitious, and as Jack crept slowly up the business ladder she looked longingly at the social stairway whose highest step is the ultima thule of every feminine aspiration.

Almost imperceptibly their modest little house enlarged and beautified, and "gentle folked," as poor old Jo Gargery would say, and the occupants kept pace with the progress. But, after all, their society was not society with a big S.

Jill's "evenings" had not blossomed into "receptions" and "kettle-drums," and had no place in the "social gossip" column of the newspapers. She knew well enough who were our "best people"—what they did, where they went, and what they wore.

She had friends who had friends who were within the charmed circle. She saw women not so clever or well-to-do in the world as she, who moved side by side with bonanza kings and queens, and her heart grew bitter within her. Jack, too, began to feel a small thrill of discontent. He was proud of his pretty wife, his comfortable home, and his self-won success. The spread-eagle doctrine began to permeate his mental system.

"I'm as good as anybody, now that I'm rich."

That's about the way it reads, I believe. So it was easy for Jill to go on with her plans for conquest, and she drew them up like a skillful general. But soldier and diplomatist must bend alike to the power cycled Mrs. Grundy; and so this small woman found to her cost.

After all, it was impossible to enter the magic gate without a passport, and that passport Jill had not quite money enough to buy.

She cultivated everybody she thought would be able to help her. She even fished for invitations. She courted introductions to great folk; but still found herself outside. Mrs. Carbuncle had not called, Mrs. Hye Tyde had not bidden her to one of her feasts, and poor Jill was ready to cry her eyes out with vexation.

She had become a monomaniac on the subject. She was growing pale and anxious. She laid awake all night, and plotted, and planned; three tiny wrinkles crept into her smooth forehead. It was laughable, and yet it was pitiful. If you think I exaggerate, go into almost any of our middle-class homes and you will find Jill's counterpart, in ambition at least.

It is one of the curses of our country and age, this desire to creep, or push, or beg a way into a circle a little higher. Not that we may be improved or refined thereby—for the world of letters is a terra incognita to most of our true society people—but because—well, who can say? It's a sort of conundrum, you see—and I, for one, gave it up long ago.

Jack's mother looked on at this little comedy of errors with silent disapproval. Once or twice she did venture a mild remonstrance, but pough! who ever followed a mother-in-law's advice?

Jack and Jill had started on their journey, and "all the king's horses and all the king's men" could not turn them back. For just as Jill was beginning to be discouraged there came a letter from old Aunt Penryn. Don't tell me it was chance, for I know better.

Aunt Penryn was the Grand Panjandrum of the family—a sort of female Midas who turned everything she touched to gold, but, unlike that narrow-headed hero of mythology, she did not have it turned back again.

She was a selfish, penurious, withered old sinner, who looked on poor people with the indifference of one born in the purple. She had always snubbed Jack's mother, and alternately petted and patronized Jack, and when that young gentleman got married she sent him a weak-legged pair of sugar-tongs and her blessing. I hesitate to say which was worth the most.

But there was always a feeling of awe in the family when her name was mentioned. Secretly, Jill was certain she would leave all her money to Jack, but she never confessed this hope to him.

Now, however, Aunt Penryn had absolutely written to say that she was coming to town for a few days, and would be pleased to have them call on her. Then it was that Jill uttered the mysterious sentence which begins my story. Then it was a project so brilliant flashed into her mind it almost took her breath. Perhaps Aunt Penryn intended her letter to produce that result. At any rate, Jill resolved to ask her to make their house her home during her stay in the city, etc. etc. etc. I don't know what a nice little letter Jill can write when she comes, for she reasoned in this way:

"If she comes here all her friends will call, and they will ask to see me, and Jack and I will be included in her invitations," and with that she gave her head a toss. Do you remember the story of the milk-maid, my friends? It was in "Webster's Spelling Book," and was a very pretty story indeed. But the time had not yet come for the upsetting of the pail, so Jill went on with her meditations unchecked.

Jack laughed when she made known her plans to him, and said: "Well, do as you like. Aunt Pen is a pretty tough customer, though. I'm afraid you'll repent before her visit is over." Jack's mother only looked a little troubled. "If you can manage it, no doubt it will be very pleasant for you." Well, all this was not exactly condemning her plans, and yet Jill felt that she must shoulder the responsibility alone. Perhaps her invitation would not be accepted. At any rate, it was only right they should be civil to the poor old lady. So she talked to herself.

You know how we all put our consciences away on the upper shelf of the darkest closet sometimes. But the very next day came a letter from Aunt Pen, saying she would be "very happy." So the plunge was made. Then Jill began to think the furniture in the blue room rather passé, and lest Aunt Pen might think they were not able to afford new she had stupid upholsterer's men tramping in and out for a week doing much more damage than good. Really, the house was in apple-pie order before, but now there must be an extra cleaning, lest Aunt Pen might think her a poor housekeeper. And Jack's mother submitted even to this. We, who know all about it, know that she watched over the whole household, made the puddings Jack liked, mended and stitched, and saw that everything came out even, for these good people were not so rich but that willful waste might make woeful want.

But those who take to themselves the credit of good deeds generally get the praise. "Set down your value at your own high rate, the world will pay it." Certainly it was so in the house that Jack built. Well, the eventful day at last arrived. Aunt Penryn came, was welcomed, and installed in her comfortable quarters.

Jill was agreeably disappointed: in fact, she quite felt in love with the old lady, for Aunt Pen was delighted with everything, and admired everything, from the Maltese cat up to the weather-vane. A disinterested observer would have said she was too enthusiastic, but Jill was too happy in the receipt of such praise to be critical, and it all turned out just as she had anticipated.

She shone in Aunt Pen's reflected glory; she went out shopping in carriages which Jack hired—for Aunt Pen could not, or would not ride on the street cars, and said so many contemptuous things of the people who did that, Jill was ashamed to confess herself of the mob. Mrs. Hye Tyde had sent in cards to her as well as to Aunt Pen, and given them all invitations for her next "Thursday."

All, did I say? Well, all but Jack's mother. Of course, she didn't care to go any way, though she was younger and oh, ever so much prettier than Aunt Pen, but Mrs. Hye Tyde didn't know she existed and Jill forgot to tell her; we won't say she was ashamed, that would sound too bad.

Jill had to have her wardrobe replenished to enter properly into all these gayeties, and Aunt Pen's caprices, whose other name was legion, doubled up the monthly expenses frightfully, but still it was very pleasant to meet all these stately swans and to feel that she was sailing in the same pond with them—in fact, was quite one of them. Of course, she wasn't one really, she was only a silly little goose, but she arched her neck and stretched it out so that it did pretty well.

Her old neighbors and friends were not quite forgotten; indeed, I think her chief pleasure arose from the recital of her successes and the pangs of envy which she knew she created.

But her patronizing airs were really quite ridiculous, and as her visiting list gained names at one end it lost at the other. Her former acquaintance seemed to rival each other in praising her to her face and abusing her behind her back, and her new friends patronized, and snubbed, and forgot her by turns, but still were gracious enough to warrant her clinging to them.

Patronizing, and snubbing, and forgetting have been reduced to fine arts by fine people.

The thick-skinned adventurers who make their living from their patrons don't seem to mind; but Jill was not thick-skinned, and she quivered and winced under these needle thrusts; but the Spartan boy was a humbug to this small, but plucky, woman, and—she smiled and held on.

Meanwhile Aunt Penryn was having "lots of fun and nothing to pay"—as the street gamins would say—and that was very pleasant.

In the beginning of her visit Jill had opened all her heart to her. "Aunt Pen was so sympathetic, and it was so nice to be with some one who understood you." She even indulged in some very ill-natured remarks about Jack's mother, at which Aunt Pen laughed wickedly, and that incited her to do the same thing again. Her conscience was shut up so tight now that it could not even kick, so everything went on merrily. But by and by Jill found that Aunt Pen would forget to listen when she told some neat little story, or would break ruthlessly in and interrupt. The same indomitable old lady would also disarrange the whole household with some plan for visiting or sightseeing, and then forget to start, or conclude to do something else.

She flattered Jill by wanting to have clothes, jewelry, or furniture like hers. "I must really get a wrap just like yours, to-morrow," she would cry, but before the purchase was made would see some other style and make that her model. So Jill began slowly to understand what Jack meant when he said his aunt was a "tough old visitor," but the worst of all was that Jill began to fear her trouble would be unrewarded.

She was quick enough to see that her "carriage acquaintance" would be pretty apt to drop her entirely when her guest was gone unless she made herself more conspicuous. Sometimes notoriety will accomplish what patience fails to secure. So, after much laborious thinking, and many consultations with Jack, she resolved to give a party—not a "musical," or a "kettle-drum," but a real "crush ball."

Perhaps you never gave one, so you don't know what it means. It meant, in Jack's house, that a temporary dancing-room had to be built on, and the furniture taken out of one room and put into another. Everybody was made uncomfortable for a week beforehand; it was worse than a moving. The place was thronged with trades people of all sorts.

Strange servants had to be brought in, who smashed furniture and fine china with charming alacrity, but whose accomplishments evidently went no further.

Jill had seized the time for her "crush" when Jack's mother was on a visit to some country friends, because she felt a little uncomfortable in the knowledge of that good woman's disapproval.

Now she missed the house-mother sadly. She had taken so little care heretofore, that it came with added weight in this emergency. The excitement and anxiety unstrung her nerves, and the regrets of several of the most distinguished guests finished the business.

When the night of the party came she was almost crazy with a furious sick headache. In the old days she would have gone to bed and been soothed by tender hands, but now she must keep up, come what might.

She had lost her self-possession early in the day, and had given up everything to the restaurateur and his myrmidons, to the florist and all the rest of the aids to such a hospitality; but they hunted her down and wanted this or that unprocureable thing until she was almost wild.

Aunt Pen had left the house with the first symptoms of chaos. She "could not be disturbed by such confusion," so she pleaded an engagement to Mrs. Goldnote and turned her back on the preparations in her honor.

The dressmaker did not send Jill's dress until the last minute, and then it was so ill-fitting that it could not be worn, and she had to put on an old one. The hairdresser experimented, and produced a result more startling than becoming, while half a dozen hair-pins stuck straight into the poor, aching head all the evening.

Jill had found, when she made out her list, that her fashionable acquaintance would by no means fill her house, so she took the upper stratum of her old friends and sandwiched them in, with many misgivings, it is true, but trusting to good-fortune and her own tact to make things pass off smoothly. The result may be anticipated.

To be sure, the dancing people did their duty, but there was no mixing such discordant elements. One might have supposed that a league had been formed to crush any interchange of civilities.

Poor Jill, with her head splitting and a very white face, went around smiling, and tried to do her duty, but her efforts were unavailing.

Mrs. Hye Tyde went home before supper. That was the bitterest draught.

And the supper—well, the less said of it the better. It was a pity that Jill had taken a streak of economy when it came to that part of the programme; but she had, being impelled thereto by Jack's growls of discontent. Well, there had been a little tiff with the all-potent French gentleman who was king of the cuisine, and the result was easy to foresee again. Revenge was easy, and revenge was sweet.

The supper was unduly delayed, to begin with, and was all insufficient, to end with. Jack and Jill heard various murmurs of dissatisfaction, and saw motions of scarcely concealed contempt; but the liquors were profuse, and good—of their kind. Jack had attended to that. And the gay young gentlemen, making up for the lack of solids, grew gayer as the night wore on. Some, in fact, were a little boisterous, and had to be smuggled out at side-doors.

Jill was ready to die with mortification. She began to hate them all. Would they never go? Of course, even the last lingerer dropped away after a while. Everybody came up and simpered:

"Good-night; we've had such a delightful evening."

And poor Jill smiled a ghastly smile, and murmured:

"Going?—so soon?"

And finally they were all really and truly gone, and then Jill crept up stairs, and went into hysterics for the first—and last—time in her life.

She could not come down stairs that day, nor the next, nor the next, nor for a week.

In the meantime old Aunt Penryn sent for her trunks and came one day, ostensibly to say good-bye, but I don't believe she said it after all, for she spent the whole time telling Jill all the disagreeable things she had heard said, supplemented by all the disagreeable things she could think of herself, winding up with a little advice.

"It's positively no use for you to try to go into good society; not yet awhile at any rate, unless Jack should get very wealthy, and that's not possible while you're so extravagant. You might get along with fewer servants. I did think of putting Jack in charge of those mills of mine up country, but am afraid he's growing reckless. Mr. Garnet tells me he has been speculating deeply in stocks, and that won't do you know. I only tell you this for your own good," she went on, piously, while poor Jill withered under the tongue-lashing. She was conscience-stricken, else she would have given the old lady a Roland for her Oliver.

And by and by the servants came to tell her that one of her new hall statues, bought at the instigation of Aunt Pen, and Mrs. Comstock, had been thrown down and shattered by a too energetic dancer.

Well, Jack's mother came home and straightened out the household tangle and waited on Jill, and—never said a word, but that was only an aggravation.

Jack came and went, and tried to be jolly, but it was easy to see that he was driven hard. He was getting irritable and impatient, too.

Aunt Pen's visit set Jill back another week. She was not seriously ill, only weak and good-for-nothing. It was the reaction from her gayeties. She had got to the top of the hill and had drawn the coveted pail of water, but when she tumbled down it splashed all over her, and washed away her heart-burning, and envy, and ambition. She had time to think it all over lying there so long.

Jack's mother drew the story of all his embarrassments from him in some mysterious way that only mothers know.

It was worse than they thought; but by and by, when they had all talked it over together, it seemed to grow lighter, as burdens shared always do. And Jill herself proposed to sell their house and live any way for a little while until they could do better; though it was a cross to give up everything—not at first, perhaps; it is so easy to plunge into a big sacrifice, but the little stings of mortified pride, and the loss of daily conveniences, the small hurts were hard to bear.

But by the time summer came, as Jill was still weak, they went off with half a dozen good friends down the coast, camping. A few months before Jill would have scorned such a plebeian pleasure-trip; indeed, she had planned to go to White Sulphur, where she could bask in the halo of the social planets; and she even ventured to think of herself as a very pretty little satellite; but that was all over now. I confess that, as she grew stronger, she felt pangs of worldliness occasionally. "When the devil was sick"—you know the rest.

But she had long, serious conversations with the trees, and the hills, and the sea, and they all told her the same story of something better than fine feathers and fine cages. She was getting frightened about Jack. Aunt Pen. told the truth. He was growing reckless. And when they went home—like the good girl that she was—she set herself to work undoing all she had done; and, in trying to help Jack, did herself much good.

This sounds highly moral and—improbable; but, once in a century or so, a stray reformer does manage to turn over a new leaf which is not quite like the old. It was hard work; but, as I have said before, Jill had a good deal of what people vaguely call "character;" so she worked out her own salvation, and Jack's too, in slow but resolute fashion.

Perhaps you've already surmised that Aunt Pen. has never left them any money; in fact, I don't think she will ever die; but they don't care much now, and have ceased to speculate on the amount of her fortune.

And Jack's mother stays on and on, and takes care of the children as they come, and is truly thankful, poor soul, for what she receives in the way of stray kindnesses and "daily bread." And—that's all, I believe, except that Jill had her broken statuette pieced together again, and keeps it as a sort of mortification to the flesh whenever she feels a longing for the flesh-pots of Egypt, and as a reminder of her struggles up the hill of "Good Society."

BELMONT, August 4, 1878.

More of Special Education.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—I perused, with much interest, an article in a late number of the ARGONAUT, commending the action of the Board of School Directors, dropping some of the special teachers of language, whereby the city will henceforth be saved an annual expenditure of $7,000. I concur most heartily with you in your ideas with reference to these matters. I protest against the instruction of accomplishments in our public schools, upon the ground that three-fourths of the pupils are children of poor parents, and necessity compels them to leave school at an early age. This is particularly the case with our boys, many of whom are obliged to enter the lists and begin the battle of life before having completed a grammar school course. What utter folly it is then to waste their precious time in the study of empty accomplishments, whose value to them in after years is simply infinitesimal! How much more sensible it were to instruct them thoroughly in such branches which will be of material assistance to them in their efforts to gain a livelihood, instead of frittering away hour upon hour, and having nothing in the end but a smattering of foreign languages, drawing and music, and still less knowledge of the common rudiments of an English education. Now that the directors have begun the good work of reform and economy, let them not stop until they have dispensed with more of these unnecessary evils, these special teachers, who are drawing heavily upon the tax-payers' money, and who in return are giving little or no service. In connection with this subject allow me to call your attention, Mr. Editor, to a few facts in regard to the music supposed to be taught entirely by special teachers, whose salaries amount annually to over $10,000. In the first place, a Principal of Music is employed at $200 per month, whose duty is to superintend the instruction of that accomplishment, in order to do which he must visit the different schools, not occasionally, but frequently, to discover whether the work is being carried on properly and efficiently. Such being the case, the following query is pertinent: Why does he confine all his time and attention to some schools in particular, to the complete neglect of others? One of the largest schools in this city has not been visited by this man for more than a year, but has been left entirely to the mercy of his assistants; and oh, Mr. Editor, such assistants. One whom I now recall, and who evidently hails from the Green Isle, in his fruitless efforts to instill the rudiments of music into the youthful mind, addresses the pupils in a brogue so utterly unintelligible at times that one is at a loss to determine whether he is instructing in his native Irish or not. In the study of a foreign language a good accent is certainly a most essential requirement, and is one of the first things to be acquired, but I fancy that parents are not particularly desirous of having their children learn to sing with a brogue. Another assistant is employed, whose position was never bestowed upon her because of her ability to sing, neither for her tact in imparting the extremely small amount of knowledge she possesses of the branch she pretends to teach, and for which overwhelming (?) labor she is remunerated with the very handsome salary of $125 per month. Shall I term it instruction or merely repetition when some of the lower grades under the supervision of this special teacher have not been taught by her anything in the shape of a little song for months and months past? Children grow weary of repetition; it becomes monotonous and uninteresting, and they are ever on the qui vive for some novelty. Mr. Editor, in our primary schools the regular teacher does the work, and I do most emphatically assert that, without her continued efforts, the pupils would gain little or no knowledge of music. If music must be taught, our class teachers are able and willing to do so in the future as they have ever done in the past. The special teacher, who receives $1,500 per annum, is regarded merely as a visitor (and a very intrusive one sometimes), who calls occasionally to listen, and to comment, upon the work accomplished by the class teacher, who is paid, in some instances, but half the salary of the more favored special. School directors, do not weary with well doing; investigate these matters, and you will find that you can easily dispense with some of these special teachers, without any loss whatever to the children, and with considerable gain to your funds. But enough of the music question at present.

Yours, truly,

R. G. D.

ON SHADOW LAKE.

BY MAY N. HAWLEY.

Nestled among Sierra's minarets,
Blue, ragged peaks, and breezy wooded slopes,
Where the wind whispers to the pines in tropes
Of musical despair—alternate hopes—
A long blue line of lake shines through the line of nets
Of inflamed branches on its wild, steep shore.
All day the restless aspen shakes before
The cool, fresh wind; the tamaracks fling plumes
Of dark, rich fragrance downward to the spumes
From foam-crests flecking the incoming sweep
Of plangent waves against their feet; the steep,
Grim, granite mountains throw the shores in shade,
Save when the sun sails in high majesty
Through the broad track of noon. Then shadows fade
And melt into the cool, dark wood, till day
Softly from Shadow Lake is chased away.

Deep in the fragrant wood, in days of old,
Before the land was stricken in the quest
For the rich treasure of its hidden gold,
There dwelt two roving princes of the west—
Princes, in that they twain might have possessed
The princeliest realm of the Sierra's land;
And, undisputed then, their claims might stand,
Since they alone had cared to claim the vast
Pure-templed wood in those days of the past.

They came together on the lone lake's shore—
Glancing with questant eyes each other o'er,
Unused to meeting strangers in the wood.
One dark, the other fair; both of proud blood—
Castilian—strong, unfettered, unrestrained,
The fairest smiled. "Friend," said he, "I have gained
This spot by chance. If thou with solitude
Prefer to share, I leave to thee this wood."

"Nay," said the other, frankly, "we will be
Two princes of one royal family,
And share the throne between us. I am he Men call De Castro. Who art thou, O Prince?"
The fair one answered, merrily: "Ay, since
Thy whim is for a title, mine shall be
The Prince Delgado. Surely, royalty
Ne'er had less cares of state than thine and mine.
Thy hand, O Prince! and this lake holds the wine
Spilled on our coronation"—stooping down
To lift the water in his hollowed hand
And shower it, diamond-like, upon them both.
Then, clasping hands an instant—nothing loth,
They wandered up the green aisles of the wood,
And left the blue lake to its solitude.

Thereafter, sounded through the mystic pines,
Through groves of cottonwood and tamarack,
The whirl of startled wings and the sharp crack
Of death-aimed guns; the rabbit, at such times,
Pausing one palpitant instant to look back,
Laid slender ears against his neck and flew
With light leaps through the wood. The startled deer,
With heads upflung, moist from the streamlet clear
Beneath their muzzles, heard the sound and knew
Death-warrant's future seal, and trembling fled
Deeper within the forest. Through the night
The broad red glare from the camp-fire was shed
Out on the black flood of the lake, where stars
With lustrous fire shivered into light;
And the pale moon-beams crossed the lake in bars
Between the pines dark stems. Delgado wrought,
Fleetly and skilled, a graceful, slender boat,
Rounded and shapen with an art which sought
To make most perfect work. It lay afloat
Upon the bosom of the lake at last,
Fitted with oars and one tall slender mast,
To which a sail clung, fluttering in the wind—
Bought from some Indians straying through the land.
The light thing answered to Delgado's hand,
And through rich days in dreaminess of mind
They floated with the breeze, or idly tried
To count the pebbles in some shallow, where
The speckled trout unfeigningly would glide
Beneath the sunlit waters heaving there.

There came one day to that secluded shore
One whom Delgado named Princess Inore;
Her friends attendant begged the right to stay
For rest from travel by the lake a day;
It might be more, for they had come from far
And were weary. So Delgado said,
Kindly and courteously, with bended head:
"Most welcome, friends! All that we have is thine!"
De Castro silent stood and made no sign—
Save when Inore thanked his friend graciously,
Pleased with his fair face and his courtesy.

The day of rest was lengthened into two,
Those two into a week, and the week grew
Into the semblance of a month, and still Inore had lingered by the lake until
The sweet midsummer threatened to be gone.
The days with magic splendor, one by one,
Rose from beyond the line of dim blue hills,
Filled to the doming sky, failed to the west,
And slipped from sight as twilight, from its rest,
Flung to the breeze the essence night distills.

Through the cool woods De Castro and Inore
Wandered in golden afternoons; she knew
His passionate regard led him to woo
And win her, distant from the blue lake's shore
Where his fair rival waited their return.
Vain was his care; love never can unlearn
The spells it caught in weaving subtle nets
To snare the human heart. De Castro brought Wild flowers to deck her flowing midnight hair,
Strings of red berries for her round arms and her bare
Brown throat and bosom; eagerly he sought
The richest treasures of the wood to find,
And poured them at her feet; he could not bind
To his her gentle heart, yet that she feared
To rouse the evil in his breast she said
No word by which he deemed himself endeared,
Nor any word lest he had wished her dead.

At eventide she floated on the lake
In the white boat steered by Delgado's hand,
The while De Castro watched them from the land
With sullen brows and folded arms. What time
The silver waters parted in the wake
Of the swift boat her light laugh floated out,
And all her heart was buoyant as with wine.
The fair, frank Prince Delgado had no doubt
To mar their pleasure. Nay, he even felt
A sorrow through his generous bosom stir
At thought of his dark rival's agony,
And said low to himself, "For wounding her
I can not do it; for myself I cry,
Take her, O friend; and I would you could make
Her happiness beside the light of thine!
If this be not, then do I claim her mine."

Lightly one night the boat returned, and lay
White in the fire-light from the shore which shone
With fitful gleams upon the waves; the moan
Of waving pines rolled downward to the bay,
And spread with hollow echoes on the shore.
De Castro woke from troubled sleep before
The last red gleam had faded from the night,
And saw the light boat tossing on the wave.
Some subtle purpose fired his soul; he gave
A swift, exultant glance around; no sight
Of living thing rewarded his keen eye.
In the night silence not a soul was nigh
Save the sleep-chained Delgado in the boat,
As tilted by the waves it lay afloat.

It was Delgado's habit oft to sleep
In swinging slumber on the silver waves;
He said their lapping made his slumbers deep,
And the slow ripple washing shoreward lulled
The lesser murmurs of the night to rest.
Upon the shore there stood a great tree, culled
By dark De Castro from them all as best
And fittest for his purpose. Strong and tall—
A gnarled old cedar stretching out mute limbs
Rigid through pain. De Castro marked its fall
One day in evil mood, and how there lay
The white boat in the shadow of its arms.
So when the camp was lonely one fair day,
And brooding silence woke not to alarms
Of stranger sounds, De Castro cut the tree,
But let it stand defying scrutiny.
Wedging it carefully till but a sweep
Of western wind had blown it from its hold
Headlong upon the bosom of the deep
Blue lake, whereon the white boat gently rolled.

De Castro caught a club, and cautiously
With Indian cunning crept toward the tree;
At one strong blow the wedge flew, and the sound
Falling among the hollow hills inwound
With the death groan the tree gave as it fell.
A jet of flame rose from the smouldering fire,
Flinging a weird light out upon the lake;
Some prescient spirit bade the sleeper wake—
And starting up with hands outflung, the spire
Of pale flame threw its lance upon the boat
And showed the slender figure of Inore!

O then a wild cry thrilled along the shore,
And in the instant ere the great tree fell
De Castro sprang into the lake! The rush
Of writhing branches bore them down; the swell
Of the lashed water surged upon the beach,
And with a hiss the camp-fire died. Then hush
Of night and silence dwelt there evermore.

* * * * *
Delgado's spirit haunts the blue lake still,
The Indians say. Like Aedon of old,
He pined through grief until his fate was told,
And as a lonely bird is heard his note
Beneath the dusk of evening from the hill;
Ever alone the stricken echoes float,
Meeting no answering echoes, and the night
Leans to his sad complaint with tender breast
And gives him hearing for his grief's unrest,
But hushes him to silence with the light.

By day the sun-waves ripple o'er the spot,
And in their brightness this tale is forgot—
But underneath the waters one may see
Even now the skeleton of memory.
For the long shape of the white boat starts up,
Startling, distinct, from its unquiet bed,
To the keen watcher sailing overhead;
And through the quivering waters one may see
The clasping branches of the cedar tree
Across its slight white shape imprisoning
With iron arms the old-time dainty thing
Which rode the waves with ease; around it play
Scaled silver-fish, and all the summer day
The fearful aspen shudders on the shore
And the pines moan and murmur evermore.

The Mother's Prayer.

A winter's night—the wind was blowing wild
Around a home where want and sorrow dwelt,
And by the bedside of a dying child
In tears and prayers a widowed mother knelt.

And lo! an angel bright stood by her side,
To whom the mother: "Wherefore do you come?"
And tenderly the shining one replied:
"To take your darling to a happier home."

The mother spoke: "'Tis cruel and unkind
To take my child and let me linger still."
The angel: "Mother, if you were not blind,
You would bow down in reverence to His will."

The mother said, "Much sorrow I have seen;
Filled to the brim with care and misery
My cup of life for many years has been;
Then do not take my only joy from me."

The angel answered: "If a mother's tears
Might change the ruling of the God above,
And if your son might live to manhood's years,
No blessing, but a curse, the change would prove."

"I care not what his lot in life may be,"
The mother sobbed, "but leave my little dear."
"You care not," said the angel; "list to me,
And from his life one passage you will hear:

"Your son will woo a maiden fair and good,
And win her from her home and country life,
And she will barter truth and maidenhood
To be to him his everything but wife."

"And he will live of the poor girl at last,
And on a night like this, of storm and sleet,
With baby in her arms, she shall be cast
Out of her home to perish in the street."

The mother rose. "My prayer I do recall,
Take him. A single tear I will not shed.
If by his living one poor soul might fall,
I would a thousand times that he were dead."

The angel spoke: "A mother's love is true.
I take your little one, but he will wait,
Sinless and beautiful, to welcome you,
When life is o'er, beside the Jasper gate."

And saying this, he vanished from the place,
And as the mother knelt beside the bed
She kissed her little infant's pallid face,
And spoke: "I thank Thee, God."

SAN FRANCISCO, August 3, 1878.

At his country residence—Belmont—on Thursday evening, Senator Sharon gave an entertainment to nearly a thousand guests; the occasion being the entrée into society of his youngest daughter, Miss Flora. The Belmont mansion is the former residence of Mr. Ralston, famous for its hospitalities and the character of its receptions during Mr. Ralston's career, where every distinguished stranger that visited our coast was made a welcome guest. Mr. Sharon has succeeded, not only to Mr. Ralston's mansion, but to his hospitable disposition, in throwing open his house to people who move in good society. In recalling the splendid wedding festivities at his town house on Sutter Street, at the marriage of his daughter with Mr. Frank Newlands, we ought not to hint that Senator Sharon has entered upon a new life in removing to a new house. The wedding to which we refer was the social event of the year in which it occurred; the entertainment given at the Belmont mansion to the Earl and Countess of Dufferin was the event of its season, as the splendid festivities of Thursday evening is likely to be the crowning event of this year's social campaign. The rendezvous at the Southern Pacific depot was prompt, responsive to the following simple invitation:

The Hon. WM. SHARON
Requests the pleasure of your company, at Belmont.

Thursday evening, August 8th.
Cars leave corner Third and Townsend Streets, at 8 o'clock.
R. S. V. P.

Soon after the appointed hour full fifteen car-loads of ladies and gentlemen were en route for San Mateo. All the vehicles of the county seemed in waiting at Belmont, and in a short time the guests were being driven through the elegant grounds and illuminated groves that environ the spacious mansion of the Senator. It was a brilliant affair. All that wealth and generous intent could accomplish was done for the entertainment and pleasure of his numerous guests. Good society was in its best dress and on its best behavior. That it was a most agreeable affair it is only necessary to say that nearly a thousand pleasure-seeking people were thrown together in a spacious and elegant mansion, brilliant with light, adorned with flowers, filled with servants, provided with music, and a banquet of all the luxuries, and invited to enjoy themselves, as most assuredly they did, till the morning dawn dimmed the thousand glimmering lights that had adorned the grounds. It would seem invidious to describe a score, or even a hundred, of the very costly and elegant toilets of the ladies, where all were exceptionally and fashionably clad. It would seem to us inappropriate to mark for special notice jewels and fabrics which wealth can produce, and omit a description of the graces and beauties, the deportment and elegance, which belong to culture, birth, and breeding. Among the invited guests we mention the following:

Mr. and Mrs. Ashburner,

It gives us pleasure to record the quiet but stylish marriage of Lieutenant Robert H. Fletcher, of the Twenty-first Infantry, and Miss Octavia Miller, on Thursday, the 6th inst., at Grace Church, by the Rev. Dr. Platt. The bride and groom are both favorites in society, well known, and highly appreciated—she, for her piquancy, freshness, and style; he, for his elegance, intelligence, and fine appearance. Miss Miller is the daughter of James A. Miller, Esq., from the "blue glass" region, and is a happy representative of Kentucky's lovely daughters. The quiet and tasteful manner in which the affair was conducted is indicative of the very good sense of the young couple. The lovely bridesmaid, Miss Susie Coffee, attended by the gallant and popular young officer, Major Keeler, completed the bouquet of beauty at the chancel.

Dr. J. Clarence Cutter, of Warren, Massachusetts, and Dr. George A. Leland, of Boston, are guests of friends in the city, the two gentlemen being en route to Japan under Government appointment. Dr. Cutter goes to Sapporo, as Professor of Physiology and Comparative Anatomy and Consulting Physician of the Government Hospital, while Dr. Leland will be located at Tokio. The party sail in the Gaelic on the 16th instant.

Among the celebrated poets whose genius was manifested at an early age, the following are remarkable examples: Tasso wrote his "Lines" to his mother at the age of nine years; Cowley completed the "Tragical History of Pyramus and Thisbe" when ten years old; Pope was only twelve when he wrote his beautiful "Ode to Solitude," and Chatterton wrote the "Hymn for Christmas Day" at the same age; Keats wrote many of his finest minor poems before he reached twenty; Gray wrote Latin poems while a school-boy; Bryant composed poetry at the age of thirteen, and his best poem, "Thanatopsis," was written at the early age of eighteen.

The Convention to revise the Constitution should have for its clerk a gentleman, a good reader, and one conversant with the peculiar duties of such a position. He must not only be competent, but must be entirely reliable. Believing that Mr. Marcus D. Boruck possesses all these qualifications, we shall be glad if he receives the appointment.

Love and Flowers.

O sweet the red June rose to see,
The yellow-handed honey-bee,
The clustered mignonette;
But my love's lips are sweeter far
Than any perfumed flowers are,
Than ever rose was yet!

O joy, the rippling brook to hear,
The music of its waters clear,
The glanor of its voice;
But my dear love's faint softest word
Is music's self—nor ever heard
Was music half so choice!

O bright the rising dawn in May,
The slow-unfolding flush of day,
The splendor of its hues;
But my dear love's enchanting smile
Could night herself to shine beguile,
And day with night confound!

EXTRACTS FROM THE DIARY OF AN EARLY CALIFORNIAN.—II.

BY JAMES C. WARD.

GENERAL VALLEJO'S HOUSE, SONOMA, 1848. — BARRACKS. — MISSION CHURCH.

(FROM AN ORIGINAL SKETCH.)

SAN FRANCISCO, July 23, 1847.—Since I wrote you I have taken two jaunts to the other side of the bay. The first was to Sonoma, where we have a military post. A beautiful plain is stretched out in front of the town and reaches to the bay, a distance of some three miles; considerable of it is covered with trees—mostly oaks of fine proportions, and growing somewhat apart—which gives it the appearance of a park. The ground is covered with wild oats. In riding over it with Captain Brackett, who commands the post, we came upon a herd of antelope, about thirty in number, and most beautiful to look at. As we were well mounted we gave chase, but it was impossible to overtake them; indeed, they would get far away and then stop to gaze at us until we came almost within pistol shot, and again they were off with the "wings of the wind." Though the lands appear fertile the Captain says they cannot be cultivated, owing to dry seasons and grasshoppers which devour the vegetation. I visited, not far from the town, the farm of Don Andreas Hoepner, the Russian gentleman of whom I wrote in a former letter as playing so delightfully on the piano. It is a league square, given him by General Vallejo for instructing his children in music. A charming spot. The house just built, standing on an eminence, is surrounded by large trees; and a stream of water, which is in some places deep enough to swim a horse, runs through a great part of the property, often hidden by the bushes and trees upon its banks. About an eighth of a mile from the house is a hot spring of a temperature of 120 degrees, which he intends conducting into baths. Hoepner is a man of taste; if he carries out his plans it will become a paradise. He told me that the portion of the place nearest the hills was covered mornings and evenings with deer. General Vallejo, commandante of this portion of the country under Mexican rule, is said to be the most cultivated Californian in the country. He very kindly invited me to stay at his house, but I did not accept of his hospitality. The house seemed comfortably furnished, as was that of his brother, on whom I also called. I passed one night with their brother-in-law, Mr. Leese, an American, who with his wife gave us a cordial welcome. Their children were all beautiful and well bred, and my time was made to pass very agreeably. It was at their house that I smoked my first cigarito, which was made, lighted, and presented in its delicate silver holder by the lady of the house. Having determined to return by land to Saucelito, which is but seven miles across the bay from San Francisco, I requested the General to send to his ranch for some government horses, which were wanted at Corte Madera, near Saucelito, where the Quartermaster has a saw mill in operation. I started at five o'clock in the evening, with a volunteer for a guide; when about four miles from Sonoma I stopped to lengthen my stirrup-leather, letting him go on, as he was driving two horses ahead of him. He was out of sight when I started again; and, as the roads now turned into the mountains, I missed the right one and continued on for some three miles, as I suppose, without seeing anything of my man. At last, feeling convinced that I had made a mistake, I put spurs to my horse and galloped back; when I reached the plain again, I discovered another road turning off to the right; I followed it for about four miles, and met my guide returning for me. He had left the horses at Petaluma, about five miles off, where General Vallejo owns many leagues of land, and where he has built an immensely large house. It was never finished, and is now partly in ruins. The scene now before us was very gloomy, with scarcely anything to disturb its monotony, and not a soul in sight but the General's Indians. It began to get dark before we had crossed the marsh at Petaluma, and a cloudy, windy night set in and continued until we alighted at nine o'clock at the door of a Señor Pacheco—fourteen leagues from Sonoma. We were on a full gallop most of the way. The Señor was in bed, but he threw on his serape to receive us, and by his orders we soon had a supper before us. After telling the Don as much of the news as my poor Spanish would admit of I asked to be shown to bed. The bed-room was flooded, and in it were four beds. Mine I found had just been cleanly sheeted, and the pillow-case was ruffled. It is the pride of Californians to offer their guests good beds. One of the other beds was occupied by the señor, and another I discovered by their voices to be occupied by women, but it was curtailed. Bear in mind that the rooms have no doors, and that the room we ate in had its floor covered with sleeping Indians, male and female. At six next morning we arose and went our way, and passing through the Mission of San Rafael reached Corte Madera at breakfast time. The red-wood trees cut here are of the largest and tallest kind, some being two hundred feet high. There have been some of the same kind cut farther south at Santa Cruz, which measured fifteen feet in diameter. The saw-mill is placed on the side of a hill fronting a small plain, and surrounded by grand old mountains. I slept pretty much all the balance of the day, and the next morning started for Saucelito. I came near (!) shooting a buck on the way with one of my pistols, which was all that occurred, excepting that I met a man called Four-fingered Jack at the widow Reed's ranch. This man is said to have been engaged in the massacre of some Americans just before Fremont made his raid upon San Rafael, who were tied and cut to pieces, if rumor can be believed. I had met Jack on the road before without knowing who he was. I found him very civil, and only upon my bidding him adios and shaking hands did I discover that he had lost a thumb. On arriving at Captain Richardson's, Saucelito, I found that there was no launch going to San Francisco that day, so I determined to go on board the Columbus, being acquainted with her officers, and wait for an opportunity. I was kindly received in the ward-room, and borrowing what I was most in need of—a change of underclothes—soon slipped into them, after a refreshing bath. The next morning I arrived at San Francisco after a week's absence. On the 5th of July we gave a ball at the hotel, the Congress lending us her band. Everybody seemed to have a pleasant time, and "danced all night till broad daylight." Last Saturday, being obliged to go again to Corte Madera on business, I stayed part of the time at the Mission of San Rafael with Don Timoteo Murphy. Mr. Murphy having lost many cattle lately, killed by bears, at one of his ranches called the Gallinas, he determined to destroy the latter by means of a cacastre—a sort of fort made by digging a pit in the ground six feet square by four or five deep, at the corner of which strong posts are sunk, and to them spars secured. The top is then covered with spars firmly lashed except on one side, which is to be fastened from within by three well-armed men who enter it. The bears are to be enticed to this spot by a dead horse or cow, which is dragged over the grounds near their lairs, and then buried near the cacastre. They invariably come at night and dig up the dead animal, and are easily shot by those on watch in the fort. I went with him to superintend the building of one. The spot was six miles from the Mission; the ride to it through a beautiful valley. We were followed by Mr. Murphy's grayhounds, thirteen in number, and on our return started two hares, to which we gave chase. One of them took to the hills, and the other was lost in the bushes. Mr. Murphy is an Irishman, and fond of sporting, but I am not sure that he is very successful with his pack. The excitement was very agreeable, however, although the run was so short. As we neared home we stopped at one of the Mission buildings to see a dying man. I did not wish to enter the room, but they thought I had better do so. It seemed to me that I had never seen a person suffer more than the old man appeared to. His young wife sat on one side of his bed (which was almost on the floor) and his son on the other, a large woman was squatting near his feet, and every few minutes they moved him to render his position more comfortable. They did not seem to be affected by his pain, or by the approach of death. Although I could not make out all they said, they smiled and laughed several times while we were there, and smoked their cigarritos as coldly as though he was in a gentle sleep. He died the next morning, and was buried the day after without benefit of clergy, the priest being absent.

October 15, 1847.—Governor Mason paid us a visit about three weeks ago, which he said he enjoyed much. We did our best to entertain him. Dinner parties were given him every day of his sojourn, and a ball, which surpassed any before given, enabled him to see collected together "our best society." Poor Jackson was in great demand. He, with the glass and china, were borrowed every day, and the ball supper was under his special supervision. We sent all around the bay for Spanish ladies, and had quite a fine collection of them, including Doña Dolores, the belle of the Contra Costa. I have just returned from a visit to Monterey, having been obliged to go there suddenly on business with officers of the squadron. I left San Francisco at two o'clock in the afternoon, intending to reach Santa Clara that night. Have I described the riding-dress usually worn here? A Spanish sombrero of vicuña covered with oil silk, secured to the head by a broad ribbon which passes under the chin; a blue cloth jacket, with metal buttons; satin vest, with ditto; blue calzoneras, with silver buttons all down the sides, but open from below the knees; under calzoneras leather bottas bound about the calves, with knife tucked into the top of the right one; over the shoulders a Mexican serape (water proof); spurs with large rowels and steel pendants, inlaid with silver, jingling like sleigh-bells from the heels; holster pistols hanging from the horn of the saddle, the most valuable part of which, the tree—strapped very firmly on to the horse, costs about three times as much, but lasts forever—is covered by two or more housings or machillos, which are generally embroidered, and in camping out are spread lengthwise on the ground. Of course this costume is modified by the gringo, but much of it is necessarily adopted. I was mounted on a good horse, and was followed by an Indian vaquero who drove three more. The road from San Francisco to the Mission of Dolores is only four miles long. Being sandy, and through scrub oaks which entirely shut out the view, it is a tedious and hard road to travel. Fortunately, I had a companion in a young Spanish-Russ named Bolcoff, just married to one of the prettiest girls of the neighborhood, whom he intended to join at the Mission and take with him to the ranch of her father, six leagues off. On reaching the church, however, he found that the parents of the young lady were there, standing godfather and godmother to a little negrita (brunette), and as it began to rain he concluded to pass the night at Padre Santillan's house. I determined to push on in spite of the rain, and was passing rather a gloomy time of it among the hills, when a couple of my acquaintances overtook me—a Frenchman and his brother-in-law, a Señor —. They were to stop at Sanchez' for horses, and while we waited for them to be brought the rain began to fall in good earnest, which decided us to remain there and pass the night. The Sanchez family consider themselves, and are considered, the aristocracy of the neighborhood. But as they are known to be inimical to our flag, they are not popular with Americans. I, however, can not too highly speak of the kindness and hospitality of our host. There are few of the Californians who sit at table with you during meals. He stood and waited upon us. Nor could I induce him to be seated. While a prisoner on board the Savannah during the troubles, his roof had been blown away by a storm, and wife and children took shelter with the neighbors. The place was much exposed, and three times had the same accident happened, costing him seven hundred dollars for repairs. I showed him how easily it could be secured by our method; but I suppose nothing will ever supply the place of the hide ropes by which it is fastened to the adobe walls. I remarked to him that his house being right on the road, and the only shelter between Santa Clara and San Francisco, he must be greatly inconvenienced by visitors. He answered that to be sure many stopped there, but he was glad to receive them; and, besides, his father, on his death-bed, had enjoined his children never to deny shelter to those that asked it. Such hospitality is universal. And so it happens that those he looked upon as enemies are every day too glad to lay themselves under obligation to Señor Sanchez for hospitalities, which can never be fully reciprocated. We started next morning at five, after a sound night's rest, and were in the Pueblo of San José at half past eleven. Parts of the road were very beautiful, particularly that between the Mission of Santa Clara and the Pueblo, the whole of which is through an avenue planted by the Franciscan fathers. We saw several deer near the road, and coyotes (prairie wolves), even so tame that now and then one would jog along before us like a dog. Ground squirrels abound, and in the environs of the Mission and Pueblo the roads have been injured by their holes as to be dangerous at night. Many are thrown from their saddles in consequence of their horses stepping into them. In the Pueblo I found a most comfortable stopping place at the house of Peter Davidson, with whom we have business. Peter has opened an inn which would do credit to any of our country towns. The rooms are so pleasant, and everything about them so tidy, that I would have been glad to pass a week or two with him. I should have gone on toward Monterey the same afternoon but I had promised Purser Price of the Cyane that I would wait until the next morning for him. This town contains about a thousand inhabitants, principally Spanish. The houses, being of adobe and out of repair, do not improve its appearance. The men are allowed to be the most unruly in Northern California. Horse thieving is not uncommon, and gambling almost universal among them. Two days before my arrival a Californian, somewhat intoxicated, boasted to one of his companions, that he would flog with his macarte (hair rope) the first American he met. It happened that four of our countrymen, a moment afterward, were passing by on the opposite side of the road, and were pointed out to him. Upon his saying that he could not put his threat into execution for want of a horse, one was immediately offered to him. He mounted and rushing up to the strangers struck one of them, who, it seems had just risen from a bed of sickness, several blows upon the back. Whereupon one of his friends picked up a stout stick with which to defend him, when the Spaniard wheeled his horse round upon him and raised his macarte to strike him also. The man was too quick for him, however; he dodged the rope, and with one blow from the stick felled him to the ground. The Californian died next day, partly owing to bad medical treatment it was said. The American gave himself up to the Alcalde, but was soon acquitted, upon the testimony of the Californians and Americans who witnessed the assault. It was thought that the affair would excite revengeful feelings, and it was rumored that the dead man's friends had vowed to take the lives of five Americans as an offset. Determining to leave the horses I had with me at a livery stable, and hire fresh ones for the next day's journey, Señor Juan Bernal obliged me with four, for which I agreed to pay $40 on condition of their bringing me safely back to the Pueblo again—a large sum, when it is considered that the price for horses ranged from $15 to $25, and that mares could be bought for much less. After an early breakfast, and a precaution taken to stow away in the saddle-bags (which the vaquero's horse carried) a bottle of claret and some eatables, I mounted and rode over to join the Purser, who had arrived at nine o'clock on the previous night. I found him waiting for horses, so had to start without him, he and his party promising to overtake me, if possible, or to meet me at San Juan, forty miles from Monterey, that night. When I told them I should be in Monterey at that time, if my horses could carry me there, they laughed at my presumption. When well out of the Pueblo, however, I told Bruno, in the best Spanish I could command, that I wanted to be in Monterey that night. He replied, shaking his head, "no es posible, señor, con estos caballos" (it is impossible with these horses, sir). So I supposed I had been compelled to accept the alternative, and remain for the night at San Juan.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

Is it really so very wrong, dear Em, to want pretty things that don't belong to you, provided you don't try to possess yourself of them unlawfully? If it is, then do I most grievously offend every time I pass Ackerman's windows. What perfect kaleidoscopes they are. No two days the same. One time a most appetizing dinner set, arranged with the most artistic taste; another, ornamental chinaware, figures in bisque, bronze, terra cotta, or crystals dainty enough for the queen of the fairies' own use. Yesterday it was the most charming groups and single figures in marble, each under a glass case, that stopped every one as they passed down Sutter Street. There was "The Death of the Stag," and "The Terriers," both new and exceedingly fine; "War and Peace," "Cupid Caught," "Eve," in all her pristine loveliness, and my pet, the "Greek Slave." The bisque statuettes, although not new, are constantly coming up in new forms, the prettiest being always companion pieces, a man and a woman, either in the extremes of the court mode or a picturesque peasant couple. In each you will see that the type of face is marked plebeian or patrician, according to the subject, so there could be no mistaking either were the dresses reversed. That's the idealization of art, of course, for have you never noticed how exceedingly unpatrician are many of the regal faces of Europe, and what glimpses of true royalty one often gets in faces that are surrounded by rags and tatters in the every-day crowds we meet? I have come to the conclusion, my friend, that in this, as in everything else in this world, things are sadly mixed. Mais revenons. Something new is the terra cotta ware. It is the natural orange color of the clay, and the designs are quaint and original. One, for example, is a French peasant from Normandy, with an old-fashioned spindle in her hand. Some ten or twelve inches in height, they are a pretty size for the mantel. Another novelty is marked "Pêche Coquettes." The pair represents a man and a woman, in terra cotta, each seated in a sea-shell, the man with his hand to his face as though calling to the woman, who takes no notice of his advances. The combination of silver and bronze is novel, too, and makes up charmingly in candlesticks, vases, and such half-useful, half-ornamental things. But something you have not yet seen, I know, is the opal glassware, as it is called. It is the plain flint glass, but the beauty of it consists in the coloring, which combines every tint of the rainbow, and trembles and shimmers, and changes from azure to crimson, then back again to purple, gold, and green while you look; or, for a more homely but still better descriptive simile, a soap bubble, when the sunlight shines through it. The coloring is a revival of one of the "lost arts," so Mr. Ackerman says. The Swiss department, in the Kearny Street side of the store, is a small exposition in itself. There is the pretty cottage that the Swiss workman is so fond of repeating, in a hundred different situations at least, for it is his one idea of home; and there is the short-skirted peasant-wife in the open door with the youngsters in her arms, and one hand shading her eyes that are looking out through the gathering twilight for some one who is coming. The goats gambol on the neighboring crags; here and there is seen a straggling cow coming leisurely home. One can almost hear the echo of the distant "yodel" as it floats across the valley on the crisp evening air. And how all the most beautiful forms of womanly work are making themselves industrial necessities nowadays. Here is one of the latest applications of it in silk embroidery on the creamiest and softest of kid, for the backs of photograph albums and glove boxes; on another is an exquisite hand-painting on the same material. The most complete of albums I have seen, however, is one of Russia leather, heavily bound and ornamented with designs in silver, a porcelain painting set in the back of one cover, and inside the places for pictures are—on one side of the page for large ones, one on a side; on the other, spaces for four small ones. The book is supported on a massive rotary stand of ebony and silver. These are some few of the pretty things I have seen since I last wrote; but don't fancy, please, that they are even a tenth part of what I found there. I have only skimmed lightly over the surface, for it would be far easier for me to tell you what Ackerman has not than what he has in his delightful collection. The invisible threads of fate seemed to draw me, the other day, to Anderson & Randolph's. I told you last week of the Beaconsfield testimonial to be made there. Helen B.—had been in to see me, and could do nothing but rave over the diamonds she had just seen there, so I went in to see for myself; and certainly they were worth the seeing, especially that splendid pair of twelve-carat unset stones—just two quivering drops of light, as it were, lying on the paper; but they are marvels of perfect cutting, and worth $5,000. Did you know that color does not diminish the value of diamonds, provided the transparency is not affected? It seems that there are stones of all the different colors—the "Hope" diamond, supposed to be a fragment of the blue crown diamond of France stolen in 1792, under the régime of Robespierre; the emerald green diamond in the royal treasury at Dresden, a bright pink one belonging to the Marquis de Dree, and the celebrated dwarf diamond, the shade of tobacco juice, that has just been sold to a wealthy American by the Paris firm of Basset & Lemonnier, the jewelers who have most frequently done the setting of the French crown jewels, besides several others equally famous; but we rarely see such outside of old collections. I should be quite content, though, with a few plain white ones for everyday wear, wouldn't you? One of the most unique designs there was a diamond hair ornament in the form of the "dipper" in Ursa Major. "For further particulars," as the advertisements say, consult your astronomical atlas. You know my passion for cameos; there is something so real and living about them. And you can imagine with what interest I examined a whole trayful of unset specimens. It is marvelous with what precision the most minute figures are cut: the head of Shakespeare, on a pink stone just large enough for a lady's ring, being as perfect a likeness as the largest engraving. "The Seasons," "Spring," a mother and child, and any number of the familiar mythological and mediæval subjects you see in chinaware and other ornamental work, are reduced to the size for lockets, rings, and pins. The gold—probably the best preserved from antiquity, and yet how the present is every day improving on even the exquisite relics of the past that busy hands are constantly unearthing for us. What could be more beautiful, and at the same time new, than the medallion paintings on gold, with here and there a diamond, like a stray dew-drop, set in on the surface of the picture? These are done in Paris, but come unset, to be made up in any form desired. They are charming when mounted with a heavy open-work gold bordering, a single one for the top of a bracelet. Do you recollect the life-size statue in bronze of Augustus Caesar that Mr. Johnson brought from Rome some time ago? It cost $7,000, and stands now, I think, in the front hall of the house on Sutter Street. It was made by Bochetti, the most famous of living bronze-work artists. Mr. Randolph showed me an exact duplicate of it, though much smaller, and made by the same artist. It is as finely finished as the most precious piece of gold work would be; the breast-plate alone is a study. There suddenly comes into my treacherous memory a promise I made you, so long ago, to find out the special makes of gloves at our stores. I redeem a part of it at least, at once, by telling you how much I like the Balsez-Preville—a make I acknowledge quite new to me until I found them at the Ville de Paris, and finding them there, knew them to be good, even before I looked at them. They are the softest, most elastic kid I have ever worn, and have the pretty scalloped tops I like so much. They are marked, too, as shoes are, with a letter as well as a number, to indicate differences too slight to constitute a full size, as extra length, or slenderness of finger and so on, so that it is impossible to get anything but perfect fits. Do try them, and I am sure you will agree with me that they are perfection. Do you care as much for candies as ever? I dare say you do, and I mean to send you down a box of "assorted" from a new place on Kearny Street, the "Clarendon," near Sutter. Caramels are their specialty, and particularly the new vanilla caramel; but there is everything else that "a sweet tooth" like yours can wish for. I can vouch for the purity of them all, for I have been through the factory and seen them made; and for their deliciousness, for I feasted on them all one evening this week while at pretty Rachel Lowenthal's concert. I have just been thinking of the various absurd theories about "spheres"—men's and women's, I mean—and the perpetual squabbling that is going on over them, when I came across two or three little items like these: "Descriptions of dresses and costumes, by Walter Crane, the English artist;" "artistic dress designs, by William Morris, poet and upholsterer for the wife of a Royal Academician." When male poets and artists will vie with the dressmaker in decorating the female form, it is about time to respectfully consider the question whether the industrial world may not be divided into aptitudes rather than sexes after all. Perhaps you would like to hear how the wife of the said academician was dressed by the poet? The underdress was of changeable green satin, slightly shirred in the front breadth; the overdress, which was of a clinging oriental goods, half silk, half wool, of pale green and silver, in delicate flowers, fitted closely in front and on the sides; but the back consisted of three loose pieces buttoning over each other irregularly, and ending in a long, square train lined with white satin and lace frills. A loosely tied fichu of old lace, fastened by a bunch of yellow roses, was the only ornament worn. Was it not charming? From London, too, we shall soon have the prettiest fichu yet worn, a fine India muslin, edged with a narrow plaited frill of the same, and with a deep, square cut collar laid over it, similarly frilled, and finished by two loops of white satin ribbon, one end of which is caught by a flower to the left side of the belt. It is an exact reproduction of the one worn by Miss Terry in the "Vicar of Wakefield,"—running at one of the London theatres under the title of "Olivia." In fancy work there are very pretty doilies to be made for finger bowls, out of the peasant linen, which are to be embroidered in "outline" stitch in black silk or Pyrenees wool. Subjects from Mother Goose are favorites, and a line of the poem illustrated is embroidered under the picture. The Point Russe stitches are newer than the Kensington crewel work, and prettier for working on felt for curtain, table, and mantel covers. "Mummy cloth," described as a sort of "crinkly linen material," is said to be a fresh fancy for curtains and hangings. I shall try to find some for you at Mrs. Koerner's, as she gets everything as soon as it is out. Speaking of crewel work just now reminds me that I heard of some very pretty linen suits that have lately created a sensation. They are of linen and worked in crewels with belts to match, probably after the present styles at Newport. They are hand-worked, of course. Have you seen any of them? You would hardly believe the extraordinary prices Fräutinger & Noll are selling their cloaks and dolmans at, and bathing and boating suits as well. Kilt skirts of Victoria lawn, for morning wear, and other light suits, in proportion. They are such pleasant people to deal with, too, that it would be a treat to go there, even if there were not half as many things to see as there are. Here is a pretty compliment paid to one of our leading tourists the other day—you can't pass down Sutter Street from Kearny to Montgomery without seeing their window: a standing basket had been supplied from their store for a late wedding over in Oakland, which was such a model of beauty that the recipients had it photographed. Messrs. Wehlspiel & Mayrenholz were the first, I believe, to introduce to San Francisco the style of making up bouquets now so popular at the East; that is, the flowers lightly put together instead of the old-fashioned tight bunch that was so horribly inartistic, and the lighter and more delicate blossoms allowed to stand gracefully out from the main bunch. Two of the prettiest dresses at the Sharon ball, on Thursday night, were Mrs. Field's and Miss Mathews'. The former was of pale green silk with a Russian lace tunic and garnitures of cardinal flowers; and the latter a white satin, draped from the shoulder with crêpe lisse embroidered with cut pearl beads. I came very near forgetting to tell you that Aunt Clarissa writes from the South that she is still enjoying the recollection of her visit here, and is daily showering blessings on your humble servant for having persuaded her into buying one of those new style refrigerators of Montague's. Funny how long it has taken inventors to apply the simple fact that cold air is the heavier and necessarily falls, to the construction of coolers of all kinds. Some one has done it at last though, and the result is that this one has the ice chamber above instead of below, and there is nothing now left to be improved upon.

Yours affectionately,

LILLAS DUBOIS.

I.

I drew it from its china tomb;
It came out feebly scented
With some thin ghost of past perfume
That dust and days had lent it—
An old stained letter, folded still.
To read with due composure
I sought the sunlit window-sill
Above the gray inclosure,
That, glimmering in the sultry haze,
Faint flowered, dimly shaded,
Stumbled, like Goldsmith's Madam Blaize,
Reddened and broadened,
A queer old place! You'd surely say
Some tea-board garden maker
Had planned it in Dutch William's day
To please some florist Quaker,
So trim it was. The yew tree still,
With pious care perverted,
Grew in the same grim shape; and still
The lipless dolphin spired;
Still in his wonted state abode
The broken-nosed Apollo;
And still the cypress arbor showed
The same unbragging hollow—
Only, as fresh young Beauty gleams
From coffee-colored laces,
So peeped from its old-fashioned dreams
Its fresher modern traces:
For idle mallet, hoop, and ball
Upon the lawn were lying;
A magazine, a tumbled shawl,
Round which the swifts were flying;
And tossed beside the guelder rose
A heap of rainbow knitting,
Where, blinking in her sweet repose,
A Persian cat was sitting.
A place to love in—live—for aye,
If we, too, like Tithonus,
Could find some god to stretch the gray
Scant life the fates have thrown us.
But now by steam we run the race
With buttoned heart and pocket—
Our Love's a gilded, surplus grace,
Just like an empty locket.
"The time is out of joint," Who will
May strive to make it better;
For me, this warm old window-sill,
And this old dusty letter.

II.

Dear John (the letter ran), it can't, can't be,
For Father's gone to Chorley Fair with Sam,
And Mother's storing apples—Prue and me
Up to our Elbows making Damsel Jam;
But we shall meet before a Week is gone—
'Tis a long Lane that has no Turning, John!

Only till Sunday next—and then you'll wait
Behind the White Thorn, by the broken stile;
We can go round and catch them by the Gate—
All to ourselves for nearly one long mile.
Dear Prue won't look, and Father he'll go on,
And Sam's two eyes are all for Cissy, John!

John, she's so smart—with every ribbon new,
Flame-colored Saeque and Crimson Paduasoy;
As proud as proud, and has the Vapors, too,
Just like a Lady—calls poor Sam a boy,
And vows no Sweet-Heart's worth the thinking on Till he's past Thirty—I know better, John!

My dear, I don't think I thought of much
Before we knew each other, I and you;
And now, why, John, your least, least Finger-touch
Gives me enough to think a Summer through.
See, for I send you Something! There, 'tis gone!
Look in this corner—mind you find it, John!

III.

This was the matter of the note—
A long forgot deposit,
Dropped in a Chelsea Dragon's throat
Deep in a fragrant closet,
Piled with a modish Dresden world,
Beaux, beauties, prayers, and poses,
Bronzes with squat legs under-curved,
And great jars filled with roses.
Ah, heart that wrote! Ah, lips that kissed!
You had no thought or presage
Into what keeping you dismissed
Your simple old-world message!
A reverent one. Though we to-day
Distrust beliefs and powers,
The artless, ageless things you sell
Are fresh as God's own flowers,
Starring some pure primeval spring,
Ere Gold had grown despotic—
Ere Life was yet a selfish thing,
Or Love a mere exotic.
I kneel to you! Of those you were Whose kind old hearts grow mellow,
Whose fair old faces grow more fair
As Point and Flanders Yellow,
Whom some old store of garnered grief,
Their placid temples shading,
Crowns like a wreath of autumn leaf
With tender tints of fading,
Peace to your soul. You died unwept
Despite this loving letter,
And what of John? Of John he said
The less, I think, the better.
—All the Year Round.

XLII.—The Daisy.

Not worlds on worlds in phalanx deep
Need we to prove a God is here;
The daisy, fresh from winter's sleep,
Tells of His hand in lines as clear.
For who but He who arched the skies,
And pours the day-spring's living flood,
Wondrous alike in all He tries,
Could rear the daisy's purple bud?
Mould its green cup, its wiry stem,
Its fringed border nicely spin,
And cut the gold-embossed gem
That, set in silver, gleams within?
And fling it, unrestrained and free,
O'er hill and dale and desert sod,
That man, where'er he walks, may see
In every step the stamp of God?

FALLEN LEAVES.

From Little Johnny's Diary.

JUNE 22th.—Sassidges for breckfís, you ot to seen me an Billy et em. If we was let we wude et lots more than we was giv, but I like readin good books, too.

One time there was a little boy wich had ben giv some money, and he went to Mister Brily, the butcher, and bot so much sassidge like he wude bust, and he was sick a bed. So his father he said :

"He make him not likem anny mor, seef I dont."

So his father said : "Sammy," cos that was his name, "doo yu know wot sassidges is made out of?"

And Sammy said he dident. Then his father said : " Babies !"

And Sammy said : "How crewel !" and his father said : "Offe !"

Then Sammy he thot a wile reel hard, like he wude go to sleep, and then he said :

"How much sassidges wude our baby make, and wude it make a mile? Cos wen I git wel I mite go to the restyrant and say, 'I can git a mile of sassidges, and if yule cook em reel brown you may hav a bite, I aint stingy.'"

I hav herd fokes say that cats is put in to sassidges, but taint so, its jest the other way, but cats eats rats, too.

Once a rat was eetin some bugs wich it had foun drowned, and a cat see him doin it. And wen the rat had et em evry little bit up the cat she et the rat, and wocked a way a shakin her hed like sayin :

"There, that wil teeche you better than to eat sech disgustin food, you nassy thing, it makes me sick to my stumack ake for to think of it !"

Uncle Ned says that reminds him of a nigger wich he see in Africy. The nigger had kil a other nigger in a fite, and had brot the boddie home, and Uncle Ned ast him was he a goin to eat it. The nigger he was ofice mad, and he said, the nigger did :

"Do you think Ime a disgustin cannibal? Ime a goin to giv him to my dog, for to make the dog fat."

Then Uncle Ned said : "O thats how it is, but wot in the wíld do you keep dogs for?"

And the nigger he said : "Wot do I keep dogs for? I I never see sech a fool. Wot does any body keep dogs for but to eat em?"

Billy he got a lickin to day for throne rocks at a Chiny man, serve him rite, puddin for dinner, and Franky is gittin a other tooth, and mother is dlited like it was a other leg !

* * * * *

JULY the 15st.—I was made wosh in ice water cos I didnt git up wen I was tole, but you ot to seen wot a little tiny drop was anuf. Looked like it wude rain, but after it had straind a wile it giv it up.

Wen I ast my father did he think it wude rain, so I could make a sno man out of mud, he dident say any thing for a long wile, but pretty soon he looked at my mother and smild and he said, my father did :

"If it wude rain lots, wife, Johnny cude have a piller of salt."

But my mother she said :

"You must be crazy; do you think Ide let him sleep on sech a thing as that?"

There was a feller wich was silly, and he was a standin in the rode bear heded, and his brother looked out the windo and sed :

"Wy dont you come in the house, dont you see its goin for to rain?"

Then the silly feller he said :

"You hav al ways call me a fool, bot wich is the fool now Ide like for to kano, do you spose if I was to com in the house it wudent rain all the same?"

This mornig we had eggs and ham for breckfess and my sister for dinner. She didnt seem to feel nice, and I ast her how she liked bein marrid to her young man, and livin in a other hous,* and she dident say nothin, but looked like she was a goin to bust out bawlin. Then my mother she spoke up and said wasent it a brass band, but it wasent cos I ran out for to see. Wen I cum back my sister she had shet herself up in a bed room up stairs, now Ide like to kano wots up, if that yung man has ben lickin her he better not, no indeed, cos he wil have to go to the bad place wen he dise, and the ole black feller wil say :

"Yure so fond of lickin may be you better lick this red hot griddle nex 2 or 3 million years wile I mix up some batter for to make me a cake, cos I aint had any breckfiss yet."

Once there was a man lickin his wife, and a little boy cetched him at it, and he said, the little boy did :

"Wot do you mean by like that, you notty man, if you dont stop this minnit there wil be litenin !"

But the man done it agin, and the little boy he pull off his jacket and said : "Now Ile giv it to yu, good !" and dubble up his fists, but the man he kep on a lickin his wife like he never expectked to have a other.

Then the little boy he got up in a apple tree and said : "You wicked feller, if I was down out of this tree it wude be pizen times for you !"

Then the man he went away to hav a quiet smoke, and wen the woman wich was licked she see the little boy gitin down out the tree she cetched him and giv him a ofice lickin his ownself, and said :

"Thattle be good for yure tung, you sassy brat !"

I spose my father he thot of that this after noon wen I herd him tell my mother it wasent no use to enter fearin tween a man and his wife, let em make it up their own sellufs. But Ide like to kano wots come of Uncle Ned.

JULY the 16d.—This mornin I went strate to Uncle Ned soon as ever I got up and I said :

"Uncle Ned, taint no use us havin secrits from each other or we cant live together any more."

Then Uncle Ned he said : "Johnny, I dont want to gather any more, I gethered one yesterday, and Ide like to get rid of thatn."

Then I said : "Wy dont yu tel it to me then : I no that yung man has ben lickin Missy, cos if he aint wot for dident she go home las nite, but stade to our house?"

Uncle Ned he said twassent so, she went home bout 3 Oh clock this mornin, cos he went with her, it was all rite and I mussent say no more about it, so I wont.

Chickin for dinner and lots of stuffin, pertickler by me.

But I know he licked her.

Mary, thats the house maid, has got a new frock made out of my mother's ole dress, Franky, thats the baby, said "La, la, la, la," you never see sech a smart baby !

I know were there is a baby wich is a heap older than ourn, but not moren halef so big, and it cant wock, and it cant tock, but it can jist discount any body a lookin out of its eyes. It is in a store windo, and is made out of whax.

Fore my sister was married to her yung man, and went to liv in her uthor hous and be licked, me and her used to pas that windo, and I was for stoppin, but she wude pul me a long and say :

"Wy, its ben there ever since I was little, only some times its close is change, wot can you see to like that thing, I think thay better wash the nasty black spots off its nose."

But the other day we was goin past agin, and she stopt and looked a long wile, and then she said :

"O, you darlin, wee sweet, if you was a live I woud bi yu and jest eat you evry mite up, wot dear little freckles onto its funny nosie !"

Now wot do you think of that?

JULY the 17.—I was to my sisters hous to day : and wile I was into her werk bascuit I foun a letter wich was rote her by her yung man wile she was over to our hous, time he licked her, and I coppid it in my diry wile she was out. Here it is, xcuse spellin :

My Precious Sweetest, Come home with your Uncle Edward, I have told him all, and he says we were neither of us to blame. He will hand you this note and I beg you will come back with him to your own

LOVIE DOWIE.

P. S.—Uncle Edward, fortunately, had some fruit in his pocket, which he happened to lay on the table, and I must confess that that table cover is orange, as you contended, and not yellow as was suggested by me. So it was all my fault and I freely forgive you, and we'll never, never have another dispute while we live.

L. D.

There ! I new he licked her. Sammon for dinner today.

CONFIDENCE.

Mon cœur soupire dès l'aurore,
Le jour, un rien me fait rougir,
Le soir, mon cœur soupire encore,
Je sens du mal et du plaisir.

Je rêve à toi quand je sommeille,
Ton nom m'agite, il me saisi,
Je pense à toi quand je m'éveille,
Partout ton image me suit.

Quand tu parles ta voix touchante
Dans mes sens porte le plaisir,
Ton aspect me trouble et m'enchanté,
Je te cherche et je voudrais te faire.

Muckmelon.
Vegetable soup.
Baked Red-fish.

Lamb Chops. Potato Croquettes.
Succotash. Sweet Potatoes.
Roast Ducks, Apple Sauce.

Cucumber Salad.
Lemon Cream.

Fruit-bowl of Peaches, Apricots, Plums, Gages, Apples, and Grapes.

TO MAKE LEMON CREAM.—Boil the thin rind of two lemons in a pint of cream; strain and thicken with the well-beaten yolks of three and whites of four eggs; sweeten with pulverized sugar; stir until nearly cold, and put in glasses.

TO BAKE RED-FISH.—Prepare a rich dressing of bread, onions, parsley, and part of a clove of garlic very finely minced. Fill the fish, lay on the top three or four thin slices of fat pork, put into the pan enough soup stock to make sufficient gravy. When partly cooked, add four tablespoonsful of tomato catsup, and one of Nabob sauce. Thicken with a little flour, and baste continually.

LEGENDARY FALL OF THE FIRST PINE.

It was a dreamy, quiet night in early June.

The earth had laid aside her dainty spring garment, and had clad herself in the fresh, sweet beauty of early summer.

Evening had enhanced and made perfect this beauty, for over it she had scattered myriads of pure dew-drops that were turned by the bright light of the morn into sparkling crystals.

The silence which had been uninterrupted, except by the plaintive chirp of some restless little bird, was now broken by the low murmurings and whisperings of the pines as they swayed to and fro, and bowed one to the other.

Presently there was a hush, as Somnus, god of sleep, passed through the forest, gently closing as she went the eyes of the wakeful birds. Then followed the dream-god, Morpheus, flying slowly, and scattering his queer fancies to right and to left.

As soon as they had passed on the whisperings were resumed, and this time the tones were louder and more distinct.

Grand old pines! they had much to say.

For centuries they had stood together: they had battled the fiercest storms, and up to that day they had been unbroke.

To-night their king, the tallest, noblest one among them, lay stretched out at their feet dead.

Not killed by nature, but cut down by the hard, keen axe of a woodman, the first that had entered the forest.

How their hearts had thrilled with agony when they saw the cruel blade descending, each time burying itself more and more deeply into the heart of the true old tree.

This pine had been their idol, and not only theirs, but also that of the little birds, which had known and loved it best of all, and had sung their gayest, sweetest songs in its branches; and the rabbits, squirrels, and soft-eyed deer, they, too, had loved it well.

There was also a little stream that curved around its trunk, and chattered and sang to it the live-long day.

The old pine had loved this little stream, and had nurtured and cared for her from the time she came out of the ground a tiny spring.

So when the little spring had burst away from her bed, she first curved around her dear old friend.

Often in the beginning of her journey she was touched by the sharp rocks in her path, and would gurgle, and cry, and complain.

Then how kindly would the old tree soothe and comfort the little pilgrim.

Now she must battle alone; her friend had suddenly and strangely fallen. It lay right across her path, blocking it as the sharp rocks and stones had never done.

The little stream! she softly caressed her lost friend, she poured her waters over the bruised branches, and murmured to it her grief and love, but it would not answer her; it lay still and helpless in its bright robes, still green and sparkling with dew.

That was the saddest night the forest ever knew; happening, too, in the brightest season.

In the time when the flowers were all blooming, and everything rejoicing.

Previously on such June nights the pines had been full of gladness, had laughed and told wonderful stories of the moon, stars, brooks, and birds, and of the time when the Indian warrior Hiawatha, and the lovely Minnehaha, had passed through the forest on their bridal journey homeward from the land of the Dakotas.

But all this bright June night they rocked and moaned, and never since have they ceased their murmurings, though many have shared the same fate.

Go into the forest and listen to the whisperings of the pines; still they tell the same tale over and over—tell of that dreadful night when the fall of the first pine caused the earth to shake, and the frightened birds to fly away.

Tell how the little stream continued to grieve and weep, until her waters were turned to salt tears, how at length she buried herself and traveled for many miles in the dark ground, and at last reappeared in a desert land as a great salt lake.

KISMET.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 20, 1878.

An Optical Delusion.

The Colonel, a rigid martinet, is sitting at the window of his room, when looking out he sees a Captain crossing the barrack-yard toward the gate. Looking at him closely he is shocked to observe that, the rules and regulations to the contrary notwithstanding, the Captain does not carry a sword.

"Captain!" he calls from the window; "Hi, Captain; step up to my room for a moment, will you?"

The Captain obeys promptly, borrows a sword from the officer of the guard, the guard-room being at the foot of the stairs, and presents himself to the Colonel in irreproachable tenue.

The Colonel is somewhat surprised to see the sword in its place and, having to invent some pretext for calling his subordinate back, says, with some confusion, "I beg your pardon, Captain, but really I've forgotten what it was I wanted to speak to you about. However, it can't have been anything very important; it'll keep. Good morning."

The Captain salutes, departs, returns the sword to its owner and is making off across the barrack-yard, when he again comes within the Colonel's vision.

The Colonel rubs his eyes, stares, says softly to himself, "How in thunder is this? Dem it, he hasn't a sword to his waist;" then called aloud, "Captain! oh, Captain, one moment please."

The scene is re-enacted.

The Captain salutes, departs, returns the sword to its owner, and makes for the gate. As he crosses the barrack-yard the Colonel calls his wife to his side and says: "See that officer out there? Has he got a sword on?"

The Colonel's wife adjusts her eye-glass upon him, scans him keenly and says: "He hasn't a taste of a sword."

SATURDAY, AUGUST 10, 1878.

An agreeable surprise has been experienced by our citizens of San Francisco this last week in the telegraphic announcement from Bavaria of the death of Michael Reese. Michael was a wealthy Israelite of somewhat eccentric habits, of vast wealth, and marked individuality of character, who has lived among us these many years. His most pronounced quality of mind is expressed in his own almost pathetic confession "that avarice was with him a disease." With a clear head and subtle mind for business; with habits of industry that sought no recreation; with an energy that was untiring; with habits of personal economy verging upon painful self-denial of dress and even food; with a sharp instinct of business policy that taught him that honesty would pay and that an honorable regard for his word was a wise discretion; with a reputable record in business transactions, he accumulated a large fortune. He became rich, and nothing more. The keenest pang he ever experienced was that younger men with better luck made more money, and distanced him in the pursuit of wealth. Out of his vast accumulations he leaves to San Francisco charities a mere pittance. The will prepared for him by his attorney and friend, John B. Felton, gave six hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the University of California, and other thousands to charity; but no sooner had the generous heart of Felton been silenced in death than Michael, true to his instinct, withdrew the deposit he had made in heaven, and gave it to his relatives in Chicago. These charitable pittances are but a partial restoration to the public of what he has somewhat rudely gathered from it. One of the curious incidents of Michael's death is in the gushing notices he has received from the press, under the impression that he had left more than a million in public charities. "Noble," "unselfish," "generous," "self-denying gentleman," are some of the expressions employed, and his little parsimonious eccentricities of life were by the San Francisco press condoned, excused, and interpreted in the light of "self-denial." "Not living for himself," explained the Bulletin. "Agent in his life for benevolent institutions," echoed a press that during his long and not dishonorable business career had omitted no opportunity to wound and insult him. If they take any other San Francisco journals in the spirit land than the ARGONAUT, how Michael and his friends will enjoy reading them. The merry laugh of our genial friend Felton will ring out above the music of the golden harps and angel chorus as he appreciates the joke. If Michael Reese was as the Bulletin avers but "the agent of benevolent institutions," we respectfully suggest that five per cent. is not a fair accounting of his trust, and should he be summoned at the bar of that high court of chancery to marshal his assets and make a showing of his accounts. He will most assuredly be mulcted in damages, unless Felton is there with his logic and his eloquence to help his friend Michael win his last suit at the highest court of ultimate appeal. To us the life and example of Michael Reese are not altogether lovely. From the Chronicle we take the salient points: Born in Bavaria; poor; an immigrant to America when young; a tanner's apprentice; a peddler; a merchant; a bankrupt; a negro slave-trader; an army contractor; a speculator; a money-lender; a broker; a bachelor; occupying meanly furnished apartments; moving to San Mateo to escape taxation; and to his intimate friends admitting that "avarice was a disease with him." Without record so far as we ever heard of a generous act or a charitable deed saving to his relations, he passes from an unloved life to an unregretted death, leaving "a well conditioned estate variously estimated at from five to ten millions." What a feeble foot-print has this rich man left in the sands of time. We have washed it out, and the memory of Michael

Reese will be forgotten and his name alone will be preserved in marble over an obscure grave in the little village of Wallerstein, in Bavaria, and yet with his great fortune, and his keen, active, subtle brain, what a magnificent monument he might have reared here in this city that has been so generous to him! What a noble practical and splendid charity he could have endowed, and with it associated his memory for all generations and all time to come! Old barber Time is now calling for the "next gentleman."

The Constitution of this State provides that taxation shall be equal; but it is not, and it has never been. There seems to be great difficulty in organizing any system of collecting revenue that equalizes the burden of government. This difficulty is not only experienced in California—a new State—in the United States, a Republic; but in the oldest, best organized, and best governed countries of Europe the same difficulty exists. The inequality of taxation is especially observable in the city of San Francisco. The owners of personal property resort to every possible device to hide their possessions from the assessor, and the result is that the burden falls upon real property. There is in round numbers only about $50,000,000 of personal property in this city subject to taxation. Yet we have two firms, each composed of four individuals, that are worth more than $50,000,000. Messrs. Stanford, Huntington, Crocker, and the Hopkins estate are worth, independent of the railroad property—also owned and controlled by them—more than $50,000,000. Messrs. Flood, Mackay, Fair, and the O'Brien estate are worth more than $50,000,000, independent of their mines, forests, roads, and mills in Nevada. The Spring Valley Water Company is valued at $12,000,000. The City Gas franchise is selling in the market at $10,000,000. We have a hundred gentlemen doing business and resident in this city who are millionaires. In addition to those we have named are several individuals whose wealth varies from five to ten millions, and a score who are worth more than two millions. If to these tremendous fortunes we estimate the aggregate of thousands of prosperous and wealthy citizens, the immense sums represented by bank, mining, railway, and other corporations, our immense stocks of goods in warehouses and stores—the sum total would swell to an incredible amount. Foreign bankers, insurance men, and merchants succeed in contributing almost nothing to the maintenance of our government. Corporations boldly claim that their capital is exempt from taxation; that notes, mortgages, bonds, and legal obligations are only evidences of value, and not property subject to taxation; that franchises, rights, and privileges—no matter how valuable, or how large may be the income therefrom—are not taxable. There is a very specious and subtle line of argument sustaining this view of the laws that it is difficult to answer. Our corporations and men of wealth spare no exertions to avoid taxation. They employ counsel; they interpose the law's delay; they drive our courts to extremes of nicest interpretation of statutes to avoid bearing their just burdens. It is to this point that we desire to call the attention of our wealthy fellow-citizens, and to appeal to them to do their duty. Not less than $200,000,000 of wealth avoids taxation in San Francisco. If all were equally and fairly taxed, we should scarcely feel the burdens of government; and if to this there could be an economical and honest administration, our burdens would be light indeed. Real estate can not hide; it must therefore almost alone support a municipal and State government. The farmers throughout the State, the homestead and small real estate owners of the towns, are intelligent. They understand this condition of things. They are indignant, and they resent the wrong put upon them. And hence it is—and most natural, too—that when passion and violence organize upon the sand-lots in opposition to wealth and wealthy corporations, the great conservative, thinking mass of real property owners looks with complacent indifference to the threats of agitators, and even votes with them. Now, this Convention to reorganize the Constitution is virtually in the hands of the great corporations. Most of the delegates were chosen by them, and the Convention will be under the control of the moneyed interests. We mean by this that the guiding influences that will surround and direct the deliberations of the Convention will come from the wealthy class. Hence we appeal to that class to do its duty honestly, and give to the people of California equal taxation—first, because it is right; and, second, because it is politic and wise. Property and wealth have no protection nor safety under a republican form of government, except so far as just laws shall be honestly administered by the people. Wealth is always in the minority; and whenever the time shall come that the majority—to wit, the not wealthy class—shall feel that it is being imposed upon by unjust laws, made and administered in the interest of a moneyed or social class, at that moment our government will begin to decay, and wealth will turn to ashes. So we say to this Convention, give us laws taxing all property equally. The people will not be content with any specious reasoning, that says to the farmer who has land worth ten thousand dollars—upon which the village bank has a mortgage of five thousand dollars—that he must pay all the taxes. The citizen of the town will not be satisfied with the reasoning that makes him pay a tax of $250 on $10,000 worth of real estate, while his neighbor pays nothing on $10,000 worth of gas stock. If a water company is only mains and hydrants; a gas company only pipes, holders, and old iron; a railway only ties, rails, cars, cables, and horses—then a building is only second-hand lumber, and old nails, brick, stones, laths, slack-lime, and sand. We know all about the argument that declares that only things should be taxed; but we declare that it is our conviction that all rights, privileges, and franchises that produce money should be taxed. Everything is property that earns. Everything is property that produces. Let us illustrate by a printing office. The ARGONAUT is taxed upon a valuation of $2,500. It earns more money every month than any brick building worth $50,000; it ought to be taxed for $50,000. The morning Call is worth $300,000. Mr. Pickering would not take that amount of money for it. It would bring that in the market. It earns an income on that valuation, yet it is taxed on a valuation of say $7,000—its type, presses, and office furniture. A property in houses and lands worth $300,000, after paying street assessments, insurance, and other expenses incident to real property, would pay this year a tax of $7,500, while Mr. Pickering would pay a tax of $17.50. This is illogical, unjust, and insupportable. It is an unfair discrimination against one kind of property in favor of another. It is unequal taxation. If Mr. Pickering should reply to this argument—he will not, because the great dailies never notice the ARGONAUT—he will answer "the argument of an obscure weekly cotemporary" by saying that $293,000 of the Call property is "good will," and not therefore taxable as property. Our reply is, call it what you please, "good will," or a franchise as common carrier of small advertisements, it earns an income upon a value of $300,000, is worth $300,000, and ought to pay a tax upon that amount; and that there is no argument, in conscience or good morals, that can avoid the logic of this conclusion. Bank stock, insurance stock, and stock of every corporation, should be taxed the full market value. If all would pay, it would be an easy burden to carry; if all shirk this duty, and the motto of our classes rich in personal property shall be, "The devil and the tax-collector catch all who can not hide," then communism and agrarianism will not seem such portentous evils to those who have too much real estate and too little personal property. Our whole scheme of taxation is an imposition upon real property. This tax must be paid. The official grasps it with an iron hand. To-day the tax on real estate is due; to-morrow it is delinquent, with a penalty of five per cent. added; the next day it is sold, and the buyer may demand fifty per cent. for its redemption. If by accident or inability the tax remains unpaid, the sovereign authority declares the certificate prima facie evidence of title. If through a broken sidewalk a drunken fool breaks his worthless neck, the damage is a lien on the lot. The street contractor plots its improvement, and the owner is forced to submit to the cost of printing, surveying, superintending, and stealing, and the swindling aggregate of stealings becomes a lien upon the property "improved," bearing interest at one per cent. per month, against which the statute of limitations does not run. Real property is the goose that lays the golden egg, and there is an army of politicians and contractors conspiring and confederating to kill the goose. An organization should be perfected to guard this property from depredation—a real estate self-defense society. The true rule of assessing, say the water company, is to fix its value according to the market cash value of its stock, and then exempt all the things that go to make up the corporate value. Assess the gas company at say $8,000,000, and exempt from taxation its lands, houses, holders, furnaces, coal, coke, pipes, etc., that are owned by it. Assess the Call at $300,000, and exempt its type, presses, and office furniture. This, it is said, is taxing brains. All right, then tax brains. We admit that it is a high valuation to put upon the contents of Mr. Pickering's hat, but if that brain can produce earnings upon a valuation of $297,000, it ought to pay the tax. The product of brain and luck ought not to be exempt from taxation any more than muscle. A cow is taxed that gives milk, a sheep that yields a fleece, why not a brain that through the medium of small advertisements and small editorials can earn money? We call the attention of Constitutional delegates to this line of reflection.

Kearney is the wild clamor of an undefined discontent. His is a crazy but earnest protest against wrongs the causes of which he does not understand and the remedies for which he cannot prescribe. Kearney is a hound on the scent. His is not a musical, but it is an honest bark; and we know the beast is there. Kearney is a voice crying in the wilderness of Massachusetts, "Prepare ye the way for Ben Butler to be Governor, and make his path straight to the Presidential chair." If there had been no Chinese in California, there had been no Kearney. Kearneys will multiply in the nation till reforms begin.

We apologize to Senator Nunan for our editorial last week. He is not in anywise connected with the expenditure of moneys upon Lobos Square. A street contractor named Nunan is engaged with Senator Rogers in doing this work; hence our mistake.

PRATTLE.

It is hardly fair for General Grant's "plutic friends" to so vehemently protest against his evident intention of again being a candidate for the Presidency. In former struggles for that exalted position he has twice won the country's respect by success. It is natural that he should wish to regain his own by defeat.

The declaration of Servian independence is to be made on the twenty-second day of the current month. This is impudent! Does Serbia suppose these United States will submit to have the Fourth of July shuffled about in the calendar at the caprice of a petty principality?

It is suggested that Serbia's Declaration of Independence begin with the following glittering generality: "When in the course of European diplomacy it becomes necessary for one people to let another dissolve the political bands which have connected them with a third, and to assume among the powers of the earth the desperate and unequal station to which the will of an International Congress condemns them, a decent respect to the cannon of their protectors requires that they should say nothing about the causes which compel them to accept the situation."

Mr. Foster, who has been nominated for Congress by an Ohio Republican convention, declares that the President has alienated the sympathies of his party. Do not wholly condemn him: he has done it without enlisting the sympathies of the other party.

In explanation of his interview with Kearney, Ben. Butler states that it is his habit to call on any gentleman of prominence coming to Boston to whom he thinks his visit would be agreeable. Hope he does not make any mistakes in this matter; it would be extremely embarrassing if he should some day call upon a gentleman of prominence who had just pocketed a lot of silver ware from the hotel table, and had not had time to lock it up.

The sons of toil are beginning to impose their horny hands on labor-saving machinery; the eastern skies are luminous o' nights with an auroral glow of consuming reapers, and the smoke of the mower's burning ascendeth up forever and ever. The agricultural laborer of the period, with his muscles of tireless steel, his simple wants and his no vote, is become a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night; and those chosen people, the tramps, emancipated from the Egyptian bondage of labor to possess the promised land of indolence,

"Eye the blue vault and bless the useful light."

Contemporaneously there sits in Washington a committee of Congress gravely considering the "labor question"—whatever that may mean—respectfully listening to arguments against machinery, and endeavoring in all sincerity to hit upon a practicable method of "engrafting" upon this Government the ten thousand times discredited function of providing for the able-bodied poor. And this is only the eleventh decade of "Government by the people for the people." There is a lower deep of political degradation than this, but it is occupied by Mexico.

For the people indeed! Let me ask you, reader, what is meant by that expression, "the people," when employed in its political sense? "Obviously the entire population of this country"—so you will be likely to reply if you speak without reflection. Scrutinize the mental conception and you will find it does not embrace either the wealthy or the educated classes. Nor does it include those who hold office—"servants of the people" as they humbly designate themselves. Whenever in the discussions of the last thirty years a politician has said "the people" he has implied antagonism and menace, forecasting the present attitude of the thing he has meant; for the poor and ignorant majority to whom he has given the name has at last justified his hinted threat and is in veiled rebellion against property and intelligence. You may dispute this assertion; also you may tie up your head in a bag and swear the sun is a pansy-colored hippopotamus in a fantail coat with piebald buttons.

"Remember, my son, in whose honor you're named—
The holy St. Stephen, in martyrdom famed.
His fate in your memory, child, do you keep?"
"Yes; they rocked him to sleep, mother, rocked him to sleep."

My good friend Barbarossa, the gastronome, had done the late Mr. Michael Reese a service, and the latter invited him to dinner, asking him to designate a suitable restaurant for that religious rite. Naturally Barbarossa bethought him of a friend of his, a pauvre diable of a Frenchman, who, catering not wisely but too well, had brought himself to the dizzy brink of ruin; and to his place they went, Mr. Reese begging his guest to order the dinner. Delighted with the double opportunity to serve his needy friend and himself, Barbarossa nominated the most costly comestibles in savage profusion, while the rarest wines of the sad-eyed chef poured in copious tides, till the two were bellied like tuns, and the great blonde beard of the guest was dripping drunk in its every hair, the close-handed capitalist, as if dominated by some mad caprice of prodigality, ever inciting him to new extravagance. The feast being at an end the two passed into the street, Mr. Reese not even deigning to look at the waiting restaurateur, much less settle his stupendous bill. Barbarossa ventured to remonstrate: "The man knows us both—he'll send the bill to me." "Don't buy it," was the reassuring reply; "he's a denant of mine, but he gif me nod my rent. I eats ope his account und owet he goes."

According to the dismal statistics of the coroner, there have been in this city, during the last sixteen years, 687 known cases of successful suicide, of which number 103 were accomplished within the last twelve months. These figures represent a ratio of suicides to population about three times greater than any other city in the world can honestly claim; although the proportion of women is here considerably smaller than elsewhere. If our laws for the discouragement of murder were more stringently enforced we should, no doubt, be able to make an even better showing than we do; it being an apparently unanswerable objection to that form of offense that in many cases the man who (not unnaturally, it must be confessed) prefers to take the life of another would, if restrained by fear of the death penalty, take his own instead—an arrangement preferable in many respects to his victim. Insanity, too, draws off many whose rightful place is in the ghastly ranks of suicide; and many "self-murders" that ought to occur are at least postponed by marriage, a not uncommon expedient of desperate youth. Of course, murder, insanity, and marriage are rife, also, in other cities, but—excepting the last—not in such unreasonable excess.

I hope it is plain enough from the foregoing remarks that I flatly disapprove of murder, and do not favor insanity—except in poets. Of marriage I prefer to say nothing; it is thought by many to be excusable, and some have even extolled it. The morality of suicide each must determine for himself; its expedience is largely a question of method. It is seldom advisable to commit it with whisky, and never, I think, with gin. In any case, I would counsel the victim of mental depression to try the consolation of wealth before taking with his eyes open a step which he will find it difficult to retrace with them closed.

In writing (reluctantly) of suicide I am reminded of the fate of a negro minstrel, related in a recent press telegram. This unfortunate cut his throat just before his time to go upon the stage. The melancholy event occurred, I have reason to believe, in this way. In sabling his visage with burnt cork the deceased had inadvertently neglected to "leave a mouth," and was testily, perhaps harshly, informed by the stage manager that he must not appear without one. There was no water handy, time pressed, a razor lay suggestively near, and—in short, the regulation "mouth" being unattainable the poor fellow made the best imitation he knew how.

Observe the end-man's end! Serene
He lies beneath these stones.
His life he lived as Tambourine,
Yet, at the last, he's Bones.

A correspondent of the Chronicle mentions a freezing day in New York when his champagne was nearly "Frippi." What a cold "spell."

The Kearney meeting in Faneuil Hall, Boston (alas that the Cradle of Liberty should have been defiled by this mis-born manikin of a nobody's darling!) voided a sequence of resolutions whose sanguinary articulations resembled links of blood sausage. In the first of these "dread resolves" it is asserted that this Republic "saps the blood of the National industries, so that it can be lapped up by the vampires of capital." This is stronger than honey and sweeter than a lion. It stimulates the sentiments and tightens the understanding. In its power upon the imagination it exceeds the sun-saluting carol of a dawn-wandering idiot, the low, luxurious drone of a dozing dunce, or the wild, weird ululation of a hill-top fool in the gloaming.

During his Faneuil Hall speech Mr. Kearney was repeatedly interrupted by irrelevant exclamations and flat contradictions, as if a multitude of "political opponents" were clamoring at him from obscure corners. Vainly the orator affected to ignore the unmannerly conspiracy; the voices drowned his own discourse, and as each hesitating sentence prematurely expired upon his lips there succeeded the spacious volubility of some noble sentiment filling the conscious pause with sonorous good sense, or some rattling truth leapt like a thunderbolt athwart the suspended argument, severing it as a filament of flax is parted by flame, and blasting both the thought that went before and the thought that was to come. Angry, chagrined, and bereft of all patience, Mr. Kearney finally made an intemperate appeal to the police to "put them d—dirty blaggards out!" "Can't be did," gravely replied a civic functionary, toying thoughtfully with his idle baton, "them's the reg'lar echoes of this hall. They aint got the hang o' yer lingo, but they're givin' ye the best they got. You oughtn't to woke 'em." Kearney faintly asked the secretary of the meeting to read the resolutions, and a cobwebby niche responded with a malediction on George III.

Mr. Oettinger of this city is trying to compel Mr. Hoffman to pay him $2,500 because he was bitten by Mr. Hoffman's dog. This is exorbitant; Mr. Hoffman might almost as well give him the dog!

I have before me a letter, inclosed in which one of my pleasant paragraphs returned to this office like the dove to the ark. It was an experimental paragraph, thrown off as a "feeler" for pro-coolie sympathies, but the flood of race antipathy has apparently not subsided; it found no rest for the sole of its foot, and couldn't hang on anywhere by its toe nails. So it returned, accompanied by a letter in which the popular side of the "burning question" is supported by the characteristic argument that the senior editor of this paper was once engaged in "robing widows and orphans in black male sutes." I am sorry to say that from the meagre particulars of this amazing charge it does not clearly appear whether the culprit dissembled his guilt under the character of a philanthropist, a tailor, or an armorer; but through the bald abridgment of the accusation, and the dazing ambiguity of its spelling, his crimes "glitter like a swarm of fire-flies tangled in a silver braid;" and now that he has been pointed out to Justice I expect him to imitate "great Orion" by "sloping slowly to the west."

It is consolatory to reflect that should this malefactor escape to one of the South Sea Islands he will be unable to practice his questionable specialty in misdemeanor; for there the widows and "orphens" are already "robed" in black "sutes"—of male or female fashion according to the sex of the wearer. Need I add (blushing)—must I confess (hiding my face) that I allude to their—their skins?

In a letter to the Bulletin, descriptive of the city prison in which he had the sombre luck to be cast, "F."—presumably Dr. Favor—says:

"Vice is a monster of such hideous mien
That to be hated needs but to be seen;
But seen too oft becomes familiar to our face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

The charge of manslaughter against him being lightly dismissed by the prosecuting officer, Dr. Favor holds that his imprisonment was unjust; but it by no means, follows that because a man with so malevolent an endowment of capacity for misquotation has not as yet had a good opportunity to take life he should be permitted to run at large, while dogs that are seen to be full of the "promise and potency" of hydrophobia are hunted down and killed. Dr. Favor should be gently but firmly remanded to solitary confinement until he learn that literary malpractice is as bad as medical. I dare say he would take it as an affront to his profession if I should go to one of his headache patients and hack off a leg, or thrust a butcher's-knife into the thorax of a man with a ring-worm.

In Fresno, where the acorns all are blasted,
The pigs, to show their mourning, droop half-masted.

The Californian shepherd—by the way, what has the word "shepherd" done that it should have been kicked out of the vocabulary?—does not appear to have acquired the meeker virtues of the gentle animals over which he exercises a mild sway pointed by dog-bites. A party of these nomads recently visited a settlement which had been hastily abandoned by the Indian-fearing whites, and did most wickedly and calamitously pillage and despoil the same. They desolated that "outpost of civilization" with the frenzy of a Band of Hope raiding a rye-field, or a gang of callow geologists devastating a brick-yard. One of the settlers who ventured back to reconnoiter, was asked on his return to camp if the Bannacks had been there. "No," he said, reflectively, "no, I think they must have passed round to the north—considering all that is left. No, the Bannacks would have taken more things away." "Then things remain pretty much as we left them?" "Well, not quite—there have been changes. The latitude and longitude are there."

At a pigeon-shooting match at Hagerstown, Mr. Samuel Donohue had the misfortune to stand at the wrong end of a gun.

The sportsmen gathered round the spot
To sorrow for their dear dead shot;
And e'en the pigeons—such their love—
Became each one a mourning dove.
You don't believe? No more do I;
I'm civil, though, to men who die—
Of whom some good is rightly said,
'To make them feel they're surely dead.

Professor Hughes, the microphone man, says his experiments with that instrument point to the conclusion that it is not through our ears but through our bones that we hear ourselves talk. How comes it, then, that Heaven has endowed with ears of such imperial magnitude the men who are most enamored of their own discourse?

ENGLAND, TURKEY, AND RUSSIA.

Some years ago the brilliant Spanish essayist, Castelar, likened Russia to a great octopus, devilish reaching out its Briarean tentacles to grasp and suck into its maw the various nationalities of Europe and Asia. A few months ago this figure was more startlingly presented in the shape of a widely circulated cartoon. The cartoon, though increasing the fears of the other continental nations of Europe, failed to arouse them into forming an alliance with England to stay the Muscovite legions from conquering Turkey; and the English being divided among themselves, which prevented a single-handed earlier interference, that tottering empire was compelled to succumb. The great body of the English people, however, at length opened their eyes to the sagacious policy of their astute prime minister, and nearly all opposition was withdrawn to whatever bold and warlike policy he might choose to pursue in the premises, the more quickly impelled to this by reason of the world's hisses about the cowardice and waning influence of their country. Consequently, preparations for war against Russia were openly and vigorously proceeded with.

The latter, meantime, had extorted from prostrate Turkey, at the gates of her capital, a humiliating treaty, which left the conquering party arbiter of the situation. England declared that such treaty should not be carried into effect. This appeared to inevitably join the issue and precipitate an early conflict between these mighty powers. The bon mot of Bismarck, that it would be like a fight between a whale and an elephant—not amounting to much because neither could get at the other—was accepted as an acquiescence on the part of the continental nations to let the two animals go at each other as best they could. And Germany being regarded by the others as a sort of lesser octopus, and, therefore, friendly with its species, all eyes were turned toward England to learn her final determination.

For many weeks a trembling suspense was felt regarding the convening of a congress to adjust matters peaceably. The great Russian bear growled a fierce defiance. The old British lion shook his mane and roared back a savage response. It was thought by many the time had passed for such peaceful settlement, and that no congress would convene. But when from far off India was heard the concerting blood-cry of Britain's Bengal tigers, Russia consented to its assembling. When Schouvaloff essayed therein to arouse the fears of that Congress and of all Europe regarding the rise of another Tamerlane or Genghis Kahn, who would lead his countless hosts from Asia, armed with the best modern weapons, to overwhelm and conquer Christendom, it was seen, by the reflecting, that Russia was appalled at the potency of England and her dusky allies, and was prepared, unless the other Powers of Europe stood by her, to yield to England's demands. But these Powers not entering into the views of Schouvaloff, or dreading less the remote and problematical irruption of the Asian tigers to the immediate danger from the European octopus, refused to hearken to the wily Russian diplomat; and the great English premier, conscious of being master of the situation, told the Russian that that Congress had nothing to do with such questions.

To this must be supplemented England's vast wealth and facility for raising any amount of that important "sinew of war," money. At the same time her far-reaching statesmen brought their financial influence to bear upon the great money-lenders of Europe and prevented Russia obtaining a loan from them.

Thus was the octopus scotched, and thus did England's statesmen, confident of the force they could bring to bear to sustain their diplomacy, dictate the action of that Congress, dwarf the representatives of the other nations in council there assembled, and, simultaneously, enter into an important independent alliance with Turkey, by which this Power surrenders the island of Cyprus to England, and virtually becomes an appanage of this the grandest empire the world has known—an empire, compared with which Imperial Rome, in her palmiest day, appears insignificant.

Gladstone and his followers in Parliament denounce the Anglo-Turkish Convention on the ground that it leads to an inevitable conflict between England and Russia. This conflict was inevitable, at no distant day, whether such convention, with similar arrangements, had been held and made or not. The advantages accruing to England from the sagacious foresight and bold diplomacy of Beaconsfield and co-terie, is in giving to their country the vantage ground which Russia was stealthily seeking.

Potempkin, to please the eye of the Empress Catharine, on her visit to the Black Sea, a century ago, to emphasize the will of Peter the Great, and flatter the aspirations of the Russians, had inscribed on a southern gateway leading out from Moscow, with a finger pointer, "This is the road to Constantinople." Since then the Russian autocrats and statesmen, as well as people, have been constantly reading such inscriptions, and several times started with large armies along that thoroughfare, to plant the double-headed eagle standard upon the ramparts of Byzantium. But such inscription must now be erased. Russia will never reach that long-coveted goal of her ambition. The Congress of Berlin has interposed an impassable barrier, and Russia will not be permitted to acquire one foot more territory in Europe, and possibly not in Asia; but, rather, to lose some of what she has. England's Asian policy, with which the other European nations will act in concert—at least for their safety sanction—will estop further territorial expansion of the great Slavic Empire.

It being no longer necessary, except temporarily, to uphold Turkish rule in Europe to impede the encroachments of Russia, a few years hence will witness the departure of the crescent emblem across the Bosphorus, and the rechristening of the mosque of Omar with its ancient appellation, the church of St. Sophia.

The boundaries of the new kingdom of Roumania will then be extended south to the Balkan mountains, those of Greece up to and along that line to the Black Sea, excluding Constantinople, which with a strip of territory along the northern border of the Bosphorus and Dardanelles will be made a free city, under the joint protectorate of the nations of Europe. Austria has virtually secured, by the late Berlin Congress, the incorporation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Serbia.

English capitalists, bonused and backed by their government, will commence building a railroad from the Bosphorus to the Persian Gulf, with a branch to some port upon the Levant near Cyprus; and, in time, a grand trunk road, to connect with this, passing through Persia and Afghanistan to the British Dependency of Hindostan, over which latter several thousand miles of such roads now run.

This bars Russia's design of cutting off England's communication with her Asiatic dominion, by dominating Armenia, Persia, and Afghanistan. But English supremacy in Hindostan is constantly jeopardized by the intrigues and aspirations of her great, jealous rival. Both seek to dominate Asia. To foment disaffection and insurrection among England's Hindoo subjects is the policy of Russia. England has good ground to dread this. All her writers upon English rule in Hindostan clearly admit it. Her statesmen constantly manifest it. This has impelled these statesmen to seek an ally in Asia, which having a common fear of the encroachments of Russia upon their respective territories, and having power to repel it, can be relied upon to make common cause against her. This ally is China.

During the past few years a vast change has taken place in British opinion and policy regarding the Chinese. From treating them as inferiors, and undertaking to dominate over and dictate to them, their sapient statesmen have sought to place the two nations upon a footing of equality; the Chinese, meantime, abating their arrogance and contemptuous treatment of the other races. In every way have they ingratiated themselves with these Mongol millions. The foreign commerce of China, not controlled by the Chinese, is almost wholly in English hands, or subordinated to it. At the court of Peking, their minister is almost alone harkened to among the diplomatic corps. The statesmen of England have been first to appreciate that Chinese statesmen are as subtle, sagacious, and comprehensive as themselves. Instead, therefore, of joining the false and foolish outcry, so prevalent in our country, about the Chinese and Japanese being narrow-minded and unprogressive, they recognize the fact that since the breaking down of their walls of exclusion by the Christian nations, thus enforcing a common world relation with them, they have become the most progressive people, in many respects, on earth. In fact, the Chinese, in consequence of their great numbers, have proven too progressive and aggressive to suit many of us. The outflowing of China's redundant population into British and American lands, and their rapid acquisition of so many of the money-making ideas and appliances of the "outside barbarians," which, added to their own, including their habits of industry, frugality, sobriety, and thrift, are so shoving aside the white race as to demand some interposition to stop the further influx of such overslaughing people to our shores.

Our Chinese minister, now in San Francisco, as well as one of the interviewed members of the recently arrived Chinese embassy, give it as their opinion that Chinese immigration to our shores, as well as others, will continue as long as they can make more money in such countries than at home. That is, the Mongol outflow, if left free, will spread over the world until labor rates everywhere shall be equalized with those in China.

British statesmen will seek to stay this Chinese deluging of their demesnes by opening an outlet for such migration into the less populous portions of Asia. To the north of China proper lies a vast and thinly-populated territory. Over this region, China, by virtue of her Tartar conquerors' rights, once held sway even to the north of the great River Amoor. It was their fatherland. This has been gradually encroached upon by Russia, and incorporated in that empire. Twenty years ago, during the war waged by England and France against China, Russia was solicited by these allies to participate, in order to compel the Chinese Government to come into proper treaty relations with the Christian Powers, and treat their subjects, trading with China, properly. Russia declined, but took advantage of the opportunity to press China into ceding to that Power all of the Mantchooria territory (300,000 square miles) lying south of the Amoor, nearly as far as the peninsula of Corea. China must be anxious to recover this territory, and a portion of the secret arrangement between the Chinese and the English Governments is doubtless an understanding that in the event of a rupture between England and Russia, China will become a participant in the war, as an ally of England, and thus regain Mantchooria, as well as better fortify her other long northern boundary between Russia, reaching to the centre of Asia.

And here in this centre of such continent is where the conflict between England and Russia will commence—a conflict that can not much longer be stayed off.

Kashgaria, the furthest western limit of the Chinese Empire, was reconquered a few months ago, having fifteen years previously revolted and regained its independence. This borders on Turkistan, in which Russia has been recently making inroads, having conquered and annexed the Khanate of Khiva about five years ago, and is now concentrating armies there to make further conquests and secure a strong point d'appui, or commanding position, from whence to menace English India, whose northwestern boundary approximates such locality.

The great Himalaya range of mountains will be agreed upon between England and China as the natural and unchangeable boundary between their possessions, and their alliance will tend to forestall the machinations of Russia in stirring up the Hindoos to revolt against the mastery of the former.

When Schouvaloff, in the Berlin Congress, suggested that it would be well for Europe to prohibit the exportation from thence to China of arms of precision, he affected ignorance of the fact that Chinese and Japanese factories are turning out such arms of a quality equal to the best European, and in the event of a greater demand for them, such factories can be increased to any extent. It is folly to suppose that an ingenious and remarkably imitative race like these Mongols, who had invented and used gunpowder, fire-arms, the magnetic needle, printing, and other arts and sciences long before such were known in Europe, are now incapable of competing with these Europeans in such things. The Chinese are also building gunboats, and casting cannon of various calibre. They are indifferent to death, and savage fighters when aroused, and if well drilled and armed, led by European commanders of capacity and enranked with regiments of European soldiery, there is no question but they will prove formidable in battle against any foe.

Russia's late rapidly increasing influence in Europe has not only been stayed but backset. She has been foiled in her aggressive and annexing movements toward Constantinople, or any portion of European Turkey. She has, too, taken her last slice of Assyrian Turkey. It was a politic move of Beaconsfield not to oppose, as an ultimatum, her keeping the circumscribed area of Kars, with its little port of Batoum, since a railroad from Trebizond via Erzeroum to connect with the road leading from Constantinople to the Persian Gulf will neutralize Russia's commercial and military importance there. Moreover, in the event of a war with England the latter's fleet would soon render Batoum of no value to Russia as an army supply base. In fact, the Anglo-Turkish Convention was the most masterly diplomatic coup ever performed, and taken in connection with the action of the Berlin Congress, effectually forestalls all further progress of Russia southward to the west of the Caspian sea. The great question as to Russian and English policy to the east of that inland sea looms up in grand and startling proportions. To what extent their policy and interests may clash, and what forces each may be able to bring to bear, opens a vast field for speculation. Whilst England is more harmonious at home than she has been for several generations, the threatened internal convulsions in Russia must be taken in such consideration.

It is the interest of the Western Powers of Europe to uphold the policy of England in Asia, since it was the strength given to England by her Asian dependencies and her alliances, including Turkey and China, that enabled her to checkmate Russia, and relieve those nations of any dread of Russian domination. Germany, perhaps, may be an exception, and feel somewhat chagrined at the turn of affairs, since it has shorn this new Power of much of her recently acquired prestige and importance. Beaconsfield has eclipsed Bismarck as much as England has eclipsed Germany. The immense power capable of being wielded by England, by reason of her Asiatic alliances and resources, and protectorate of them against the aggressions of Russia and Germany, will induce the remainder of the European States to remain firm allies of that dominating Power of the globe. Austria's interests are now so interwoven with English policy as to insure that Empire's earnest alliance with her. France, likewise, will cooperate with such policy. She must be delighted at England's overshadowing Germany, and is all the more encouraged as to an early recovery of Alsace and Lorraine. American writers appear not to comprehend, and European ones who do are restrained from policy in stating fully the vast significance of this Berlin Congress settlement, and England's Turkish and other Asiatic alliances. The masterly moves of Beaconsfield have severed long-wavering Austria from all subservency to, or participation in, Russian schemes of aggrandizement, and released her from any dread of Germanic dictation. England, France, and Austria are now in full accord.

The bold and successful diplomacy of Beaconsfield and of the Cabinet who supported him, in opposition to that of Derby, Gladstone, Hartington, Bright, Fawcett, and others advocating their short-sighted and timid policy, marks the difference between genius and talent. Genius has prescience and clearly perceives victory through certain apparently reckless and defiant movements, where talent sees only danger, insurmountable obstacles, and disaster. Gladstone and Derby reprehended the daring project of Beaconsfield in bringing Indian troops to Europe and agreeing to a protectorate of Asiatic Turkey, without, too, first obtaining the assent of Parliament, and would, doubtless, have yielded to Gortschakoff's and Bismarck's proposition to totally dismember Turkey, England to receive Egypt as her share of the spoils. This would have left Russia master of the situation and endangered England's East Indian possessions and Asian supremacy.

There are times when men of genius should be placed at the head of affairs and given free scope to work out their plans. The English people appear to have appreciated that another such period in their history has now arrived, and will doubtless give to the Jew Disraeli the same carte blanche for action as that bestowed upon the younger Pitt. The world has knowledge of what he has accomplished; I have attempted to faintly outline what I deem to be his grand schemes for the future. He has placed England upon a lofty pinnacle of greatness. It is for him and worthy successors to securely pro and keep her there.

If not deemed irrelevant to the subject-matter of this essay, I would, in closing, query: Why is it that this composite of Angles, Saxons, Normans, and Celts composing the British people, whose homeland is but two islands of circumscribed extent, have now a government of such puissance, controlling an empire the mightiest the world has ever witnessed; an empire prosperous and progressive; when we, their American descendants, made up of the same European races and possessing for our homeland a vast continent, containing unparalleled natural resources, are internally convulsed, have but just passed through a devastating, bloody struggle among ourselves, and are portentously threatened with a far worse one, with a currency deranged, commerce drying up or passing into foreign hands, all industries paralyzed, millions of idlers verging on starvation, individuals and the nation on the brink of bankruptcy, with every sound economic theory ignored by those who have the conduction of affairs, and a general destruction of the entire governmental fabric and social organism imminent? Wherefore this contrast? Is it not because England possesses a normal form of government, and we an abnormal one? The first calls to the helm of her affairs the best intellects to be found within her borders, whatever their class, race, or condition in society. She seeks out gentlemen, statesmen, and scholars, and places them in her public posts. We choose trafficking politicians and asses for ours. "The tree is known by its fruit."

THE TWO LIONS OF KER-FOOS.

A Thrilling Adventure in Central Africa.

In 1851 a grand missionary expedition was organized by the Marchioness de Fontainebleau, a fashionable zealot, who had come into an enormous fortune by the death of her husband, and who wished to expiate, by some extraordinary Christian effort, her sins in having shored that husband's life some twenty years. I believe the Marchioness was by all odds the gayest devotee of which missionary records make any mention. But she was not only beautiful, fascinating, and light-headed, but brave, reckless, and original to the last degree. The expedition that set out from Zanzibar included several of her admirers, and was accompanied by herself and several other reckless and beautiful friends of hers. The intention was, I believe, to found a missionary colony on Lake Tanganyika, under the auspices of Abbe St. Palm, but the expedition was diverted from the fine macadamized road, which Speke had made through that country, by the fierce opposition of the Hijiidis, and went up along the eastern shore of Lake Nyanza.

Probably no such caravan ever before set out at any time. The Dutch Governor of Zanzibar had provided a company of troops and a brass band, in addition to which there were fifty well-mounted Boloch soldiers, and a large provision and mule train. The first six weeks of the journey resembled a continuous picnic—the Marchioness, with characteristic lightness, called it a movable feast. There were in her retinue twelve adventurous gentlemen, who played the parts of knights, lovers, and champions, and made the wilderness ring with their sports and songs. I presume all of us were perfectly willing to die in the service of the Marchioness. There is no denying it, she exerted some kind of charm over us that was irresistible. I believe she favored me a little, whether it was on account of my American recklessness and wild humor I do not know (alas! every one of the party believed she favored him), but she laughed at my jokes, and applauded my plantation songs when the ballads of Provence, sung by the Abbe St. Palm himself, did not rouse her, and the Duke of Eltonshire's wild stories sometimes seemed to bore her.

It is not my intention to describe that expedition, of which you have no doubt read a great many of the wild and romantic stories that have been printed. It is only necessary that you should understand its character in order to appreciate the incredible circumstance which happened to me. At the end of about eight weeks—which had passed like an Oriental tale—undisturbed by any other untoward incidents than the death of Count Ratiffa by the fever, and the loss of our milch cows by a couple of lions that followed us from Ilijiji to Ujiji, and which cut off our ice cream, We camped on the Plain of Custards, so called from the groves of custard trees which skirt it, and the Marchioness proceeded to found her colony. The party was here just three weeks, in which time it laid the corner-stone of the mission, put up three or four frame houses, and fairly planted what was to be the City of St. Jerome (Jerome was the name of the Marquis). During our stay at this place, I and the Duke of Eltonshire came near having an open rupture. We had all along looked upon each other as rival gallants, but had preserved all the amenities of chivalrous social intercourse. The Marchioness had a pavilion put where she could overlook the workmen, and here most of us were in the habit of congregating in the delicious tropical twilight; and while the natives played their rude games of croquet for us, we amused ourselves in singing and narrating our adventures. I, so far, had been the admitted favorite, on account of the wild witchery and novelty of my negro songs. Invariably, the queen of this conclave would call upon me to sing her one of the Folk songs of my native land, and as often, at her request, I have rolled the "Veetching Dina Crow," and "Downs Zupon Ze Svaunie Revare," accompanying myself upon the bones, and feeling amply repaid by the glance of astonishment and admiration which she bestowed upon me.

One evening, however, the Duke of Eltonshire made a sarcastic remark when it came my turn, and I resolved to do my best. I therefore selected what had always been a favorite air of hers. It was "Sing-Song-Polly-Won't-You-Ki-Me-O," which, in her delicious English, became "Tzing Polly Kime." On this occasion I did not please her. The Duke saw it. His triumph irritated me. I felt that he was in favor. We had some words and parted that night bad friends. The same evening an incident occurred which it is necessary to relate. We all had African servants; mine was Oke Koke, and the Duke's was known as Nigiji. They were always quarreling and stealing each other's blankets. Just before retiring that night my man came into my kraal and told me he had got one of the workmen to mark all my blankets with black paint, and, sure enough, he spread out one, and there was a great O. K. in the middle of it. But this was not the worst of it. The other native, not to be outdone, had gone and got the same workman to mark his blankets with white paint, and to distinguish Nigiji from Oke Koke he had painted N. G. on them.

Irritated as I was at this, I could not help laughing at the stupidity of it; and, telling Oke to get my traps together and wake me early, went to bed.

The next morning I got up early, before the camp was astir, and, with my servant, set out for a hunt. I was burning to do something to distinguish myself over the love-sick Duke. Before I left the encampment I wrote a slip and stuck it on his kraal door. It read thus: "I have taken to the field. I leave you to do the singing. I intend to do some of the killing."

I knew that the expedition would set out in a few days on the return, and, taking the route along the shore of Nyanza, would come up with me somewhere; and by that time, perhaps, her Majesty would be longing for my return. I also fancied that I could leave a few carcasses in their way as a reminder of my prowess. For I knew the Duke had been boasting of how he intended to kill the two lions that had hovered on our rear ever since we left Ilijiji.

Oke and myself were well armed; and we set out with light hearts, striking into a jungle which was almost impassable, save by following the rhinoceros paths, and soon left the camp far in the rear. Anything more uncomfortable to the pedestrian than one of these jungles it is impossible to conceive. The rhinoceros paths are the only sure footing; these the animals make themselves, by killing the old and useless of their own species and sinking them in the soft places; the bodies are covered with leaves and soil, and the stout ribs serve as a framework, which makes in places an almost continuous bridge, which, as one walks over it, sounds resonant enough. It is in the hollows of these decayed animals that the python makes its nest and rears its young. In the mornings, before the heavy exhalations rise from the jungles, the strange animal crawls from its hiding-place and lies across the path, making it look like those corduroy roads that one sees in the West. The python is not, however, as dangerous to the traveler as the lasso snake, which grows fifty and sixty feet long. It ties itself into a slip noose, and then, holding on to the branch of a banyan tree, throws its body with fearful precision over its prey.

We finally emerged from this jungle upon a wooded plain, dotted all over with chow-chow trees and pepper bushes.

The native method of gathering the chow-chow is not unlike that of our people in collecting maple syrup. They tap the trees, put their gourd under the incision, and leave the thick chow-chow to flow. The stuff is then sent to the coast, where it is put up in open-mouth bottles. I never saw a picalilly tree farther south than Algeria.

Toward the end of our second day's journey we came across two of those mysterious animals called, by the negroes, Gobblechops. They are not unlike a jackal or American coyote in size and general appearance, but they are more vicious, and have a flexible jaw, not unlike the snout of a tapir. The dreaded beast is held in a sort of holy horror by the natives, who are at the mercy of its devastations, and are forbidden by their superstition to kill it. Its habit is to steal into a village at night, and, taking a bite out of the face of a sleeper, to disappear instantly, leaving him horribly disfigured for life. There is a tribe in Ukafongo, nearly every member of which has only one side to his face, owing to the persistent ravages of this animal.

In spite of Oke's protestations I managed to lodge a bullet in one of them, and he dropped with a loud scream. The native would not go near the carcass, but loudly lamented my act, declaring that every man who killed a gobblechop was sure to be eaten by a lion.

As I foolishly handled the beast in my examination, I found that its sickening odor clung to me all the next day, and coming across a limpid pool of water in a thicket of plantains, we drove the monkeys away and I proposed to Oke that we take a bath. He was pleased with the idea; so I divested myself of my nankeen trousers burnouse, hung my shirt upon a branch, and we plunged in. It proved to be an ice cold mineral spring, that left an incrustation of salt all over our bodies. I was quite benumbed by the sudden change of temperature; but Oke, who was familiar with the situation, spread out a couple of blankets in the sun, to protect us from the jackass ant (a voracious insect that bites a piece out of you as big as a buck-shot), and bade me imitate his example, and lay on my back. The remedy was effectual. I was not only warmed, but the rays of the sun dissipated the salt entirely. But I noticed, as I was dressing, that Oke had two large letters, O. K., imprinted in white on his black hide; and, coming to look at my blanket, I found that it was similarly marked, only my label was N. G., and the salt made it ineradicable.

The rascal had stolen one of the Duke's blankets, and I had lain upon it.

We struck the Nyanza on the third day. A steep bluff, almost perpendicular, of blue clay and pudding-stone, forty feet high, runs along its eastern shore. But, between the bank and the lake, there is a space of fifty feet, level and smooth, covered with a fine yellow sand, said to contain gold dust.

In skirting along this bluff we found groves of chow-chow trees at regular intervals, growing so thick that we had to go around them. It was on the fourth day, and we were enjoying a morning repast on the edge of the cliff. I had shot a fine fat kangaroo, which Oke had broiled, and we were sitting at our meal, between a chow-chow tree and a custard bush, plunging our delicate morsels into the appetizing sauce that flowed at our feet, when I happened to turn, and saw standing on the yellow sand at the foot of the bluff a majestic lion with his tail in the air.

I dropped the morsel that I held in my hand, and seized my American rifle. Just as I did so, Oke caught my arm, drew me round, and pointing into the chow-chow bushes, said:

"Look! look! look!"

I did "look," and there, slowly approaching, his tawny head visible above the brush, was another lion in our rear.

"We are dead niggers," Oke cried. "It is the mate; we have killed the gobblechops, and lion eat black man and white."

I looked at my rifle. Heavens! it was not loaded. I had forgotten to attend to it when I killed the kangaroo.

But the brain of an experienced American hunter acts quickly.

"We're not dead niggers yet," I cried; "where are our blankets?"

They were down at the spring.

"Then," I said, "be quick—do as I do."

And I began to strip off my clothing, Oke imitating me.

I tore my shirt into strips, twisted it around, and, fastening one end to a chow-chow stump and the other to my wrist, lowered myself over the cliff. Oke followed my example, and in less than five minutes we were both hanging safe from either beast, unless one of them hauled us up with his teeth.

I was never before in such a predicament in my life, but I felt sure that we were safe, and that one or the other of the beasts would retire, and we could then drop down or pull ourselves up. The only immediate distress was caused by the beams of the hot sun, which seemed to be intensified by the black paint on my back. I could turn my head partly round, and could see the lion standing on the shore immovable, with his tail standing still in the air.

Oke was hanging about six feet from me, and never ceased groaning. I tried to cheer him as well as I could, but my sympathy and courage had very little effect upon him. He said the sun was eating his marrow. I told him to pull himself back, then, if he preferred it, and let the lion eat him. But he gave very little heed to what I said, keeping up a hideous howling, and in his writhing managing to swing his body so that he came against me with great violence, and I expected to have my brains knocked out momentarily.

Suddenly he cried out, with horror:

"Whankee-janke! whankee-janke!"

And looking up, I found that it was too true. The whankee, or jackass ant, had discovered us, and was already swarming upon the edge of the cliff, preparing to come down the bands by which we were suspended, and cover our bodies.

There was no possible escape from this. But the brain of an American hunter does not usually give out, even when hung up in an African sun to dry. I told Oke to listen to me and do as I bid him. I then explained to him that our only defense from the whankee-janke was to swing ourselves as violently as possible, and the collision of our bodies would knock off the insects.

Accordingly I set him the example. The infernal ants were advancing in a black mass upon us. In a little while I felt sure that the myriads of them would consume us, so I commenced to howl, and squirm, and sway my body as violently as I could, and every time that we came together, with a tremendous thwack, I shut my eyes and howled the louder. Oke did the same.

Our sufferings were now intense. The sun had reached the meridian, and its direct rays were blistering my back. To add to my agony, one of the chow-chow shrubs that bent over above us dripped its acrid juice directly upon the already palpitating flesh. I suppose, sir, that gods, let alone men, never witnessed such a spectacle as that of two human beings, duly labeled, hanging upon a bank, hundreds of miles from any help, writhing in the most preposterous manner, and howling at the top of their voices. But I noticed as I swung that the lion still stood upon the sand with his tail rigidly in the air. How long we suffered I can not tell. The accursed insects were too smart to venture upon our bodies to be knocked off; they remained upon our arms. It seemed an eternity.

When at last I told Oke that death at the merciful jaws of the lion were preferable to this, and that we had better crawl up, we found that we no longer had the strength to lift our own bodies. In the height of my agony, I pictured the patient beast with his tail in the air waiting for us. I even imagined the horrible humor of his soliloquy: "This is the most incomprehensible performance that that incomprehensible creature man ever got up for my entertainment. To think that he should first cook himself before falling into my clutches, is a politeness that I never would have dreamed of."

Suddenly Oke's deafening howls were intermitted a moment, and then he cried joyfully, "Jiggery-gimp-golly! Jiggery-gimp!"

I listened. There was a familiar and regular sound in the air. It was indeed the jiggery-gimp. I could hear the band of the Marchioness approaching. It was playing my own version of the "Tzing-Polly-Kime."

In an instant physical pain, danger, and all else were driven out of my mind by an overwhelming sense of indignation. The whole expedition was marching homeward along the shore of the lake, and there was I, hanging in the sun, and marked "N. G.," without a rag to my name, and unable to help myself. What will the Marchioness say? What will the Duke say? I queried, what in the name of heaven will I say myself? The lions will disappear as help approaches, and I shall never be able to prove that we were attacked by two ferocious beasts.

But the lion on the sand did not disappear. I could see that he was there with his tail in the air yet, and the troop was almost in sight. I could not understand it. I wanted to die. I tried to bite the linen rope through with my teeth, so that I could fall and be eaten before they arrived, but I had not the strength, and I got my mouth full of whankee-janke.

Presently the advance guard drew up on the sand. The drum-major of the band, I felt, was pointing at the stupendous spectacle with his staff.

Then the Marchioness, in her chariot, drove up, escorted by the Duke and her other gallants.

"Ah, it is ze malfaitteurs!" I heard the Marchioness say. "Ze creeminals. But how shall we interpret the N. G.?"

Then I distinctly heard the Duke say: "Oh, they are malefactors, as you have guessed, but the white man is marked N. G. because in his own country that stands for No Good. O. K., I presume, is to indicate that the other is a hardened villain—an Old Krow, perhaps."

At that moment Oke began a new series of kicks and yelps to let them know he was alive.

"Mon Dieu!" the Marchioness cried, "it is ze explanation gymnastic! Ha-ha!" And I heard her clap her hands and call to her women that the wilderness had provided a cirque, and she intended to camp there and see it out. To my amazement she bade her servants move the lion—yes, move the lion, that she might get her chariot into better position—and I perceived that four black rascals picked the beast up and carried it out of the way, with its tail in the air.

Merciful Jove, it was stuffed!

When the Duke cried out to the niggers to be careful how they handled the skin—he didn't want the tail broken—the whole truth flashed upon me. The two lions I had seen were the two the Duke had shot. The Marchioness had ordered them stuffed for preservation, and they were carried ahead of the expedition.

When this awful fact broke fully upon me I determined, if I could not die, at least to simulate death, in hopes that the party would go on leave me hanging there.

But it was no use. The detachment on the cliff tied ropes to us, and lowered us down, and we were identified and covered up.

I have only this to say in conclusion, that in explanation of my conduct to the Marchioness, I told her that in despair of winning her favor, I had determined to commit suicide in the most painful way, and that my faithful servant had imitated me.

"Ah, fantasie superbe Amerique!" she cried. "It ees worthy of ze Washington. But you shall explain on me ze superscription of ze N. G."

"That," I replied, after I had thought a moment, is easily explained. "In New York we have a corps militaire called the National Guard, to which all the young men of good blood ally themselves. Each member of this noble organization is compelled to take a fearful oath of loyalty, and to have N. G. tattooed on his back."

Whether this was credible or not never occurred to her. It was brilliant, and that is always enough for a Frenchwoman.—"Tricou," in N. Y. Spirit of the Times.

Extreme caution: I. Being at a café and desiring to pay for his beer, a guest gives the waiter a 20-franc piece. II. The waiter promptly returns with a 10-franc gold piece and silver for the rest. III. The guest gives him back the 10-franc piece, saying: "Give me two 5-franc pieces for that, please." IV. The waiter rings the gold coin on the table and says, apologetically: "You know there are so many counterfeiters out these times that we have to be on our guard."

The Equator Defined: Professor—"Define the equator." Student—"It is the place where the sun crosses the line." Professor—"What line?" Student—"I suppose it's the one referred to by Euclid, that has neither breadth nor thickness." Professor—"Next." Student No. 2—"There's no such line. It has been shown to be purely imaginary—a mere superstition of sailors. Columbus sailed across it, and it wasn't there."

INTAGLIOS.

Kissing.

There's a jolly Saxson proverb
That is pretty much like this:
That a man is half in heaven
When he has a woman's kiss.
But there's danger in delaying,
And the sweetness may forsake it—
So I tell you, bashful lover,
If you want a kiss, why take it.

Never let another fellow
Steal a march on you in this,
Never let a laughing maiden
See you spoiling for a kiss;
There's a royal way of kissing,
And the jolly ones who make it
Have a motto that is winning:
If you want a kiss, why take it.

Any fool may face a cannon—
Anybody wear a crown—
But a man must win a woman
If he'd have her for his own.
Would you have a golden apple,
You must find a tree and shake it;
If a thing is worth the having,
And you want a kiss, why take it.

Who would burn upon a desert
With a forest growing by?
Who would give his sunny summer
For a black and wintry sky?
Oh! I tell you there is magic,
And you can not, can not break it;
For the sweetest part of loving
Is to want a kiss and—take it.

An Alsace Legend.

Knowest thou, Gretchen, how it happens
That the dew drops like tears on the grass?
God walks daily in His garden
While the sun shines glad.
In that garden there are roses,
Beautiful and bright,
And He gazes round delighted
With the lovely sight.

If He marks one gayly blooming,
Than the rest more fair,
He will pause and gaze upon it,
Full of tender care.

And theauteous rose He gathers
In His bosom lies;
But on earth are tears and sorrow,
For the dear one dies.

Resignation.

If you were a princess and I a knight,
And this were the lawless, olden time,
When love was potent, and might was right,
And the sacking of castles was not a crime—
Or if I were a villain and you a fool,
And we both were selfish, reckless, and blind,
I'd scarcely remain so seemingly cool,
With this raging fire in my heart confined.

For my love is as fierce as the love of old,
And my spirit as brave to the love and dare,
As a Knight of the Field of the Cloth of Gold,
Or any who've battled for lady fair;
And you are as beautiful, sweet, and good
As the fairest princess of romance
Who ever looked out on enchanted wood—
But you're not to be won with sword or lance.

There are tendrils of love, chains of pure gold,
Innocent child-hands that hold us apart;
The old love's a dream, a tale that is told,
A memory sweet hidden deep in the heart,
In vain the battle and clash of steel,
In vain the railing at what we call fate;
Peace may come with the turn of the wheel;
True to each other, we can but wait.

A Song.

Kiss no one but me, my darling,
Love's kisses are fragile things,
And the stain of two common usage
To their dainty essence clings.
Kiss no one but me, kiss no one but me,
And I'll gather thy sweetness faithfully.

Kiss no one but me, my darling,
Lest out of the soil of each kiss
Should be lost the mystical love-charm
That wakens from slumber our bliss;
Kiss no one but me, kiss no one but me,
I vow, as I live, I'll kiss no one but thee.

And if years shall fade our red kisses,
We will fold them softly away
In memory's beautiful casket,
Pure for a heavenly day.
Kiss no one but me, kiss no one but me;
As an angel I'll woe thy kisses from thee.

MARIE LE BARON.

Love's Secret.

Never seek to tell thy love,
Love that never told can be;
For the gentle wind doth move
Silently, invisibly.

I told my love, I told my love,
And fate forbid the boon we ask;
Some greater god do we not find
When round our necks fond arms are twined,

And kind lips whisper words unfeigned,
"All is not lost if love be gained!"
Ah! it is clear that we should be
In truth more favored or more free?

Soon after she was gone from me,
A traveler came by,
Silently, invisibly:
He took her with a sigh.

BLAKE.

The Fulfillment of Craving.

If we, indeed, could surely gain
The end to which we toil and strain;
Could grasp the thing we deem most dear,
And hold it firm and keep it near;

Couldst say, "Behold, the good we sought Unto our very hearts is brought!"
Ah! it is clear that we should be
In truth more favored or more free?

For while in vain we ply our task,
And Fate forbid the boon we ask,
Some greater god do we not find
When round our necks fond arms are twined,
And kind lips whisper words unfeigned,
"All is not lost if love be gained!"
Ah! it is clear that we should be
In truth more favored or more free?

Upon the mountain's height we thought
To gain the prize for which we sought;
Ah! love, 'twas well we strove in vain;
Did we not meet, love, on the plain?

Love scorps degrees; the low he lifteth high,
The high he draweth down to that fair plain
Wherein, in his divine equality,
Two loving hearts may meet, nor move in vain;
'Gainst such sweet leveling custom
But o'er its harshness utterance avail;
Breathed passion-wise, doth mount
For Love, earth's lord, must move.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 8, 1878.

MY DEAR MADGE:—Have you not often wondered what Mr. Henry J. Byron's reputation was made of? I have come to the conclusion that it is gotten up out of the same material as his plays, which is to say, nothing. The various stages of domestic insipidity are scarcely sufficiently thrilling within themselves to be called incidents. Our Boys, when played by thorough artists is really a nice little play, but the most remarkable thing about it to me is its fabulous run. But I can not regard this run as any excuse for following it up with such an absolute pall of tedium as Dearest than Life. I have not the faintest idea, Madge, what was dearer than life. At first I thought it was the old woman, by which pretty name one of the party is affectionately alluded to. Then I thought it was the son or hero, and finally I agreed with myself to consider it a small box of coin which was locked up in the dresser drawer, where the knives and forks ought to have been. Eventually I decided that the phrase had a musical jingle in Mr. Byron's ear which made him adopt it as a title without rhyme or reason. I think I hit it then. To give you a specimen of its originality, Madge, I must tell you that we were occupied for about three-quarters of an hour in gazing upon that familiar scene, the threatened eviction of a tenant from an attic lodging. Jack took warning the moment the curtain went up. When he found the party up in the mansard with the heroine sewing by the light of a tallow-dip his prophetic soul anticipated the landlady. He seized his hat and incontinently fled. A gentleman sitting near who had the air of a theatre habitué hazarded the surmise that during a quarter of a century of play-going he had seen at last one thousand irate landladies expostulating with as many impoverished tenants. The traditional landlady cap-ribbons and flaunting curls was not wanting here. Of course the suffering heroine called her "woman" in tones of withering contempt—I have observed that a great deal of withering contempt is employed by these impecunious lodgers—and of course the landlady resented the epithet with spirit. Now, Madge, don't you think Byron might have let this poor old joker, which has lived a long and honorable life and has done arduous duty, die a peaceful death. I heard it remarked that there was some wit in the dialogue. I candidly confess that I was too obtuse to discover it. I can only excuse myself on the ground that I was ten thousand miles away from the scenes which gave these sayings significance. If Mr. Byron's plays fall into good hands it will generally be found that they contain one or two good character drawings; therefore, Mr. Stoddard and Mr. Mackay were provided for. Mr. Stoddard narrowly escaped being a genius, but he did escape. I know that by his "Lawyer Money-penny" of last week. I can see how very close to it he came by his "Michael Garner" this week. I do not see the justice of extensively billing him as a star in such a company. To my thinking he would need to be a luminary of very brilliant effulgence to shine them down, but he plays "Michael Garner" with an art which is beyond question. Some of his effects are due to his own personality, which is rather striking. He has an odd face which in a way is expressive, and he has a hasty ejaculatory style of speaking which is sometimes effective and sometimes decidedly unintelligible. Snapping his fingers is a favorite trick with him, not that it means anything in particular, unless, perhaps, impatience. It is a gesture which he uses ad lib., as the music books say. They snap like a whip-lash until the theatre resounds with crackling bony significance. Mr. Stoddard's pathos is a little hollow. He can make people laugh more easily than he can make them weep. Mr. Mackay, not to be outdone by the New York star, devoted considerable care to his production of "Uncle Ben," a drunken old scoundrel of no particular value, either in his family circle or in the play. Mr. Byron drew a skeleton which Mackay filled in. The main filling was an asthmatic cough, which excited a mild hilarity. Encouraged by the success of his venture, the actor coughed too often and destroyed the illusion. To the cough he added an alcoholic huskiness. The huskiness was admirable, but it prevented our distinguishing one word. Perhaps that was why he made a hit. Poor Miss Sylvester! The stage manager seems determined to drown her in a pool of lachrymal parts. Weep, whine, and whimper; whimper, whine, and weep. I have given her to do lately, and I am sick of it with the pertinacity of a spoiled child. Miss Sylvester very much, but I am sick of it on earth so tiresome as a woman constantly in tears, and if the stage manager does not allow her to cheer up for a brief week or two the poor girl will become odious without being able to help herself. Miss Sylvester can not be called a dresser in the ordinary stage acceptance of the term, but she sometimes gives quite a tasteful touch to her toilets. In Dearest than Life she wore a little striped muslin, made in the old-fashioned way when ten or eleven yards made a dress pattern. My dear Madge, it is astonishing how well a woman can look in ten yards of dry goods. She did not wear the pretty little household apron which was the natural accompaniment of these plain, homely dresses, but she must have borne in upon many a mind the conviction that we carry from twenty-five to thirty extra yards of superfluous material in our daily walks. Besides Miss Sylvester's old-fashioned dress they gave an old-fashioned farce; but farces are entirely too old-fashioned. The comedy drama has put them completely out of date. So long as we have Baby, Pink Dominoes, and Forbidden Fruit to fill an entire evening, we do not need a little dessert of the old-time farce, even with Bishop in the cast. I do not know of anything more inane than a farce. I have found myself laughing at Jefferson as "Hugh de Brass," and I defy anyone to gaze with smileless, stony countenance at Bishop in A Point of Honor. But what stuff, what downright idiosyncrasy a farce is! Fancy Willie Seymour doing climbing gymnastics on a garden wall, and giving a spirit-distinct seance in a sheet and pillow-case! Fancy Bishop trembling with terror before the man who sang "Baby Mine" at Harry Edwards' benefit and yet lingers in the country unharmed and faces an audiences unblushingly! I think of Miss Alma Saville playing leading lady! I think, for that matter, that her little speech was perhaps the funniest thing in the farce. It was more amateurish than a boarding-school exhibition. Possibly the girl herself is not to blame for taking her little opportunity when it comes; but with a large and expensive company rusting with disuse, the management are foolish to put inefficiency forward. They are to give us Les Fourchambaults in this theatre next week. There is entertainment for you; for this will be the first time it is presented in English. I hope it will be good English. I find that a great many people, like myself, suffered a severe disappointment when they went to see the minstrels on their return. Somehow those brilliantly illuminated posters—how well Haverley understands advertising!—caught the eye and stirred the fancy. Gus Williams, Sweatnam, and Dougherty! Those are good enough names to guarantee a lively entertainment. Either Hughie Dougherty suffers from imitators or he is not very original. Either Billy Rice copies him or he copies Billy Rice. Either he has a very bad cold or an excessively disagreeable voice. Where there are so many others, you can imagine that I was not delighted with Hughie Dougherty. He did one clever thing in the finale, which he calls "Gilmore at the Trocadero." Gilmore, who is the coolest, quietest, calmest, and most dignified of leaders, is mercilessly travestied; but it is very amusing. They are geniuses, after a fashion, some of these minstrels, and conjure up some very funny imaginings. I find that I quite miss Harry Richmond, who had the unusual quality of wearing well, aside from one tedious act, and who was cut upon rather a different pattern from the others. They used to say, when the minstrels were here before, that Thatcher copied Sweatnam, but they are both here together now, and we hear no more of that. Sweatnam, for some reason, has ingloriously suffered his laurels to wither. He has brought nothing new with him, and the old falls stale and flat. He had a reception warm enough for a Ristori, but I fear the gallery felt a little cheap over its demonstrations when he walked off to faint applause. After all, people are very patient with minstrelsy. It is only once in a very great while that a bit of novelty shines in it. They might at least furnish up the old stuff to make it presentable. Thatcher is always dry and droll; but I wish he would not play antithetic with his mutilated fingers, as I wish that Dougherty would not jest with his voice if it is a permanent affliction instead of a temporary hoarseness. Thatcher sings a parody upon "Baby Mine," and is encored till his muse gives out. The quartet are as pleasant to listen to as ever, but the songs in the first part are not extraordinary. It is an immense company, for they have two or three yet in reserve. Diplomacy has remained unchanged, with the exception of a couple of new dresses. Jeffreys-Lewis flashed upon the bewildered vision last week in a silken robe of lively canary color, set off with ruby velvet; it looked better than such a startling combination reads. Maud Granger wore a new promenade toilette, in the last act, of cerise and cerise; the overdress was of cerise lace, through which the cerise was visible; a satin sash, of the brighter color, was transfixed by a huge steel buckle, at least half a foot long; bonnet to match. I am sorry to say this is their last week. We shall miss such a company very much I am sure, and I fear that what comes after will suffer by comparison. They could not depart without letting us know that they can play something else besides Diplomacy. For Mr. Montague's benefit, on Friday night, they produce False Shame; but on Saturday night we are to have a melange of the legitimate—"Komeo," "Armand," "Claude," "Juliet," "Pauline," and "Camille." I will tell you next time how they make the division for it is too decidedly mixed to understand it from the playbills. This sort of entertainment is always unsatisfactory, but, in this case, it will be interesting. I have never heard Jeffreys-Lewis in anything but the Daly drama till now, and I am curious to see how she will comport herself in the older plays. Maud Granger I know will make a lovely Juliet, although I should dread the fourth act for her should it be given in its entirety. I have been looking at Lotta's mignonette face and burnished locks in the boxes lately, and thought perhaps we were to have seen her in one of her new plays, but an enterprising interviewer has dashed my hopes. For my part I like the little Lotta extremely. I admire her for her modesty in not wishing to play lest they should think her presuming upon her own generosity, but I fear she over-estimated the delicate consideration of this community. They have never extended, either to her or to her gift, a super-abundant courtesy, and I fear that if she did play the fountain would not materially affect the cash-box. At all events, she has made enough money elsewhere to be independent of California caprice. Next week we are to have Maggie Mitchell, also, I believe, the founder of a school. So you see the theatres are becoming lively again; and when Kennedy's Standard opens there will be more yet to hear about from

Yours, devotedly, B.T.S.Y. R.

THE CYCLOPEDIA WAR.

A Challenge that was Accepted.

We have successfully met one challenge of the "Johnson" agent, and until he acquires himself the charges publicly made against him at that time, we decline every proposition which allows him to repeat his "packing" process. Moreover, the superiority of "Appleton" is already too well established to need any such child's play. The testimony of over two hundred college professors and others, in our possession, who have exchanged their Johnson Dictionaries for the Appleton Cyclopædia, and the action of the State Board of Education rescinding its former commendation of Johnson's Cyclo as one of the library books, ought to be conclusive evidence as to which stands the test of use and an impartial examination.

We repeat our article published in the Call of January 22, 1878, which has not yet been denied:

"To whom it may concern: At the urgent solicitation of H. D. Watson, agent of Johnson's Cyclopædia, and with the cordial cooperation of James T. White, agent for Appleton's American Cyclopædia, having critically compared the two works in their treatment of over one thousand test topics of our own selection, we have reached the following conclusion:

"In the careful and exhaustive treatment and sub-headings of a score or two of special, scientific, and popular subjects, Johnson excels. In many tables of statistics, and in the necessary notation of pronunciation, his work is the more convenient.

"In shape, size, and weight of volumes; in quality of binding, legibility of type, thickness and color of paper; in the equal distribution and the great superiority of maps and engravings, both in number and artistic excellence; in the important departments of biography and history; in the description and illustration of great cities and chief towns; and, finally, in general method and symmetry, as well as in fairness and impartiality, we consider the American Cyclopædia unquestionably and very decidedly the better book.

"Respectfully, E. KNOWLTON, S. A. WHITE."

This verdict has double weight, from the fact that the Johnson agent selected and attempted to pack this jury against us by putting upon it a gentleman who had previously been offered, unbeknown to us, a heavy consideration to espouse the Johnson cause. Moreover, during an intermission of the investigation, the same agent endeavored surreptitiously to influence both gentlemen to decide the case in his favor, showing testimonials, urging the previous arrangement in the one case, and using every means in his power to prejudice the decision. But after a searching investigation and comparison of the two works, the manifest superiority of the Appleton's Cyclopædia called forth the above verdict, notwithstanding the pecuniary consideration offered to the one, and the personal pressure brought to bear upon both. As this was not a judicial proceeding, such an offense is not indictable, but it is nevertheless a crime against honor and an insult to justice and fair play.

JAMES T. WHITE & CO.

The statement, industriously circulated by the "Johnson" agent, that we bought this verdict, called out the following letter:

"276 Shotwell Street, May 26, 1878.

"To whom it may concern: In the Cyclo. matter, I desire to state explicitly and emphatically that the only man who approached me with any pecuniary consideration, directly or indirectly, was H. D. Watson, and he did very decidedly and persistently.

"Very resp'y, E. KNOWLTON."

It is very apparent that the "Appleton" is the standard and most sought after, when its opponents resort to the trick of underselling to break its sale; but the following letter, and the statements of several who have applied to the "Johnson" agent for sets without success, are conclusive proof that he can not supply a single set, and that his advertisement is a gross misrepresentation:

"SAN FRANCISCO, July 8, 1878.

"H. D. WATSON, Esq., Agent of 'Johnson'—Dear Sir:—Have written you twice without getting a reply. Will take all the Appletons you can furnish at $50 a set. I have calls for them almost daily, and have no doubt I could dispose of large quantities in a short time. Will you send me what you have, and get the coin in exchange. Respectfully,

"I. N. CHOYNSKI."

Comment is unnecessary.

JAMES T. WHITE & CO., Agents of "Appleton's American Cyclopædia."

The Dramatic News says: Lizzie McCall has been adding to her fighting reputation. In company with E. E. Rice, she went to the house in which her sister Ellie lay dead, and began an interperate scene over the coffin as to who should pay the expense of the burial. To do this she came in a carriage.

HENRY V. TO THE HERALD.

I pray thee, bear my former answer back; Did thou achieve me, and sell my bones To the guano manufacturers, if they so desire! Good God! why should they mock poor fellows thus? The man that once did sell the lion's skin For two dollars and a quart of whiskey, While the beast lived, was killed while hunting him. Tell them I bid thee put that in thy pipe And smoke it!

Discourse with the Constable of France We are but warriors for the working day; Our gayness and our gift are all besmirched With rainy marching in the painful field, Or painful marching in the rainy field. Or hooding it across, as best doth suit thee. The blacking is all worn off our shoes, And our moustaches haven't been waxed for two days; There's not a piece of feather in our host (Good argument, I hope, we've had no chicken pie), And time has worn us into slovenry. But, bet thy life, our hearts are in the trim, And my poor soldiers tell me, yet ere night They'll be in fresher robes, or break a home-string! They say they'll skin The gay new coats o'er the French soldiers' heads, Snatching their backs bald-headed, as it were, And turn them out in each of a clothing store. If they do this (and well I know they have the sand), My ransom, then, shall soon be levied. Herald, save thy labor; Come thou no more for ransom, gentle herald, Lest we have thee roasted for dinner!—Derriick.

JOSH BILLINGS' COUGH-DROPS.

The philosopher, Josh Billings, has placed in the hands of his publishers the Former's Diagnosis for 1879. From its pages we make the following extracts:

Bachelors are always a braggin' ov their freedom! Freedom to darn their own stockings and polittish their own shins! I had rather be a widower once in 2 years, reglar, than tw be a grunting, old, hunched bachelor only for 60 days.

Ambushin' tw shine in everything is a sure way tew put a man's kandell all out. Suckin' a whet sillybub thru a rhy straw is a good deal like tryin' to live on buty.

Sum people won't believe enny thing they kant prove, the things I can't prove are the very things I believe the most.

Good examples among the rulers are the best laws they kan enact.

One ov the saddest sights of all to me is in old man, poor and deserted, whom I once knew living in ease and luxury.

He who spends his younger days in dissipation is mortgaging himself tw dis-ease and poverty, tw inexorable creditors, who are certain tw foreclose at last, and take possession ov the premises.

The world owes all its energy and refinement tw luxury—diggin' roots for breakfast and going naked for clothes is the virtuous innocence ov a lazy savage.

Prudes are coquets gone to seed. A dandy in love is in just about as bad a fix as a stuck ov melonss kindly that has half melted.

There is no good substitute for wisdom, but silence is the best that has been discovered yet.

There is lots ov folks in this world I who, rather than not find enny fault at all, wouldnt hesitate tw say tew an angle worm that his tail was altogether tw long for the rest ov his body.

A man who is good company for himself is always good company for others.

I never knew but one infidel in my life, and he had no more courage than a half drowned kitten just pulled out ov a swell barrel and was afraid tw die as the devil would be if he was allowed tw visit the earth, for a short season, to recruit himself.

I have seen men who had worn out their vices, and supposed, ov course, that they was lying on their virtues.

What a man is most afraid ov is hez he don't believe in; this may account for sum men's unbelief in hell.

The man who dies the richest is the one who leaves the least here and takes the most with him.

THIS WONDERFUL SPOT OF CALIFORNIA should be visited by all residents and tourists. The Geysers of Iceland and the Geysers of the Yellowstone have their counterpart in the remarkable Canyon of the Pluton in Sonoma County. Wonderful as a curiosity of nature, wonderful as a health resort, and delightful as a resort of pleasure. By steamer, train, and coach, over a beautiful Bay, through beautiful valleys and romantic hills, the trip alone more than compensates for the cost and time. Leave San Francisco daily at 3 P. M., by steamer for Donahue; take train for Cloverdale; stay all night at Cloverdale, and leave in coach—four-in-hand—at 7 A. M. for the mountain drive over the hills to the Geysers. Returning passengers reach San Francisco in a day by the Calistoga way. A trip to the Geysers is the easiest, most inexpensive and most delightful of any in California. honor to announce to the public that the THIRTEENTH GRAND EXHIBITION OF SCIENCE, ART, AND INDUSTRY, given under the auspices of the Mechanics' Institute, will open at the Pavilion, on Market, Eighth, and Mission Streets, on TUESDAY, August 13th. Great and unusual attractions will be presented to visitors. Mining, Agricultural, and other machinery will be in motion. Pacific Coast Manufactures, Minerals, and Products of the Soil will be fully represented, besides many new novelties never before exhibited on this coast. The Art Department will be under the supervision of the San Francisco Art Association, a guarantee for excellence and completeness. Local Art will be especially represented, as also works of noted foreign artists, selected from the private galleries of this city. The Horticultural Garden, so popular heretofore, will be made still more attractive this year by the addition of many new features. The Musical—Each afternoon and evening a first-class instrumental Concert will be given by the best soloists and accomplished musicians of this city, with a variety of change of programme of the most popular music. No expense will be spared by the management that will add to the comfort or convenience of visitors. Applications for space or information can be obtained from the Secretary, at the office, 27 Post Street. IRVING M. SCOTT, President. J. H. GILMORE, Superintendent. J. H. CHIVERS, Secretary.

MARBLEIZED IRON MANTELS

—AND—

ENAMELED GRATES.

The perfection which the manufacture of Marbleized Iron Mantels has attained brings them in direct competition with the best qualities of slate for all purposes where mantels are used, and they are in a great measure taking the place of marble. The soft rich color in which these mantels are finished renders them a much more agreeable article of furniture to a room than the cold, repulsive-looking marble slab, and colors may be selected to harmonize with the furniture. In ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY OF FINISH, AND DURABILITY OF POLISH, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

WHY SHOULD THE CHINESE GO?—III.

A Pertinent Inquiry from a Mandarin High in Authority.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

PALACE HOTEL, August 2, 1878.

TO THE ARGONAUT:—The limits to which these letters restrict me are a great source of embarrassment. I am forced to outline the story of twenty centuries of intercourse, three of which have been active and bear immediately upon the present question, in the course of a few columns. I must compare Christianity with Buddhism, an allodial civilization with a feudal one, and strike a balance between two worlds with the dash of a pen. It is not a cause that I am to defend; it is a miracle that I must accomplish.

Let me begin this letter with the religious question. Is it the religion of the Chinese residents in America of which you complain? What right have you to do this, with freedom of religion guaranteed in your Federal and State constitutions and a hundred monstrous sects flourishing in your midst and protected by your laws? There are more Shakers than Buddhists, more Mormons than Confucians, in your country; and, while the latter keep their religion to themselves, the former flaunt theirs, with all its repulsive features, in the face of your moral code, which it flatly insults. Do you complain of Chinese morality? In what respect is your code superior to ours? What duty does it commend which ours disregards? What virtue does it inculcate which ours neglects? Or do you complain of the practical behavior of Chinamen, regardless of religion or moral code? Let their industry, their peaceful manners, their resignation to insult and contumely, be your answer.

You say that your civilization is superior to ours, and that it must not be degraded by contact with us. When your twenty discordant writers, Volney, Burke, Guizot, Mackinnon, Colquhoun, Buckle, Spencer, Draper, and the rest agree upon what civilization means, we shall be better able to reply to you. With us, civilization indicates a given condition of society, combined with the direction and velocity of its movement from that condition to another. The condition, we regard as due to physical resources; the movement and its velocity, to the struggle between those resources and the population which has to subsist upon them. At times, population gets the upper hand of nature; then civilization advances. At others, nature gets the better of population; then civilization decays. We are an old nation and have seen many of these changes; but we have neither forgotten justice nor charity to others when they favored, nor begged indulgence from others when they went against us. When, in the days of Genghis Khan, our name was a terror to Western Europe, we took no advantage of you and imposed upon you no yoke. Now that we are engaged in so desperate a struggle against nature that, during the past few years, millions of human beings have expired from starvation within our borders, we ask no favors from you. Whatever you may think of our civilization, violence and force form no portions of its basis. Its foundations—however rudely capped—are laid in justice, and mercy, and toleration.

But what is this Western civilization of which you boast so loudly? Had it any history previous to the opening of the sea route to China? Pause a moment. Be just. Reflect. When you shall have caught the clue to such a history, let us be apprized. But we believe you will fail. You will remember that we happen to know something of Europe in the thirteenth century, and to-day our histories can tell more of this obscure period than yours. We have our own theory concerning the sources of your present greatness. We ascribe it, in part, to your gains from the piratical conquest, enslavement, and murderous extinction of the American races, but chiefly to the profitable trade with the Orient. From the opening of this trade to 1640, when the Portuguese were driven from Japan, and the British first acquired territory in Hindostan, three of your nations alone took a thousand millions of specie from Asia; two-thirds as much as they wrung from all America during the same period. From Malacca, alone, they took twenty-five millions; from Japan, up to the date mentioned, four hundred millions; from India and China other vast sums. These nations were Spain, Portugal, and Holland. You imported calicoes from India, rice and silk from China, copper from Japan, spices from the Islands; and you sent, in return, wooleens, iron-wares, and other northern fabrics. Every western nation had its East India or Oriental company, whose profits upon each voyage varied from forty to three hundred per cent. When you could not trade, you robbed; and your pirates, whose atrocities your monarchs not only connived at but rewarded, despoiled our seas and ravaged our coasts. These profits and spoils gave rise to those industries which furnish the present support to your boasted civilization; they invoked those industrial classes, which before them had no existence in Europe, and whose emergence from feudal vassalage forms the history of your liberties. In a word, your civilization is indebted to ours for all there is of it to which you dare to refer; and it still depends so largely upon the Oriental trade, which amounts in value to $1,000,000,000 per annum, and employs ten million tons of western shipping—more than one-half of which is with China alone—that if this trade were destroyed, through your illiberality to Chinamen, there can be little risk in predicting that your civilization would sustain the severest blow to which, practically, it is liable to be subjected. During the palmy days of the Oriental trade your physical resources exceeded the wants of your population; you grew, took to the consumption of luxuries, and have now become proud, insolent, and unjust. At the present time, although the Oriental trade is greater than ever, competition has reduced its profits to a minimum; your population, in Europe and America, grown from forty millions to four hundred millions, is fast outstripping your productive resources, and you can not afford to dispense with any of them that you possess—least of all, with so important a one as the Chinese trade. Abandon that, and your fate as a progressive civilization is sealed; and, as things which do not grow, decay, so will the day dawn when, not the Zealander, but the Chinaman, will arise to muse over your ruined cities, and recall the ingratulate and folly that precipitated your fall.

Driven from your place in the ranks of a civilization whose greatness you now perpetually boast, you may meanly seek as Americans to escape the fate that threatens to overtake you as Europeans. You may cry let European civilization decay if it will; our concern is with the United States; sautez qui peut! In vain; you must fall, as you have risen, with the rest. If, meaner still, you entrench yourselves on the narrow strip of land between the Sierra and the ocean and resolve, as Californians, to pursue a policy which you fear to avow as Americans, let me show you what will happen. And here I appeal not to philosophy, but to history, which seems better fitted to the scope of Western minds.

In 1565 the Spaniards in Mexico—the same men who discovered and colonized California—sent a fleet to the Philippine Islands, which they captured and occupied. Under assurances of protection from these marauders a considerable number of Chinamen were induced to reside upon the islands, which, under the effects of their industry and enterprise, became as rich and productive as before they had been poor and barren. In 1602 there were upward of twenty thousand Chinese in Manila, whilst the number of Spaniards did not exceed eight hundred.

There never had been the slightest disturbance between them. The Chinese were hard workers, who meddled with nobody. The Spaniards rode about on horseback, enjoying the fruits of the Chinamen's labor and living like lords; and yet they were not satisfied. They wanted to rob the Chinamen of the little they had managed to save under the hard conditions of their life. The Spaniards met together in secret, planned a massacre of the Chinese, and carried out this atrocious design with such expedition that, in the course of a few months, but few of the twenty thousand victims were left alive. The marauders then divided the spoils they had gained, and rejoiced in the name of civilization and religion. Thirty-seven years later, a new generation of Chinamen having arisen, who were ignorant or careless of what had occurred before, some thirty-three thousand of my countrymen gradually found their way to Manila. Precisely the same thing happened as before. The Spaniards, coveting the wretched gains of the Chinese, planned their massacre, and slaughtered twenty-two thousand of them in four months, with a loss on their own side of but three hundred and thirty (Martin's History of China, I, 378). From that moment the Philippines decayed and sunk to nothing. In 1762, when Sir William Draper captured Manila from Spain, his most numerous and eager allies were the Chinese. It was a punishment and a retribution to the Spaniards.

Did the Philippines decay because the Chinese had been driven from them? Yes. But let us glance at the story of the Moorish expulsion from Spain before we dig down to those reasons which so nearly concern the present welfare of California and the Pacific slope of America.

At the time that Ferdinand and Isabella conquered Granada, Spain had a population of 21,000,000; Castile had 11,000,000; Aragon, 7,000,000; Granada, 3,000,000. A large proportion of the inhabitants of Castile and Aragon, and all of those in Granada, were Moors or Jews. The former were the agriculturists of the peninsula; the latter the manufacturers and merchants. The conquest had been aided by fanaticism, and the impersonators of this element claimed for their reward the expulsion of the Moors and Jews. No sooner said than done. The fiat went forth, and in the same year that America was discovered by Columbus the kingdom of Spain was closed to the heretics. A million of them were driven forth. Some professed Christianity and remained until 1610, when they, too, were cast out. Others of the proscribed fled to freer lands, so that in 1594 the entire population left in Spain was but 8,266,791. The kingdom was a wreck, and despite the magnificent conquest of America, despite the gold and silver wrung from the Indians and the monopoly of the Colonial trade, which was maintained until the period of the Mexican and South American revolutions, it never recovered the loss thus sustained. It is only within the past twenty-five years that Spain has been again enabled to hold up her head among the nations of the world; only since the time when she has decreed religious toleration and blotted out from her history the bloody and detestable crime which she committed three centuries ago. The cry raised against the Moors in Spain and the Chinese in Manila was the same: paganism, filth, leprosy, a lower civilization. It was false in both cases, as it is in the present case of California. The real offense was that the hated races were more abstemious and economical than the race in power, and much as you may endeavor to conceal it from the world and from yourselves, this is the offense of the Chinamen in California. Are not your sans culottes destroying your harvesters and other labor-saving machinery? Do they not murder those of their own number who are satisfied to accept lower wages than the leaders choose to demand?

I believe that I have said enough to show why the Chinese should not go. It is only necessary to advert to the enormous interests which they have built up in this country to make it clear that they can not go; and I may add that if it becomes necessary for them to appeal to all Christendom, and even to arms, against your injustice, they are prepared to do so. They did not seek Western intercourse; they did not ask for the Burlingame treaty; but now that both have been thrust upon them they are determined that both shall be respected. They will not be driven forth. It must sound strangely to hear a Chinaman speak of resorting to arms to obtain the observance of a treaty. It is strange; but it is your method, the method of your boasted Western civilization; you have taught it to us, and we shall employ it. It may, also, seem preposterous on our part to speak of arms, when you believe that we have none. But here you are mistaken.

During your civil war, a single Confederate cruiser, whose operations in Chinese waters were zealously aided by the British Consuls, and alarmingly magnified by the reports of the British merchants in our ports, entirely swept your commerce from the Pacific Ocean. This fact taught us two things: First, the English are your rivals in trade, and would gladly ruin you; second, they are ready to sell war-ships, arms, and ammunition to your enemies. At the present time they have a number of fine iron-clads which, being our friends, they will be glad to sell to us, and, if needs be, show us how to handle. The day that you become so weak and faithless as to give way to your ignorant classes, and permit the torch and the dagger to drive us from your shores, that day will see every resource of the Ta-tsing empire put forth to punish you. Your commerce will be swept from the Pacific, perhaps forever; it may even be seriously crippled on the Atlantic; and you may then learn, when too late, that China, though old and apathetic, is by no means dead or powerless.

But pardon these threats. They are merely the ebullition of an injured patriotism, an outraged sense of justice. We would be your friends, not your enemies. The oldest and the newest empires of the world, joined together in the common cause of Free Trade, would furnish a spectacle whose sublimity might form the Pbaros to a new and higher civilization for a united world. Disunited, warring with each other, and in war seeking for allies, with little regard to the incongruity of the alliance, they would not only afford an unseemly spectacle, but they might involve each other in ruin and the world in a desolation so widespread that its industrial rehabilitation may need the work of centuries. I have said it—the Chinese should not, can not, will not go. I will now show you that if they did, it would be so much the worse for you—aye, even for the very classes who are clamorous for their removal. What are they doing here? In a word, they are pursuing a number of industries which, without them, would have no existence at all on this coast. All the evidence in your Chinese Immigration Report goes to prove that this is a correct description of the class of vocations in which they are employed. The City Assessor, who with binocular vision, finds 28,500 Chinese in this city, gives their occupations as follows, the classification being my own:

(1) As domestics and washmen.....	7,260
(2) As makers of clothing, shoes and slippers.....	6,250
(3) As makers of cigars and cigar-boxes.....	3,150
(4) As fishermen, truck-farmers, and hucksters.....	3,700
(5) As Chinese merchants, brokers, clerks, and porters, Chinese restaurants, places of worship, and other purely Chinese occupations.....	4,150
(6) As rag-pickers.....	600
(7) In American manufactures: fruit-canning, woolen mills, tanneries, matches, gunpowder mills, and brick yards.....	3,450
Total.....	28,500

In the other towns of the State the Chinese are employed in similar vocations. In the rural sections they pick nineteen-twentieths of the grape crop (Rep., p. 1203). In the mining districts they work the placers which white men have long since abandoned. It is quite safe to say that if they were driven from those industries not one of them would be continued. Let us look at them seriatim: (1) Families, who would have to pay $25 to $40 a month, Biddy's demand for house-ork, instead of the $10 or $15 with which John is satisfied, would break up housekeeping, become their own domestics, or else leave the country. The times are past when exceptionally high rates of wages can be sustained. (2) The clothing, shoes, and slippers now made here by Chinamen would either be made in China, of British muslin, leather, etc., or else manufactured in the East, and in either case imported to this coast. It is entirely out of the question to imagine that these industries would be continued upon the Californian workmen's wage-basis of $3 or $4 a day. The general level of wages and prices and living has fallen far below such rates, and neither intimidation nor violence can raise it. The workmen themselves would have to leave the State, because the capitalists could no longer afford to live here. (3) No one pretends that cigars can be made upon your would-be basis of wages. Already most of the cigars consumed here, apart from those made by Chinamen, are imported from New York. As for the yarns about leprous Chinese cigar-makers, the finest cigars in the world, those of Havana, are all, without exception, made by Chinamen; and this has been the case for upward of twenty years. (4) Fish caught and vegetables grown by Chinamen are now sold in this market quite cheaply. Drive the Chinamen away, and neither of these articles of food would be seen at any tables but those of the rich. (5 and 6.) It is presumed that no one but Chinamen are prepared to fill the places of these classes. (7) This is really the only class of laborers who come into competition with the workmen whom you admit to citizenship. They are ready to retire at any moment in favor of the latter, who are welcome to undertake the dangerous and offensive labors which the Chinese now perform in these manufactures.

The settlement of California is due to its placer mines. While these were prolific the country was prosperous, and high prices, high wages, and high living was possible. To augment this profligacy you invited Chinamen here, and worked them for your own benefit. When the placers were exhausted some of you combined and turned your attention to quartz mines; others to wheat farming. The Chinese picked up a living by resorting to petty industries in which you could not compete with foreign or Eastern artisans, and which you, therefore, could not have started. Now that the Chinamen have built up these trades some of you would drive them away, hoping, no doubt, to fill their places, and perhaps fill them at higher wages. How mean! how stupid! The truth is that you can no more continue these industries after the Chinamen are driven away than you can work a hydraulic claim without piping, or a manufactory without steam. The Chinese are the labor-saving machines that render these industries possible. Banish them and the industries will perish. Then will your coast be deserted and your working men themselves forced to flee from it. They can not live upon quartz-mines and seem to be averse to wheat farming. When they shall have raised the price of living to what it was of yore, and shall find themselves, as they will, without the placer mines which sustained it, they must either leave or starve. May heaven guide them in their darkness. They have much need of light when they regard the poor Chinaman as being in their way; the truth being that without his aid in providing them with cheap food, clothing, services, etc., they would not be able to live here at all.

The same logic that would banish the Chinese will destroy every labor-saving machine in the land. This would involve not merely the harvesting and sewing machines, but also the spade and the axe. The former in the hands of a skilled husbandman will perform as much labor as could be done by a dozen men with fingers and toes; the latter as much as could be effected by a hundred men with their unaided tooth. These labor-saving implements, therefore, displace so many honest workmen, who may starve for lack of work. Moreover, the spade and axe are non-consumers. They neither eat, drink, nor wear clothes, as Christians do. The spade has no religion; the axe no morals. The spade is a filthy instrument groveling among worms and putrid bodies; the axe has committed many bloody crimes. The spade cannot agitate; nor the axe vote. They are not allowed to perform the duties of citizen, and are, therefore, unworthy of its privileges; one of these being that of remaining in the country. Many spades and axes come from Sheffield, and nearly all others are made of British steel. They are, therefore, aliens, whose presence here, and whose strange attributes form a standing threat to American institutions. Your laws or customs do not permit them to mingle with your people. No man may marry a spade; no woman an axe. The very aspect of these alien labor-saving machines is repulsive to you. The spade does not wear a queue longer even than George Washington's, nor the axe excel General Grant in the smoking of narcotics; but they both go stark naked, without a strip of clothing on them; and what sight can be more offensive to civilized eyes? Then down with these labor-saving implements. Let the cry of every true American be: The Spades and Axes Must Go!

But this machine-smashing logic is not peculiar to California. The industrial world of Christendom resounds with it. The same class of men who burned the woolen frames at Lancashire are now breaking the reapers and mowers of New York, the harvesters of Kansas, and the gang-plows of the San Joaquin valley. When Commodore Perry visited Japan he carried ashore a miniature railway, a telegraph, a barvester, and numerous labor-saving implements. "Your civilization is degraded; ours is elevated," cried this worthy commander to the wondering Asiatics. "Behold the proof. Your plows and carriages (jin-riki-sha) are drawn by men; ours by steam. Your messages are carried by runners; ours by lightning. You are the slaves of toil; we are the masters." You were very anxious to sell these civilizing machines to the Japanese, in order, as you said, to lift them up to your own proud level, and you have never failed to similarly press them upon us. Was this because you were mistaken with respect to the advantages of labor-saving machines, or because you anticipated having no further use for them at home?

But enough. The times are hard; there is much suffering among the poor in every land, and coming, as I do, from a country where suffering has most enthroned itself I am not disposed to push the argument beyond the pale of self-defense. No one has a deeper stake in the welfare of your working classes than the Chinese; for unless they manage to sustain themselves, what must be the fate of our starving millions? All I ask is that your workmen will cease to look upon the Chinese as the source of their troubles. It is not there, nor is it in the presence of any other labor-saving machines. Perhaps they will find it in the world's dwindling stock of metallic money—and in this respect one of the planks of their platform commends itself most heartily to my mind. Perhaps they will find it in governmental extravagance, in the exemption of government bonds and other property from taxation—I know not where. Your Congressional Committee, now in New York, is making the proper inquiries. It is not our business to discover the causes of your misfortunes. It is enough if we show that they do not arise from our presence here, and that, on the contrary, they are infinitely aggravated were you unfortunately to forget what we honor, to justice, and to your own interest, and a empty away from your shores. ## TWO GENTLEMEN OF CALAVERAS.

An Episode in the History of Murphy's Camp

I.

I will allow "the Major" to deliver his own character:

"I don't pretend that I am a modern Chevalier Bayard by any means, neither do I wish to be charged with the affected elegance of a Chesterfield, but I do claim that I possess the instincts of a gentleman. I will elucidate. A gentleman never wittingly causes pain; a gentleman never quarrels with his inferiors; a gentleman always resents an intended insult. He preserves his honor intact, never sully-ing it by a mean action. A man who claims the true knight-hood as his birthright has as much regard for the helplessness of every degree, be they men, women, or children, as he would have for his own blood relations. He calls all men brothers, and his hand is always stretched forth to aid and assist those who require his help."

"Maje, O Maje! I say, Maje."

The speaker was a little man, attired in a suit of ancient, greasy, picturesquely ragged clothes. A man overshadowed by a broad brimmed, white straw hat, which compelled him to assume a striking resemblance to a mushroom, although, perhaps, in reality he was only a toadstool.

"Well, Steve," answered the Major, drawing himself up, and as he cast a glance of gentlemanly benignity upon the "inferior," patronizingly waited for the human fungus to speak.

"Maje, I love ye."

The earnest tone in which "Little Steve" declared his passion, and the grotesque contortion of his countenance while emphasizing the sentiment, created a hearty laugh among the by-standers, although the words and action had been familiar to them and a by-word among them for years.

"I know you love me, Steve."

"Of course ye do, Maje, but I love ye all the same. Gi' me a quarter."

"What will you do with a quarter, Steve?" asked the Major, smiling in conscious superiority upon the diminutive specimen before him.

"I'll get somethin' to eat, Maje. Gi' me a quarter."

"No, Steve, you want the money for whisky. Now, be honest, and say you intend to spend it for whisky."

"Ah, Maje, ye think ye've struck it. I love ye, Maje. Gi' me a quarter."

"Not for whisky. You're getting too old to shorten your days with whisky."

"Ver gettin' down close to the tail-race yerself, Maje."

"I know it, Steve, and so I've quit drinking."

"Don't ye drink, Maje?"

"No, Steve."

"What! don't drink? An' that nose! Don't drink? Ah, Maje, I love ye, but that nose, that nose: an' don't drink?"

The rude laughter of the crowd must have ruffled the calm spirit of "the first gentleman in Calaveras," but not a line upon that firm, handsome face quivered as he slowly sauntered to the table on the other side of the saloon and disposed himself in an easy, negligent attitude to watch the progress of a quite little poker game. Not so his late re-veler. Drawing the corners of his mouth down and tipping his wide-brimmed sombrero forward upon his brow, he turned toward the bar, muttering disconsolately:

"It's a cold, calculatin' world. Stevey, old boy, yer for-sook. Barkeep, I love ye. Gi' me a glass o' whisky." He threw down a dime.

"All right, Steve."

As the barkeeper turned to get the bottle Steve picked up the dime and returned it to his pocket.

The barkeeper poured out a liquor which Steve at once perceived was not what he wanted, and, in the petulant, half whining tone of a spoiled child, poured the vials of his wrath upon the head of the man who was attempting to impose upon him.

"Ye scavenger, what do ye call that? Whisky? Ye lie: its yer own base blood, an' its too weak for Steve, ye bet yer life! Ye've squeezed it out o' yer heart, ye miser. Ye don't know a gentleman when he comes to yer bar. I'm a gentleman, ye base born dog. I've got money; I've paid ye a dime fur whisky, an' ye gi' me liver milk. Gi' me a glass o' whisky, ye scavenger, or I'll leave yer house an' never patro-nize it again. I'll get my friends to leave ye. I'm a gentleman, an' I'll have what I pay for."

This tirade having amused the crowd immensely, the whisky was produced, as Steve knew it would be. But the barkeeper of the Raffle Saloon never saw Steve's dime again.

II.

The arrival of the stage at Murphy's was a diurnal event. As the four white horses dashed up to the express office mon-otony flapped its weary wings and instantly took flight. It was the signal for lights to glimmer through the deepening twilight from cottage and store; and when the lumbering vehicle swung half gracefully to a position in front of the post-office, a crowd of eager men were always in waiting to receive it. While the driver was dragging the brown leather mail bags from beneath his seat he was the target for dozens of pithy interrogatories and pungent jests, to all of which he replied with equal pith and redundant pungency.

"How's the creek, Sam?"

"Low, Judge."

"See anything o' Bill Bertine down at Milton, Sam?"

"Fetched him as far as Long's, Cap."

"Nobody wanted to look into the treasure box this time, I s'pose; did they, Sam?"

"Not this trip, Colonel. Taint quite time for them fellers ter be inquisitive, ye see."

"Any calico aboard?"

"One piece."

"How's the roads?"

"Bully."

"How's things below, anyhow, Sam?"

"Same's usual, Maje; played out."

Further supplies from this source of information were sud-denly cut short by rattling harness and the rapid disappear-ance of the mountain chariot around a neighboring corner.

Between the express office and the post-office "the Calaveras Hotel." A lady, en-cloped in a brown linen duster, whose face was concealed in the ample folds of a green tissue veil, was attempting to alight. Her duster caught on the corner of the seat and held her back. Major William R. Morgan saw the lady's predicament, and, spurred by the instincts of a gentleman, he hastened to her relief. O Fate! thy ways are indeed past finding out. The Major's deft fingers soon disengaged the flowing duster, and the Major's strong arm easily bore the slight form of its wearer to the sidewalk.

"Thank you, sir." The voice was not musical.

"Not at all, madam." A bow worthy of Turveydrop. "Can I assist you further?" he inquired, observing that the lady was regarding him intently through her veil.

"Oh, William! it is, oh, it is!" and the linen duster pre-cipitated itself upon the tall form of the astonished Major; its sleeves encircled his neck, and the green tissue rubbed against his immaculate shirt front.

"Madam!"

"O William!"

"Madam, I really, this is —"

"O William; after all these years."

"I don't understand you, madam; really there must be some mistake."

"Why, William, don't you know me?" The lady stepped back and raised her veil, revealing a face wrinkled with age, not to say homely. Her bright eyes sparkled with animation and pleasure, redeeming in a measure the plainness of her features. The Major stood for a moment, as if paralyzed. He uttered but one sentence:

"My God, she's come at last!"

Then he fled as if a pestilence were pursuing. The Major had proved recreant to "the instincts of a gen-tleman" upon this occasion at least.

The lady stood rigid for a moment and then turned with a mortified expression toward the hotel door.

"Why don't you cuss him, missis?"

Little Steve emphasized every other word in his usual ab-surdly emphatic manner as he reeled across the lady's path.

"Do you know him?" sharply inquired the forsaken.

"Do I know him? Know the old Maje? That's purty good. Why the Maje's my pard, missis."

"Your what?"

"My pard. We runs together, me and the Maje does. He stakes me when I'm broke, an' when he's strapped I—well I'm purty much broke most o' the time."

"If I'm not very much mistaken, that man's William —"

"Bill, missis, Bill's his fust cog, arter is title."

"I don't approve of slang names, sir," and the lady curled her thin lips in ineffable scorn.

"Maybe ye don't missis, but ye can't play no 'William' on the Maje. The old man won't hev it. 'Cause yer? 'Spose ye go shoutin' 'William' round through this yer camp an' the boys tacks 'Sweet' onto it, how d'ye 'spose the Maje'd take it? He'd ride, that's how he'd take it. 'Spose some old squint-eyed rooster'd come slashin' round shoutin' out 'Steph-en!' meanin' me, how d'ye think I'd like it? How d'ye 'spose I'd take it? Why I'd ride too. That's where the Maje an' me agrees all the time."

The lady had regarded Little Steve with unconcealed con-tempt during this discourse, but she may be excused by all fair-minded people upon the hypothesis that most of it was unintelligible to her.

"Well, what is his name then?" was her spitefully enun-ciated question.

"Maje."

"Which I take to be slang for Major."

"No taint. It's Maje, plain Maje."

"I suppose he's got more of a name than that?"

"Maje Bill Morgan, of it's the hull ticket yer after."

"I wasn't mistaken. I knew I was right."

"Relative?" asked Steve, lurching toward her.

"It's none of your business."

"Wife, maybe?" was Steve's imperturbable rejoinder.

"Shut up!" and the lady made a frantic dash for the door.

"Grandmother?" shouted Steve, as she darted through the door.

Receiving no answer, the toadstool zigzagged down the street muttering emphatic words for his own delectation.

III.

Major William R. Morgan earned a precarious livelihood as a lawyer not overburdened with practice. Notwithstand-ing the limited legal business that accidentally found its way into his office, however, he managed to keep up appearances, and by clothing himself in habiliments according with his gentlemanly instincts would have impressed the superficial observer with the idea that he was at least an aristocrat in straitened circumstances—any person would have freely sub-scribed to his claim to gentility. He occupied an office ad-joining that of Judge Robertson, and early on the morning the events I have related Charlie Fitzpatrick, Robinson's clerk, while deeply immersed in his studies for the bar, heard a strange altercation through the dividing partition.

The Major spoke first:

"I can hardly support myself, much less a woman."

A female voice replied:

"If I was young and good-looking, William, you'd find a way to take care of me."

"Youth and beauty never sway the action of a true gen-tleman where a lady is concerned," answered the Major.

"You knew I was coming."

"And you knew I was not prepared to receive you."

"Your answers to my questions left me in doubt."

"I consider myself too much of a gentleman to offend where I can palliate and accomplish the purpose I seek to attain."

"But you didn't."

"I see I didn't."

There was silence for a moment and then the Major con-tinued:

"But, really, I am at a loss to perceive on what grounds you base a claim to any pecuniary aid from me."

The lady's most spiteful tones made answer: "You're at a loss, are you? You can't see where my rights come in, eh? Well, if you can't, you can't, and that's all there is about it. But I can, and I think this or any other com-munity will maintain me in those rights if I ask 'em."

"Our relationship ceased more than twenty years ago, madam."

"It will never cease."

A groan.

"You needn't take on so about it, William Morgan; I'm here now, and I'm going to stay. There, now."

"Stay and be—"

Horror of horrors! The Major had again proved recreant to "the instincts of a gentleman," or, more fairly speaking, perhaps, "the instincts of a gentleman," had proved recreant to the Major.

"You may swear to your heart's content, William, but it won't alter the case."

"I wish I were dead."

"Poor man!" sarcastically.

"Do you intend to persecute me?"

"If you call staying in this rag-tag, bob-tail town persecu-tion, I'll persecute you, for here I'll stay if I have to take in washing to keep the wolf from the door; and at my age, too." (A series of modulated sobs.)

"Then I'll leave."

"Your disgrace shall follow you."

"I'm desperate. Let anything follow me so that you keep your distance."

"You're an ungrateful wretch."

"I'll not remain to be reviled in my own office, madam. Good day, madam."

A door slammed and quick, heavy, angry footfalls sounded on the sidewalk outside. For a moment nothing more was heard by the deeply-interested law student. Then the door slammed again—slammed so hard that the windows rattled, and rapid, light, spiteful footfalls pattered down the street. The student dashed his "Chitty" into the book-case, grabbed his hat, and rushed into the street. In fifteen minutes the entire population of Murphy's knew that the Major's wife had arrived. The gossips discussed his heart-less desertion of "a sweet old lady" twenty years before. The female gossips mouthed it and mumbled it; the male scandal-bugs chewed it and spewed it. The Major was heartily condemned by the respectable majority, and pitied by the disreputable minority. In either case it was a galling chain to hang about the neck of "the first gentleman in Calaveras." The Major, all unconscious of the immediately impending storm, entered the Raffle saloon. There were gathered his boon companions, and, exercising the prerog-atives of boon companions, they proceeded with refined cruelty to "chaff" him.

"Why didn't you tell us about it?" asked Sandy McIntyre.

"Tell you about what?" inquired the Major.

"That you were married."

"I am not married."

"That's played out, Maje; we've got the documents."

"Gentlemen, my wife died twenty years ago," answered the Major, gazing sadly around upon the grinning group.

"It won't do, Maje," laughed Tom Williams. "It won't do. But you ain't the fust man by a long shot."

"What do you mean?"

"You might as well own up, Maje. Bygones is bygones, an' besides, Maje, you war drove to it. Make the best of it an' settle down to business agin."

"I don't catch your drift, Tom. What are you trying to say?" and the Major flushed a little, beginning to perceive that this badinage had something to do with the late arrival.

"I ken prove it by the boys here, Maje, that you're in pardnership. It was mean of you to keep it back so long. Darned mean, Maje, an' we a tellin' you all our little domes-tic secrets right along."

"What are you driving at, boys? Come, out with it, and on the honor of a gentleman I'll make a clean breast of the whole matter." The Major was gradually getting excited.

"You're married, an' the old gal hez come to see how you're prosperin'; darned ef it wasn't kind of her, but it's all right, Maje; we'll stan' by you an' comfort you when she storms round an' runs you off the ranch."

"You are wrong, gentlemen. I am not married."

"Well, it mounts to the same thing."

"No, it don't; my wife died twenty-one years ago, as I told you before."

"Oh, then, it's your lovin' sister, come out from the States to tell you how the old place hez changed. We oughter thought o' thet afore, boys."

The heaven of sarcasm with which this reply of "Bos-ton's" was permeated was fully appreciated by the crowd, and a derisive laugh went up in token of approval.

"She is not my sister."

There was a tone of counter-sarcasm in the Major's reply which offset the Bostonian effort, but the rude "sports" and loafers in that gathering could not have explained it if they had tried.

"How about cousin?" asked Sandy McIntyre, with a fee-ble effort at keeping up the prevailing tone of the conversa-tion.

"You are guessing wild, Sandy, as usual," said the Major. "You'd better throw her off altogether, Maje, an' say she's some o' yer wife's relations. What do you take us fur—Chi-namen?"

This wild burst of honest indignation was from Fandango Frank, the roughest, and at the same time the most out-spoken, denizen of the camp. He threw it out as a parting shot, and three or four of those congregated about the Major turned on their heels laughing and ejaculating, "Wife's re-lations is good."

"You are right, Frank," said the Major; "and to satisfy the miserable, prying curiosity of this crowd and this town, I'll explain that the lady who arrived last night, and to whom you of course refer, is my mother-in-law. The man or woman who says a word derogatory of her shall be held strictly accountable by me. My mother-in-law, gentlemen, was my sainted wife's mother, and she is entitled to the re-spect of all my friends. Let's have something—all hands."

Thus did the Major vindicate his own honor and disguise his own feelings in this trying episode of his life.

That night "the first gentleman of Calaveras" was very drunk. Vain respite.

IV.

The comfortable situation of the Major's mother-in-law at the Calaveras Hotel, and the Major's apparent acceptance of the situation, had almost silenced the scandal-mongers, when an incident occurred which was sufficient to cause an-other ripple upon the surface of the social pool.

The Major was seated in his office, one night, conning the latest magazine in lieu of a brief, when a messenger rushed in with the exclamation:

"Maje, Little Steve's dyin', an' he wants you to come an' see him afore he's too far gone."

"Little Steve—dyin'?" How's that?" asked the Major, sincere anxiety and heartfelt solicitude overspreading his features as he questioned.

"Well, you see, Steve was on a big bust—the wust, I reckon, he ever tackled; an' when he tried to git home to sober off he was stumblin' an' fallin' at ev'ry step. Of course the boys only laughed at him—the derved coyotes wouldn't a helped him ef he'd bin dyin' thet minit. Little Steve know'd he'd hev to make his cabin alone, an' picked himself up after ev'ry tumble, cussin' ez ef his heart'd break. Derved ef I wasn't mad enough to go down town an' knock bell's bells outen the hull bilin' w'en I heard it. So Steve tumbles, and reels, and picks himself up, until he comes to Sadler's old shaft, jest under the trail—you know the place, Maje. W'en he gits to thet spot he stops a minit, an' then plunges head fust into the hole, and lays thar. He says he couldn't a' helped goin' in; he know'd the shaft was thar, an' he was drawed to it. Thet was las' Monday, four days ago, an' he wasn't found 'til nex' day. Jim Acherly heerd him groanin', an' went down after him. The doctor says it's internal an' he can't live till mornin', so Steve sends me over fur you, 'cause he ain't easy in his mind 'bout somethin' between you an' him. Ef those fellers as saw him tryin' to git home hed only helped him instead of laughin' at him, he'd a bin all right now. Ter h—I with sech Christians!"

While Fandango Frank was thus delivering himself the Major was putting on his overcoat and hat. Then, without a word farther, the two men plunged into the darkness. It was raining heavily, and the trail was slippery. As they tramped through the mud and slush the only sounds audible, besides their own footfalls, was the mournful sighing of the wind through the wet pines and the steady drip of the rain.

"There's the shaft," said Frank, as they came to the narrowest and most difficult part of the trail. It was a great, yawning, black hole, looking larger and blacker in the gloom. The Major shuddered as he hurried by.

Steve's cabin on the hillside was soon reached, and the two men lost no time in entering the squalid abode. The dying man was stretched out on a rude bunk, surrounded by a crowd of men in every variety of costume known to that section. There was Bill McKenzie, the gambler, in his "plug" hat and spotless beaver suit; beside him stood Jim Acherly, in his rough miner's garb; seated at the foot of the bed was Sandy McIntyre, twirling his old slouch hat in his hands and gazing sadly into vacancy; at the head of the bed was Dr. Simpson, seated on a powder keg and watching the uneasy breathing of Steve. A tallow candle threw a dull light over the scene, lending a Rembrandt effect to the picture.

As the Major and Frank entered a subdued "Hush" went around, and this noise, slight as it was, awoke Steve from his troubled sleep. He caught sight of his friend.

"Ah, Maje, I thought maybe ye wouldn't come."

"Why not, Steve?"

"Cause I played it low down on ye, old man."

"I don't recollect, Steve."

"Of course yer don't. Yer a gentleman, Maje; I know ye are; ain't them yer own words, Maje?"

"I try to act as a gentleman; but I fear that the best of us are sometimes aggravated beyond the bounds of strict decorum."

"Kerrect, Maje; thet's me. I was aggerawated an' thet rest of it; w'en I reflected onto yer nose that day. I'm a gentleman, too, Maje; an' I 'poligizes, with my las' breath I 'poligizes, Maje."

"Don't speak of it, Steve. I bear you no ill will on that score."

"Of course ye don't, old man; 'taint in ye; yer a diamond-plated gentleman, you bet. Boys, the Maje is a gentleman; ye ken take a dyin' man's word fur thet sarcumstance."

There was silence in the room for a moment, while the rain beat mournfully upon the shingled roof, and the wind sighed sadly in the rustling pines around the cabin. The doctor felt the dying man's pulse.

"He can't hold out much longer," he whispered.

Little Steve's eyes were closed, but his thoughts were busy.

"Yer a lawyer, Maje."

"Yes, Steve."

"I want to make my will."

"All right, Steve."

The assemblage did not even smile at the dying man's absurd request. The Major produced a pencil and paper, and announced his readiness to itemize the last will and testament of Stephen Wilson.

"I gives my loose traps to Jim Acherly fur histin' me out o' the Grave."

"Who wouldn't, Steve?" interrupted Jim.

"Ye got that down, Maje?" said Steve severely, and for Acherly's especial admonition.

"All my household goods to James Acherly," answered the Major.

"That's the ticket. I gives my live stock ter Sandy, thar, in trust fur Sandy's wife thet was the widdier Miller."

"What does your live stock consist of, Steve?"

"One purp (coyote breed), one brindle goat, an' a cayuse Jack—the Jack's got the bots."

"Live stock specified, Steve."

"A hundred an' seven dollars to pay the doctor an' plant me."

The Major hesitated an instant.

"It's all right, Maje, salted it w'ile I was loafin' round. Ye'll find the bullion in thet old boot hangin' on the wall thar."

An inspection proved the truth of Steve's assertion. He had lived economically and saved his "earnings" during his vagrant career.

"All right, Steve; anything else?" asked the Major after the money had been counted.

"No—yes, ther is, too; send a lock o' my hair to Missis Bill Johnson in Savanner, Georgy. Put it down, Maje, so's you won't forget."

"I won't forget, Steve. Is that all?"

"I guess so. Only, Maje, ye might take a bit uv advice from a man as is lookin' over the edge o' the grave, an' ef ye wouldn't git riled or take it hard I'd say, don't go back on the old woman. Maybe she'll peg along 'til ye're laid out like me, an' ef ye're kind to her an' don't cuss her she'll be an angel to yer. She'll fetch an' carry things fur ye. She'll tend ye like a mother, an' ye won't die like Little Steve's dyin'—ye'll hev a woman round to smooth yer hair back an' cheer ye w'en ye think it's hard fur ye to go. Don't shake the old woman, Maje, she'll be a friend to yer w'en yer hard up fur friends."

The weary tones of the last sentences indicated that the vagrant gentleman was sinking fast. When he spoke again it was with evident effort, and his pale, thin face grinned as if with pain, but he was of course too far gone to suffer much then.

"Boys, how're ye goin' ter plant me?"

"Don't talk about it, Steve—don't give in, ef ye are peterin'. Don't talk about graves an' fun'erals. Give us somethin' cheerful—talk about hosses," blurted Sandy McIntyre.

"Don't you take on so, Sandy. I ain't scared. You'll hev ter pass in yer checks bimeby, so what's the odds? Gime a send-off, will ye, boys?"

Unanimous assent in a low tone.

"Ye'll all turn out, won't ye?"

"You bet."

"They'll close the shops w'en the percession goes down the street, won't they?"

"Of course."

Another interval of silence.

"Any preachin'?"

"Do you want any, Steve?" inquired the Major.

"Don't know—but what—I'd rest easier—ef somethin' was said—'bout me—after I was—dead. Somethin' good—yer know."

He raised himself with an effort, and stretching out his hand, whispered:

"Good-bye, boys—ef I don't see ye agin'."

He fell back upon the pillow, seemingly unconscious, as one after the other grasped his hand. He was breathing his last. His mind wandered. They could hear him muttering incoherently:

"I love ye—I love ye. Gi' me a quarter?"

He threw his hands up convulsively.

"Gi' me a quarter, Maje? I love ye—I love ye—I love—"

Little Steve was dead. E. H. CLOUGH.

A REMARKABLE LADY MATHEMATICIAN.

A few years ago, when pursuing professional studies in New York, I became interested in some mathematical investigations, and, in pursuit of them, frequented the Astor Library, where I was given access to the alcoves containing some curious mathematical volumes, among which I noticed a work on Analytical Geometry, published in Milan in 1748, and also an English translation of the same work. I found it to be the production of a lady, Maria Gaetana Agnesi; and, after reading the preface, my curiosity was excited to find out something about such a remarkable person. An examination of the encyclopædia gave me only a meagre and unsatisfactory account—merely a few bare details of her birth, residence, and death. This led me to ask the courteous librarian for some information, and he told me there was no account of her history except in a French volume containing proceedings of the Royal Academy in Paris, where was published an éloge after her death. He found it for me, and from it I was able to glean a tolerably full account of this remarkable woman, which I believe has not been heretofore published in English.

She was born at Milan on the sixteenth of March, 1718. Her father was a person of good position and respectable talents as a mathematician, being a professor in the University of Bologna. His position and his tastes brought to his house some of the best cultivated men of the day, who, it may be supposed, exerted a marked influence over his family. His young daughter, the subject of this sketch, was observed to be an attentive listener at these reunions; and soon it was discovered that she displayed an extraordinary aptitude for languages, inasmuch that her father put her to the same studies in Latin and Greek as her elder brother. She acquired languages so rapidly as to be called the "walking polyglot." It is said she could, at the age of twelve, speak seven languages and converse readily in Latin. At this age she began the practice of reciting the office of the Virgin in Greek—a practice she faithfully observed during her whole life. About this time, also, she is said to have written a thesis, and delivered it before a private meeting of her father's friends, to show the suitability of classical studies for women. In the year 1730 her severe mental application began to tell on her, and she was attacked with headache and vertigo, which more or less troubled her during her life. As a remedy, she was advised to take riding lessons; and soon she became quite expert in the saddle, and in other athletic exercises, which exercised a most beneficial effect on her general health.

Her father's house was the resort of many eminent mathematicians, who were exceedingly interested in her studies, and gave her much encouragement in prosecuting them. These were ecclesiastics, and many of them devout men, which will account for the strong religious bias she manifested, and her subsequent renunciation of the world. At the age of twenty she took an inclination to retire from the world to a convent, and asked her father's consent, who was painfully surprised when he learned, her intention—his disappointment being the greater from the high hopes he had entertained of her future eminence. After some remonstrance she yielded to his objections on three conditions, which were, that she should be allowed to clothe herself in a simple, humble manner; that she might attend church on every occasion she wished, and that she should give up entirely balls, theatres, and other profane amusements.

At this time there was appointed in Milan a celebrated professor of physics and mathematics, D. Ramir Rampinelli, from Brescia, who was soon offered the hospitality of the Agnesi family, where he met the subject of this sketch. From this time, under his supervision, she devoted herself entirely to mathematics, and immediately her reputation began to extend, so that eminent travelers were pleased to ask for the privilege of an audience. One of these, M. De Broses, president of the parliament of Dijon, reports a visit he made to her in 1740, and thus gives an account of it. At a conversazione, to which he and his nephew were invited, they found about thirty persons, from several different nations of Europe, sitting around, and Agnesi and her little sister seated under a canopy. "I had conceived," he says, "when I went that it was only to converse with this young lady in the usual way, though on learned subjects; but, instead of this, Count Belloni, who had introduced me, made a fine harangue to the lady in Latin, with the formality of a college declamation. She answered with great readiness and ability in the same language; and they then entered into a disputation on fountains, and the causes of the ebbing and flowing which is observed in some of them, like the tides in the sea. She spoke singularly well on this subject, and I never heard it treated in a manner that gave me more satisfaction. Count Belloni then desired me to enter with her on the discussion of any other subject I chose, provided that it related to mathematics or natural philosophy. This proposal alarmed me a great deal, as I found that I was expected to hold a conversation in the Latin language, with which I had no longer that familiar acquaintance and readiness in speaking which in the days of my youthful studies I possessed. However, I made the lady the best excuses I could for the want of skill in that language." He then relates how the discourse turned upon "transparent bodies," and on curvilinear geometry, carried on in French and Latin. "After this," he says, "the conversation became general, every one speaking to her in the language of his own country, and she answering in the same language, for her knowledge of languages is prodigious. I was sorry to hear that she was determined to enter a convent and take the veil, which was not for want of fortune for she is rich, but from a religious and devout turn of mind, which disposes her to shun the pleasures and vanities of the world."

She now conceived the idea of simplifying a work on analytical geometry that was found to be very abstruse; but after some time she determined to publish an original work, which appeared in 1748, under the title of "Analytical Institutions"—a work that established her fame throughout all Europe; and obtained for her the honorary membership of several learned academies. A copy of this wonderful work in Italian, published in the same year, as well as an English translation made by the Rev. John Colton for the use of the ministry of Cambridge, is in the Astor library. Agnesi dedicated the work by permission to Maria Theresa, of Austria, and the dedication is unusually interesting, and justifies a few extracts. She begins by saying, "Among the various arguments revolved in my mind inducing me to hope that your Sacred Majesty, according to your great condescension, would vouchsafe to receive favorably this work of mine, which is proud to shelter itself under your august name, and humbly crave your gracious patronage and protection—among all these arguments, I say, none has encouraged me so much as the consideration of your sex, to which your Majesty is so great an ornament, and which by good fortune, happens to be mine also. For if at any time there can be an excuse for the rashness of a woman who ventures to aspire to the sublimities of a science which knows no bounds, not even those of infinity itself, it certainly should be in this period in which a woman reigns, and reigns with universal applause and admiration. Indeed, I am fully convinced that in this age—an age which from your own reign will be distinguished to latest posterity—every woman ought to exert herself and endeavor to promote the glory of her sex, and contribute her utmost to increase the lustre which it happily receives from your Majesty. Vouchsafe, therefore, madame, to cast a favorable eye on this performance of mine, not only as a work which comprehends the highest attempts of the understanding, but also as the greatest tribute it was in my power to offer to the glory of your auspicious reign."

This dedication was acknowledged by Maria Theresa in the following communication, written in French, and it may be interesting to copy it in that language:

"Sa majesté l'Impératrice, notre souveraine a daigné me charger de vous manifester le plaisir avec lequel elle a reçu le savant ouvrage des 'Institutions Analytiques' que vous lui avez dédié. Une des choses que S. M. a le plus à cœur est qu'en instruisant avec soin la jeunesse. Elle a donc éprouvé un grand plaisir, en voyant qu'une personne de votre mérite, après avoir obtenu les applaudissements des savans, en se livrant à acquérir des connoissances utiles, soit parvenue à repandre de la clarté et de l'agrément sur les sciences les plus sublimes."

"Elle m'a commandé en même temps de vous faire tenir le paquet que je vous présente, pour que vous conserviez ce qu'il contient, en memoire de l'estime et de la bienveillance qu'elle a pour vous. En exécutant les ordres de Sa Majesté, je félicite avec vous de la justice qu'elle rend à votre rare mérite par cet acte que me donne occasion de vous assurer que je suis votre très humble serviteur,

LE COMTE PALLAVICINI.

"MILAN, le 5 Octobre, 1748."

Greater than all these preëminent marks of distinction was her appointment to succeed her father in the chair of mathematics in the University of Bologna. This honor was conferred on her in the most flattering terms by Pope Benedict XIV., who declared that it was not she who was honored by the appointment, but rather the University. It was merely an honorary dignity, as there is no evidence that she actually performed any duties appertaining to the position. At that time her fame was at the highest; the Academy of Sciences at Paris accepted her work, awarded it the highest commendation, and regretted their rules did not permit ladies to be enrolled as members.

Shortly after this, in 1752, she lost her father, and now the step she had long contemplated was taken. She abandons her chosen pursuits, turns her back upon well-earned applause, relinquishes the hopes of still further renown, and immures herself in the solitude of a convent, retiring to a seclusion to which many of her sex have brought the most brilliant talents, the best cultured intellects, and the loveliest traits of both mind and person. The pious may deem the sacrifice all the more pleasing and meritorious, but we can not but lament that talents so transcendent and gifts so extraordinary were not longer employed for the benefit of the world and the glory of her sex. But still were her devotion and active benevolence bestowed for the benefit of the suffering. She had a comfortable fortune which she entirely devoted to the support of the indigent and the sick, attending to them personally and relieving their wants. She joined the strictest order of nuns—the Blue Nuns—and was conspicuous and exemplary as a devoted member of the order. She thus lived in the exercise of the most perfect piety, and self-sacrifice for nearly forty-seven years.

LITTLE JOHNNY ON A RIVAL JOURNALIST.

My father he sed to Uncle Ned: "Edard, hav you see las Satterdys Post?" And Uncle Ned he sed mebbey my mother had took it for a bussle, wudent he jest as leaf have the Wops, wich had got a nice picter of a jackous buckin?"

Then my father he sed a other time: "Edard, wen I ask you a question I got a rite for to expectk you to anser that pertickler inquire, and no side issues. Taint wot any woom-an may hapt to be a doin for to buttle hersef, nor yet wether He hav this or that, but hav you see the Post of Satterdy last?"

Then Uncle Ned he sed: "No."

Then my father he said: "Wel, Edard, you know my oppinion of that paper, and you know my oppinion of any boddie wich will read it, slong as goin to funerals is more amazin and studyn in the fier poker is more teechnin, and shakin for the drinks is moraler. Wot do you think the Edditer of that detestible sheet has went and done? You dont know, Edard—you giv it up. Wel, the lollie blagerd has ben and printed a long article all a bout how menny boys our leaden citizins has got, and wot nice boys they be. Edard, wen I reflexk wot newspaperin in San Francisco has be come, wile Bildad, thats the new dog, and Mose, wich is the cat, is jest a wastin their tallents a snappin up blu bottle flies and a groing fiddle strings, respectively, it makes me jest as hop-pin mad as a hen with her hed cut off!"

Then Uncle Ned he said wot did my father doo when he was mad like that, and my father said: "Doo! Wot can I doo but lick Billy and Johnny, and kick Bildad, thats the new dog, and heav things at Mose, wich is the cat?"

Jest then Billy he said he gessed that pig was in the garden agin, and I membered Ide left my whaggon on the side wock, and Bildad tried for to git the pint of his tale tween his fore legs, and Mose made huzzen real big, and his back upper than cammies backs, and there was a fewnerel percession to the back yard, but no preach.

Next time I seen Uncle Ned I said wot was it all a bowt, and he said: "Johnny, its only that feller Kernle Jacksing has ben a printin things into his paper callin all the snotti-nose brats wich has got rich fathers yung eagles, and strong limd lions, and cleer ide cracky diles, and sech rot."

Then I said: "Did he call me and Billy that, hooray?"

But Uncle Ned he said: "Johnny, its natterel that yure fection for the broot creasion shude bline yure eys to the disgustacy of sech littlature, but you an Billy aint menshion, for 2 reasons. Fers, yure father, owin to the mournful habit wich I hav got of speckle atin for a rize in wile cats, aint as rich as his virtues deserves, pertickler his tutchin faith in my judgment. Second, the stern dizplin of yure mother in the matter of hankcheefs is sech that you dont come in the cattigory of yuths wich I hav elligantly dessinated as snotti-nose. So you mus for the present pine in obscurity, til mebbey some time you can get Kurnel Jacksins tention onto you by lickin rich men's feets your own self instead of him."

But if Uncle Ned thinks I wude do it I can jest tel him they got to wash em, but pigs trotters is mity nice pickeld, I can tel you.

After a wile Uncle Ned he said a uther time: "Johnny, yure Uncle Edard, as yu was once on the pint of remarkin, has ben in Iniy and evry were, and natterly has saw a good menny gum dasted fools, not to menshion ole Gaifer Peters and Ginnel John MacCooom, but this is the first time in all his life wich he has ever herd of a gay galoot wich wude print in his own news paper a list of distinguish men and their yung, and put hisself in a mung em, with a slobberin scrip-tion of his own welps! He done it, Johnny, he done it, and wile I dont say that it wude justifie yure father in lickin you and Billy, like he thretdent, I mus conphes it is enough to make you an Billy lick yure father if you was able."

Then Billy he said: "Wy et we to lickim wen twont him done it?"

Uncle Ned he thot a wile, and then he said: "William, my lad, beware of softistry: by sech reesonin as that you can prove any thing wot ever. Spose that on last Fridy Cunnel Jaxsons boys had arcude that way. At that time he haddent done it, neether. But warent he jest on the ragged edge of doin it? And wudent a good larruppin lade him up so he cudnt? I tel you, my lads—and you must bleeve a man wich has ben in Iniy and evry were—there issent any way for to tel til afterwids wether the time is ripe for a boy to lick his father or not; but if he has got one wich is like Kurnel Jacksen it is best to olways be on the safe side and lickim. And with these improvvin observations He conclude with a little story.

"One time there was a jackus jumped in to a paster were there was some horses, and one hors it said: 'Wot bizness you got in here, y a offle feller, a mung us? Git out, you horble apperition!' Then the jackus he said: 'Wel, I kanow I aint reel purty for to look at, but jest gimme the rite kind of a white and Ile sho y a sech a jolly lot of strong limd and cleer eyed young mules as you aint any of you got yure own.'"

A word spoken to a tramp may cheer his whole
Remember this when you see him walking off and fifty feet of garden hose.

LAND VIEWS AND OTHER VIEWS.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—In an editorial of last week you appeal to the forthcoming Convention to provide for the equal taxation of all species of property, "first, because it is right; and second, because it is politic and wise." I differ with you, and hold that all taxation for revenue should be imposed upon land only: First—Personal property and improvements consist of things produced by individual exertion, and are therefore rightly individual property. Land is the creation of the Almighty, and is therefore rightly common property. The value of personal property and improvements is a real value, which its possessors or those from whom they take have added to the wealth of the community. The value of land is not a real but a reflected value. It represents not an addition to the wealth of the community, but simply the power of appropriating that wealth. It is, therefore, only right that the whole value of land should be exhausted by taxation before any levy is made upon personal property and improvements. Second—Besides, the considerations of right, policy, and wisdom require that taxation should be so levied as to be collected with the greatest certainty and the least vexation, expense, and demoralization, and so as to least interfere with production. 1. There never was, and never will be, a correct assessment and certain collection of a tax on personal property—the attempt to secure it by oaths involves perjury; the attempt to secure it by inquisitorial power involves corruption. But land can not be concealed, and its value can always be ascertained, and the whole revenue might be collected from it with no greater expense than to collect a part. 2. To tax personal property and improvements is to discourage production. To tax money is to have less money; to tax horses is to have fewer horses, etc. But no matter how heavy the tax on land, will there be any less land? Nor until the tax is greater than the value of the land will it in the slightest degree discourage the use and improvement of land. On the contrary, it will stimulate the use and improvement of land by making it unprofitable to hold land without using it, and thus making it easier for those who wish to use land to get it. For these reasons it is politic and wise that all taxes for revenue should be put on the value of land, and personal property and improvements be entirely exempted. HENRY GEORGE.

If Mr. Henry George is right, and land should bear all the burdens of government, and there should be no limitation of that tax until it equals the value of the land, would it not be just a little hard upon the present land-owners? Has not land been acquired by its present owners by individual exertion as well as personal property? Government declares it to be property—we have sold our labor to purchase it—we have exchanged our productions to acquire it. Government protects it no more than it protects personal property. Then why should land bear all the burdens of maintaining government? The Almighty created land; the Almighty created diamonds and gold ores, silver, sulphures, and cinnabar, and the value of these things is not more real than that of land. Convenience in collecting revenues cuts no figure in the argument. There never was, and there never will be, a correct assessment of land. If the tax on personal property will discourage its production, the tax on land will discourage its occupation. How it will stimulate the use and improvement of land to make it unprofitable to hold it we do not understand. We admit that if land is taxed to its full value it will be an easy matter for any body to acquire it, but we reverently ask who in the devil would want it? As a land-owner, and not a pawn-broker, or holder of incorporated stocks, and other personal property, we would like Mr. George to explain the fairness and morality of taxing us out of our property. Won't there be just a little hardship and wrong in starting out in this new direction.

Lord Beaconsfield holds to-day in the popular estimation of Englishman a peculiar position. Without "family," and of a hated race, he is the idol of the Tory party that prides itself upon enrolling among its members the scions of the best blood and best lineage of the kingdom. Self-made, and of confessed ability, he is denounced by the Liberal party. Upon his return from Berlin he received at Charing Cross such a popular reception as was seldom accorded to one of royal blood or military achievement. His Queen has kneeled before him and affixed the emblem of the royal Order of the Garter. From a politician he has become Premier of England. He is an earl by royal letters patent. The Tories and the multitude say he has outwitted Bismarck; he has crowned England with new triumphs; he has outmaneuvered the ablest statesmen of Europe, and has defeated the ambition of Russia; he has rescued Constantinople from the grasp of the northern bear; he has opened up a new route to Hindostan; he has demonstrated England's greatness, and in the conflict of statecraft made England the arbiter of nations and first of the Powers of Europe; he has added Cyprus to the domain of the empire; he has secured the Mediterranean as an English lake, and he has forever guaranteed the permanence of the Indian Empire as an appanage of the English crown. The Liberals declare that his triumphs are illusory and unreal: that he has allowed Russia's policy of dividing Turkey to succeed; that Cyprus is a costly toy; that the protectorate of Asia Minor is a hazardous burden of responsibility; that he has only checked, not arrested, the steady march of Russian conquest that threatens to absorb Turkey and menaces the English Empire in India; that the settlement contains the germs of future troubles. The admirers of Gladstone look upon Beaconsfield as one who has won success by oftentimes changing sides and changing principles; who has won celebrity as a rhetorician and romance writer, without ability as a statesman or honesty as a man. The measure of Lord Beaconsfield's honors is full. In the foremost nation of all the world he is to-day the foremost man. His triumphs will last; till future events shall affirm his policy or demonstrate his mistake. This will not come in his lifetime, so he may rest upon his laurels, leaving his fame to the chances of future complications and the development of future events.

The very latest novelties in jewelry now worn by the elite in New York are pins, earrings, and neckchains exquisitely carved in tinted shell.

LIVERIES.

We of the American Republic, descendants of liberty-loving Saxons, have chosen labor as our monarch, and to it given the badge of royalty. Not gold, not cotton, but labor, wears the jeweled coronet of king. We honor labor; we make it respectable. The ARGONAUT is the court journal. We delight to write about labor; to chronicle its movements. When its subjects lack loyalty, and revolt against its dignity on the sand-lots, we denounce them. The ARGONAUT delights to advise American boys and native-born girls that labor is honorable; that there is no condition of birth, accident of fortune or surroundings, that should make them ashamed of honest toil. We commend our boys to the trades and farms, to the merchant-marine, to the forest, foundries, and mines; our girls to the home duties in chamber and kitchen. But we have never yet so forgotten our own early teachings, our prejudices, and our pride as to commend to our young gentlemen that they should wear the livery of flunkies. We are not so far the slaves of corporate wealth as to be willing that it should distinguish its employed men with a livery. We saw that inflated ass, Jim Fisk, when in the pride and insolence of his ill-gotten gains, put a uniform upon his employes. It lasted for a time, and if his death contributed to terminate this miserable imitation of bad European manners, it was a blessed murder. We are surprised and ashamed that our old friend and boyhood companion who is managing the California Street Railroad should be guilty of the unpardonable sin of uniforming his conductors and drivers. Gilt braid, gold bullion, and brass buttons put upon gentlemen who are willing to work, as a badge of their slavery, is a crime. Tom Hinchman and the writer were once clerks in a dry goods store in Rochester. Had their employers endeavored to uniform them they had run away and preferred to have driven a tow-boat on the canal. This road has in its employment, as conductors and drivers, gentlemen. We ride over it every day. We recognize many whom we would not be ashamed to know in any relation. We contrast them in deportment, bearing, and dress, with the employes of other roads, and we feel mortified that they should be subject to the insult of a uniform—a cap with the word "conductor" or "engineer," a badge with the number of the car, are well enough. These gentlemen work fourteen and a half hours per day, earning, on an average, say $60 per month. They have families to provide for; they ought not to be subjected to the expense of this showy toggery in its purchase, nor to the mortification of wearing it. We hope Mr. Thomas Hinchman, who is charged with conducting this road, will revoke this absurd order of uniforming his drivers and conductors before his employers see this article.

Our Denis.

The reception of Kearney, the California agitator, in Boston by a crowd of workmen, the careful reports of his speeches by the press, and the editorial comments on him by all the leading papers, form altogether a spectacle that must delight Thomas Carlyle, if he still pays attention to contemporary politics, for Kearney is probably the lowest type of demagogue that has yet appeared in history. All his predecessors of which there is any record have laid claim to some of the qualities which are supposed to distinguish the civilized man from the savage, but Kearney makes no pretense to anything which the reading, thinking, and remembering part of the human race has hitherto considered respectable. He simply does what the naked Bushman does—curses, calls names, and threatens death. Nevertheless, he has, in one of the foremost communities of the modern world, a considerable following, and is an object of interest, and even of deference, to most of our politicians. He is worth study, because he is a kind of animal for which neither American politics nor manners have made as yet the slightest preparation, and because he is the first to assert a claim which has been long in the air, viz., the claim, not simply of the poor man to rule the State, but of the brutal, ignorant, blaspheming ruffian to have his way with the frugal, industrious, prudent, and religious; and assuredly we have not seen the last of his kind. Let us add—and without any wish to raise a question of party politics—that the moral and religious people of the North, in using their influence and the force of the Federal authority to procure and maintain for several years the government of great civilized communities at the South by the grossly ignorant portion of the population, and to discredit the intelligent portion for political purposes, have been sowing the seed from which the Kearneys spring. If Kearney makes the well-meaning believers in nose-counting as an efficient means of administering human affairs a little more thoughtful and cautious, he may yet prove a useful blackguard.—New York Nation.

For Women.

Mr. Henry C. Jarrett charged eight thousand dollars for making a contract for Kellogg, which a husband could have made, and would have made, in the regular course of his duties. The lesson is obvious.

"Murder! murder!" cried a pretty milliner of Galveston, Texas, Mrs. Ella Quinn, and all the time she was peppering the body of Captain Guthrie, a false lover, with derring balls. "Things by their right names" is a characteristic female principle.

In 1836, a girl, not over fifteen, was brought to Max Maretzek. He looked at her; she was petite, a brunette, with a low forehead, plump cheeks, snappish dark eyes, and a childish manner. He listened to her; she had a bright, soprano voice, and a certain unconscious and spontaneous grace of action and utterance that impressed him. He sent her to Errani, and paid for her lessons himself, for there was a possibility that the girl might develop into a profitable prima donna. She developed into Minnie Hauk.

In a journal of a date just previous to the marriage of the manager of the Royal Italian Opera, London, to Albani we find this paragraph, faintly foreshadowing some kind of a change: "Fresh rumors have been current of the alleged approaching retirement of Mr. Frederick Gye. Mr. Gye's health is exceedingly delicate, if not actually precarious." It is now more clear what was the matter with Mr. Gye.

EXTRACTS FROM MY DIARY,—III.

By an Early Californian.

SAN JOSE IN 1847. (From an original sketch.)

For four hours we galloped on in the direction of San Juan without stopping; sometimes I would be far ahead of Bruno, and then again he would be far ahead of me. I was much pleased with him, he being by far the most intelligent Indian I had met; his thin lips and determined expression have nothing in common with those of his race. He was a general favorite on the road; and several times during the journey I was informed that I had the best vaquero in the country, and that no one could beat him in throwing the riata. During the troubles Bruno was of great assistance to our cause, often carrying dispatches through the enemy's lines when no one else dared to attempt it. We halted beside the first stream we had seen since we started, and changed horses, as ours were almost used up. The saddle-bags were lightened, too, I giving the boy half my lunch, including some of the best claret I had tasted in the country—which proved to be of that same "LaRose" which — will remember we used to get at Bonnard's and Delmonico's. How little did I imagine at that time that I should find it, or it me, on the shores of the Pacific. For a half hour I stretched myself on the grass in the warm sun in pleasant reverie; and I was far away from California when Bruno announced that the horses were ready. Soon in the saddle again, I rode on ahead, for Bruno found it hard work to drive our tired animals. We had passed San Juan before I was well aware of it; and when we were within six leagues of Monterey the sun was still well up. Here we came in sight of several dwellings, and Bruno recommended, if I intended to go on, that we should leave the poor tired beasts we were driving before us at one of the ranches, and take them again on our return. I agreed to his plan, telling him to leave them at the ranch nearest the Santa Cruz road, as I wished to pass through that place on my way home; so we jogged on until we were within three leagues of the capital. The people of the first house at which we stopped seemed not favorably disposed, on discovering that I was an Americano, but Bruno was told that a neighbor, named Garcia, might allow us to leave them. I determined, however, to alight where I was, telling Bruno to leave the horses somewhere, and call for me when he had done so. So I dismounted, and taking a claret-bottle from the saddle-bags, walked up to the door. I bid them all a buenos tardes, and asked for a little water. There were several women seated about the door, and a tall old man, whom they called Don Trinidad, received me and invited me in. They all seemed very low-spirited, and even gloomy, and I soon felt that I must be intruding upon those who were in trouble. Some glasses were brought, however, and the old man took wine with me. I told him whence I came, and tried to commence a conversation with him, and at last he asked me several questions. A good-looking young woman with a child in her arms now entered the room, and taking wine with me, asked if I came from the pueblo, and whether I had heard anything of the man who had been killed. I told her that I had, and then related the whole of the story as well as I could. She said that she had heard the same in all its particulars; and then, looking at me with a sorrowful but steady gaze, she told me, with a sigh, that the dead man was her brother. I felt for the poor girl, and while assuring her that my story was confirmed by her countrymen, I said that it was indeed pitiful. Don Trinidad came to my relief, saying that he would have acted as the stranger had; but that it was unfortunate that the accident should have happened to as good a man as ever breathed, whose conduct on the unfortunate occasion was unaccountable to him. As Bruno had now returned, I bade them good-bye, and they wished me a safe journey. It was getting so dark that I could see but little of the country, but I felt that the road was as sandy as that in the neighborhood of San Francisco, and its monotony was only relieved by our meeting some emigrant wagons bound for the delightful valley of San José. I reached Mrs. —'s, in Monterey, where Robert Wells boards, at half-past nine, having ridden ninety miles since half-past seven that morning. Early next day I received an invitation from Mr. Larkin, late American Consul, to a ball given by him at the barracks the same evening. As soon as breakfast was over, I went on board the Warren to see Captain Hull. I found Lieutenant Nanard, who came out in the Preble, in command; but Captain Hull soon made his appearance. My business with him was to obtain his approval to some bills contracted by his order; but it was only after an hour's hard talking that I succeeded. In Monterey I found many officers of the Independence and Cyane with whom I was acquainted, and the ball-room was filled with officers and the gentlemen of the place. Very few ladies were present, because Larkin had invited them to meet the officers about leaving for Mazatlan. Even a dance—that powerful attraction—could not induce them to associate with those who so soon might shed the blood of their compatriots. After passing three days in Monterey, and in pleasant rides about the environs, I left it on a Monday evening. Finding that our horses had strayed from Garcia's, and after spending an hour in looking for them, I concluded to call upon Don Trinidad, who invited me to pass the night at his house. I was only too glad to accept the invitation. His manners were friendly, and he entertained me with a little of his own history, showing me many of his papers and informing me that he was Alcalde of the Refugio, as the little village about him was called. His surname was Espinosa. He called me, as I had requested, at daylight next morning, and I took leave of him, hoping that I might soon have an opportunity of serving him. I told Bruno that, instead of going to Santa Cruz, we would keep straight on to the Pueblo, inquiring at every ranch for the horses, as in all probability they would travel homeward. We were so fortunate as to discover them at the first ranch we stopped at. The rancho was a Frenchman, who seemed delighted to meet any one who could speak his native language, and who begged, if I came that way again, that I would pass the night at his house and gossip a little. We now turned toward Santa Cruz, using the poorest horses for the journey, as we should want the best the next day in crossing the mountains which separate that place from the Pueblo. Our road, winding about the base of high hills, was through a very charming country, the farms of which seemed in far better condition than any that I had yet seen. The ponds and streams were covered with ducks and other water fowl, and the trees and bushes alive with small birds and quail. The latter are larger than ours, and are really a species of partridge. Our poor horses nearly gave out when within two leagues of our destination. Fortunately, however, a traveler, with vaquero and half a dozen horses and mules, overtook us at this point, inspiring our poor beasts with renewed life and causing them to trot along briskly for acquaintance sake. I found by the dress of my fellow-traveler that he was a reverentissimo padre, with his gray gown tucked up around his waist. As he was polite—asking many questions—I, to keep up the conversation, was quite as inquisitive, and discovered that he was a Mexican returning home from the Mission of San Juan, and that he was Padre Anser (goose). We kept together until we neared Santa Cruz. I did not arrive at Monsieur Rousillon's, the person whom it was my chief business to see, until sunset. His houses and saw mills are most romantically situated in a gorge of the mountain, surrounded by the tallest and largest redwood trees in the country—some of which I hear measure forty-five feet in circumference. The stream of water which turns the mill-wheel is so serpentine that we crossed it five times in a quarter of a mile's distance. As we approached the house I discovered two persons talking together, one of whom I instantly knew for a Frenchman; so I rode up to him and said: "C'est Monsieur Rousillon, n'est ce pas?" "C'est bien vrai; voilà Monsieur Ward qui est le bien venu." We were soon well acquainted. Orders were given about the horses and about supper, and I was carried into the house. His guest said he knew — well. I asked his name, and found he was Mrs. —'s brother, and she had desired me to see Moses in Monterey. After supper we settled accounts, made tea-punch, and told stories till bed time. I set out the next morning to visit a Señor Bolcoff, father of the young Russian bridegroom in whose company I had left San Francisco. I found a gay party assembled at his house—the bride and bridegroom arriving the night before. They were to have a grand fandango that very evening. Señora B— I had become acquainted with in San Francisco, and the old man thanked me for the attention I had shown her and her son while there, and congratulated me on arriving at so auspicious a time. I expressed my regret that I could not remain and take part in the festivities, as I had to be on my way across the mountains that afternoon. This they could not hear of, insisting upon my dining and passing the night with them. I was obliged to excuse myself from the dinner on account of business with Don Carlos Rousillon, half promising to return with him in the afternoon. So, filling my pockets with the first apples their place had produced, I set out for town with their "hasta luego" (au revoir) ringing in my ears, young B— accompanying me. We met the whole of Santa Cruz and its environs on their way to the B—'s, among them Mrs. B—'s brother, who urged me to go with him to his house, but I had to decline. My reception by these good people was most cordial—even affectionate—and I was sorely tempted to put off my departure and attend the largest fandango that had been given for a long while in that part of the country. As I found Don Carlos rather unwell, and determined to remain at home, I decided at once to begin my homeward journey. Being convinced that our worn-out animals could not be driven over the mountains, we left them with a relative of Juan Bernal, and, after dining heartily, set out at two o'clock for the Pueblo. I was surprised to hear from Don Carlos and Moses that the road was considered dangerous in consequence of some Tulare Indians having taken up their abode in the mountain recesses. Several travelers had been robbed and killed, and only a week before a volunteer had been murdered for his pistols by them, on the road to Monterey. Two of them had been captured, however; they were tried and found guilty of the crime, and were to be shot about that time. The road was indeed lonely—through gorges and hiding places, and as suggestive of banditti as a landscape of Salvator Rosa. We crept along, sometimes beside precipices that turned one's head to look over, and through woods that shut out everything but the sky. We met only a few travelers when about half way over. As the sun was setting we commenced our descent, and were galloping along a more level part of it on the top of the ridge, when I was startled by a report close at my side. I pulled up my horse in an instant, and in drawing a pistol from its holster discovered that the latter was unbuttoned, so that the pistol had been playing up and down in it, until a jolt, harder than the rest perhaps, had discharged it. The bottom of the holster, of course, had disappeared, and I looked below to see if my toes had accompanied it, or any part of my horse had been blown away. But all was safe and sound. After reloading, we trotted, or galloped, or picked our way along down hill. It seemed as though we never should reach the valley. As we approached a stream, which I hoped was at the foot of the mountain, my vaquero, who had never traveled there before, asked if I saw the road, as he had lost it. I walked my horse along the side of the stream among the thick bushes and trees, trying to discover a path, but I failed to do so, and as it was getting dark I had almost made up my mind that we should have to pass the night on the mountain. As I turned my horse back Bruno cried out that he had found the road and a ford across the stream. I followed him with some difficulty, and without being able to make out anything like a road; but I trusted to his instinct as I would trust in the scent of a pointer. So, after ascending and descending another peak, we reached a level place. My guide I could only hear ahead of me, for it was dark night, and presently a deep growl brought him to a halt. As I came up with him, I saw indistinctly a large object moving down on our right. "Oso (bear), señor," and there he was sure enough. But he did not molest us, and in an hour we were in the Pueblo again. There I found Captain King, of the brig Elizabeth, of Salem, and George McDougall. Next morning, after delivering the horses and taking our own, we joined these gentlemen, and rode over fifty-four miles back to San Francisco.

December 6, 1847.—An overland express (Kit Carson) has arrived at Monterey, and we have just received a very probable rumor that Santa Ana is killed and the City of Mexico is in possession of our forces. If such is the case peace must soon follow. We all pray for it here. Mr. Davis, of the Sandwich Islands, has lately married a daughter of Señor Estudillo, of Contra Costa. The wedding has brought all the neighborhood into town. We have given up our sleeping rooms to the señoras and señoritas, and have slept in our stores for two weeks past. Dinners, and suppers, and balls have followed one upon another, so that we scarcely know how we stand. Think of dancing three nights in succession, and two of them until eight o'clock in the morning!

March 23, 1848.—Our town is increasing fast; it is three times larger than when I arrived. Politics rage to an extent known in all American cities. Since good Judge Bryant left us we have been trying to get rid of his successor, and it is thought that he will soon resign. We have just heard a rumor of peace from Mazatlan, that Santa Ana is shot, and that we are to hold New Leon, New Mexico, Upper and Lower California, Tehuantepec, and Mazatlan. Hope we shall soon have this confirmed. Owing to the failure of the Government to pay its just debts, the withdrawal of the squadron to Mazatlan, where its money is at present spent, the economy of the military government of California, the large amount of cash received for duties and locked up by the United States Quartermasters, the failure of the rancheros to pay what they owe us in consequence of the Government having taken their horses and cattle for military uses without remuneration, and the recent custom of our merchants in paying cash instead of hides and tallow for goods, business is seriously effected. From all accounts we are to have a large immigration from the States this year, and from Oregon, where the Indians have begun a war of extermination. But the great inducement to immigration hereafter will be the news soon to reach the United States of the discovery of the richest gold placers ever known. Although in former years it has been found by the Indians in small quantities and brought to the notice of the priests, they had discouraged them from meddling with it, foreseeing how much it would interfere with their plans for proselyting, and for a long and peaceful occupation of the country, and no one in those days supposed it so abundant as to render its search very remunerative. Unthought and unexpected, it may be said to have discovered itself; in consequence, however (and let us not forget it), of the enterprise of Captain John A. Sutter, who feeling the necessity of a good supply of timber for himself and for the immigrants arriving and settling about him, determined to build a saw-mill on a branch of the American River, where woods were plenty. The mill was constructed and running the early part of this year. Last month a man named Marshall, who had charge of it, while looking into the race one morning (2d of February), observed something sparkle, and scooped it out. On examining the little scales he thought they might be gold, and without saying anything about the matter to his workmen, told them he was going to the Fort. You may be sure the forty-mile ride was a hurried one, and that the eyes of the Captain and himself were never larger than when they secretly tested and proved that the particles before them were of the pure stuff. Just before dinner one day, as I sat writing at my desk, our neighbor Davis came into the store with two strangers. He held in his hand a small buckskin bag, and asked me if I could tell virgin gold when I saw it. I answered that I did not think I could, but would see; whereupon he poured from the bag some delicate little yellow scales, much lighter in color, however, than what we call guinea gold. Davis said that the men wanted to buy goods for half cash and half gold dust at the rate of $14 per ounce, and that if it was gold there would be a large profit on it at that price; but how were we to test it? "That is easily done by going to Buckalew's" (a jeweler who has opened a shop at Clark's Point), said I. So away we started, all four, and to the wonderment of Buckalew laid the treasure before him. A touch of his nitric acid (I think it was) soon settled the matter to our satisfaction, and home we went to trade. Day after day others came down the river to see if they really could buy anything they wanted with the dust so easily scraped together. As the stores were soon gleaned of what was most desirable, other articles long resting forgotten on the shelves were taken; in fact, anything that came to hand, as gold seemed too plenty to be worth much in the long run. Silver is hoarded, and has become so scarce that it is difficult to get enough to pay our launch hands, and bakers, and washerwomen. They "don't want gold dust any way." Larkin was here on his way to Sacramento the other day. He thought the discovery would ruin San Francisco as a place of business, that Benicia would become of more importance, and that some place at the headwaters of the Sacramento, and near the mines, would become the future great city.

San Francisco appears not to be the only city in America afflicted with the epidemic of dirty, idle, talking, foreign loafers disguised as workmen. Don Platt says of one of these oratorical tramps now doing the business of curb-stone statesmanship at the national capital: "There is something beautiful in hearkening to the voice of an idle, ignorant, unwashed, unknown, foreign vagrant—a raw-mouthed horse-radish incapable of pronouncing a single word correctly in English; a fellow who has but a dim idea of what the little he says really means—assailing our real workmen, native-born or naturalized citizens, men who put in their solid day's labor each day, and are respected citizens; assailing such men because of their repudiation of his absurd, intricate, ridiculous ideas; ideas in the mind, and rendered impossible of expression, reason of his freshness in our country."

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

Do you still think sometimes of the dear old Roman days, Em, when we lived in the clear, pure atmosphere of art, and the weeks were one long, delicious dream of beauty? I have been back to them, in fancy, the last two hours, and still—

"With dreamful eyes
My spirit lies
Under the walls of Paradise."

"What," I hear you exclaim, "has she found in prosaic San Francisco, duller now than its wont even, to bring back the glamour of that precious past?" Only a portfolio and an easel or two, in a small, sparsely-furnished room on the second floor of a Kearny Street building, a few steps beyond Pine, ma chère, I think it is. In those portfolios are a series of etchings and rare old line engravings that, from their splendid execution and the fact that they are none of them duplicated in this collection, and hardly elsewhere, are almost priceless treasures to an art lover. I must be brief in the telling, for I have a deal to talk about to-day. First, the etchings, which you know are growing more popular every year. There are the works of many of the great masters; chief among them, "Attelage de Bœufs," "L'Hiver," and "Le Rouleau," of Charles Jacque, the prince of etchers, and great in poultry painting as well; some capital street scenes in Paris, infantile heads, and three excellent figures in a group, by De Lorme, marked "Elle Dort." When it comes to a choice between paintings and engravings, I always declare for the latter. I believe, with the late Charles Sumner—an excellent art critic, by the way—that "the engraving is not a copy or an imitation of the original representation, but a translation into another language, where light and shade supply the place of color." The engraving of Turner's "Italy," an open letter-proof, is exquisite, but you are so thorough a Frenchman at heart that I know you would prefer the copy of Gerard's "Napoleon," in his coronation robes. I have little admiration for the conqueror of Europe as a man, but his face, as a study of severe and classic beauty, has, I think, never been surpassed, even in the studios of Greece. The "Cupid Sleeping," engraved by Gondoli from his own design, the "Noli me Tangere," by Baruccio, and engraved by Raphael Morgen, one of the greatest of artists in his peculiar line, are very fine; but the best of all are the "Sistine Madonna" of Raphael, and "The Incononato" of Correggio, the latter copied from the famous frescoes in the church of San Giovanni, in Parma, by Toschi, who devoted his whole life to perpetuating in this way the works of that artist. The "Sistine" was done by Frederick Muller. His was a pitiful story. He spent six years in perfecting his plate, and when told that his work was too fine to bear the necessary number of impressions, sank into melancholy, and soon after died, a hopeless lunatic, on the very day that the first proofs of his work were printed in Paris. It was but small recompense for a broken heart that a copy was placed over his bier, as "The Transfiguration" had been hung above Raphael's senseless clay so many years before. The very first impression, now valued at over $10,000, is at present in the British Museum. This one which Mr. Vickery has, is one of a very few first proofs, as is also that of "The Incononato," and both are correspondingly precious, the price of the former being $100, and that of the latter $200; but then—there is but one of each! You know, of course, that after the first half-dozen impressions a plate becomes comparatively worthless, and each plate has been the work of many months, sometimes as many years, perhaps, as poor Muller served to complete his ideal. Genuine first proofs frequently have one little mark that the uninitiated would readily mistake for a blemish—that is, fine strokes, like the accidental touches of a pencil, all along the edges. The fact that these, so very fine as they are, should be reproduced shows that the plate could have been but slightly used, as after the first two or three they entirely disappear. I hope you will never be misled into trying to rub them out with a bit of stale bread, as a certain Mrs. Shoddy once did with a priceless engraving. There is an exquisite copy of "The Madonna of the Goldfinch," a great favorite of the late Pope Pius IX., and the original of which he was the owner. There are not more than ten copies extant, for the Holy Father was exceedingly choice of it and gave them away but rarely, and then only to some pet cardinal he wished to favor. This is one of that number. The portrait of Raphael—how can one describe it, with its seraphic look, that had far more of heaven than of earth in its serene gravity? But the finest portrait ever executed by an engraver is that of Philip of Champagne, done by Edelinck. "The Madonna della Scala" is sold, and you will not therefore see it, I grieve to say. I have not told you of half as many as I have mentioned. Only one more; among the works of Gerard Dow was his inimitable "Managère Hollandaise," but you need not "set your mouth" to possess that, as I know you would—it is the style you so much admire, a single peasant figure—for your Lilius has taken that to herself, and there is no duplicate to be had—here, at all events. While on things artistic I must not neglect to mention Houseworth's invention, or rather adaptation of the camera to a new phase of photography. He calls the pictures so made "solar photographs," a not very happy name, perhaps. They look much like the photographic copies of crayons, are soft yet distinct, and, I think, will become popular. Those I saw were life-size heads. I went into Abramson & Bacon's the other day to inquire for the Lait Antephelelique. Last bottle just sold—saw the lucky woman moving out of the door as I entered. Knew then what the look of triumph on her face meant. She must have been clairvoyante and "sensed" my errand before I stated it. I was comforted by the assurance that there would be an abundance in the new stock, which was to arrive this week. What a nice store they have to be sure. It's so handy as I go down Sutter Street, and their stock comprises about everything a well regulated person would be likely to need. You didn't know that they had turned reformers, did you? And in the true sense, as their reform began some time ago, and prices are greatly reduced on everything, from Lubin for cosmetics, pomades, and the like, and Gayley, Atkinson, and a London firm, Messrs & Lubin, to the latest fashions, seem to be the favorite makers. Mr. Abramson recommends the "Vaseline pomade" highly, too, and I must say, if it isn't French, I like it better than anything of the kind for the hair, except the "Huile Philocome." Their toilet brushes are made expressly for them, in England, I think, and all bear their name. The "Lilien Puder," in dry preparations for the face, and several different liquid powders are in their list. A specialty is a most delicious article for the teeth, "Dentine," and something pretty for the toilet I have not seen elsewhere was a full set of combs and brushes in celluloid. The firm, you recollect, have a fine store on Clay Street, near Kearny. I was shocked to read lately, in a New York paper, how arsenic eating is increasing among New York women. One would think that the awful consequences that sooner or later are sure to follow the practice would be enough to deter every one from it, to say nothing of the frightful possibility of, at any moment, dying in all the tortures of poisoning. It's bad enough to have your horses fattened with it by unprincipled grooms, but when it comes to taking it yourself—pah! Pure and pleasant powders if we must "beautify," but no poisons. You will be interested in the new and handsome store of Kennedy & Durr, on Market Street, on the block below the Baldwin. It is to be known as the "Pavilion," but the many old friends who have followed them from their former stand on Third Street, seem to like best to speak of the courteous proprietors by name always. I haven't been in so bright and cheerful a place for a long time, and every one partakes of the same spirit, and blonde, brunette, and demi-blonde and demi-brunette clerks all vie with each other in courtesy. Walk with me down one side of the spacious room: there is every variety of light woolen fabrics, for dress goods, greys, browns, and all the different dead-leaf tints. A little further on, we meet with the heavier goods, and among them one especially pretty and new, an ashes of roses worsted and silk goods (the design a silk half square in raised lines) very pretty for cloakings; any number of those soft, clinging camels'-hair fabrics, bourettes, the new Schoodas cloths, the Barraboo, and so on. Still further on is the striped black goods department, where are, besides all the different mourning goods proper, new designs in the basket cloths, and Bonnet's, Ponson's, and Jaubert's fine black silks. I suggested to Mr. Kennedy that he ought to make a specialty of sunshine, for he has about the finest light for showing black goods in the city. Across the extreme end of the store extends the silk counter, with light and dark judiciously and tastefully arranged; the shawl department, which is another specialty, and window-curtain goods. Among the shawls are some beautiful camels'-hair. I think Mr. Kennedy must keep a private camel or two out in the back yard. I was greatly taken with some Mission blankets, the softest, fleeciest things you ever saw. They were part of the lot that was sent to the Paris Exposition. From this point up the other side are the choicest of linens, flannels, Persian and Turkish table-coverings, and utilities for the household generally. Through the centre of the store you will find ladies', gentlemen's, and children's underwear in every grade, hoisery of the finest qualities, and, just received, a new lot of children's worsted stockings—something I have looked for vainly during the last two months. A pretty new neck-ruching—a positive godsend in these days of "nothing new" in these goods—is named after the store, "the Pavilion ruching." It is of crêpe lisse, with a double ruche for the band, and a broad plaiting of the same to lie on the shoulders. It is their own idea. Their special make of gloves is Jouvin's, but they sell a great many of "The Golden Eagle," a new brand. A handy little affair is a bottle of powder to keep the hands from perspiring and spoiling light kids. Now (if you are not tired) let us talk of the pretty things at Davis' Golden Rule Bazar, on both Market and Kearny Streets. I had no idea of the extent of this establishment until I went through it the other day. It is five stories high—the one on Market Street, I mean, that runs through to Geary—and in the basement there is the frame and bracket factory, the machinery for which is run by a ten-horse power engine; that, also, drives the elevator. A curious little machine called the "rustic dido and cutter" does the work at one cutting that formerly required eight. It has twenty-eight busy knives, and you can imagine how it works. There is nothing in the way of fancy cabinet work, cornices, and toy furniture that they do not make to order here. I am as fond of timepieces of all kinds as poor Matilda Heron used to be. I remember a visit I made her just after her separation from Robert Stoepele. It was at her house in Thirty-fifth Street, New York, and in every room there was at least one, if not more, exquisite clocks, which she wound up herself regularly every morning before breakfast, and which kept the air full of a soft, melodious ticking night and day. I thought of her and her pets, in at the Bazar, where there are one hundred and twenty-five or thirty different clocks, all made by the Ansonia Clock Company, whose agents the Messrs. Davis are. An exceedingly pretty one is called the "Souvenir," swings on a pivot, is finished in fancy silver work, and has a plate-glass mirror at the back. Another, "The Boudoir," has an adjustable mirror above it. But the "cutest" little thing is the "Nightingale," the smallest marine clock ever made in this country. Its running time is forty-eight hours, and a bronze bird stands at one side of the stand as an ornament. Then there are music boxes, trunks, fans, optical goods, Lemaire's and Chevalier's opera glasses, bronzes, stationery, toilet articles of every description; in short, everything, including every kind of toy ever invented. Among the latter will be one quite new, Mr. Edison's wonderful telephonic toy—an old colored "auntie," who talks, laughs, and sings in the real southern fashion. Mr. Davis will make arrangements with the inventor, who is now at the Palace, to have a number of them ready for the Christmas holidays. A propos of Santa Claus doings, Mrs. Parker, for eight years past at the Ladies Depository—which has lately suspended—makes doll dressing a specialty. She dressed that lovely doll for Mrs. Fair that made such a sensation among the little folks a year or so ago. Mrs. Parker has gone into business for herself on Post Street, near Kearny, and does every kind of plain and fancy needlework, wedding and infants' trousseaus, at short notice. Poor, forlorn bachelors and grass-widowers, left to the tender mercies of the laundryman, will bless Mrs. Parker more than once, for, in addition to making shirts and other underwear, she guarantees to keep them to their full complement of buttons, straps, and strings; in other words, makes and mends them with care and dispatch. I am not quite sure that this is not putting too heavy a premium on bachelorhood though, for I am one of those who believe in taxing this class heavily. Why, forsooth, should they not pay for their freedom as they do for their tobacco and other luxuries? You say that John complains that I never talk about the male fashions. That's not because I am unmindful of them by any means, but I always thought that the "superior sex" were above such frivolities as were supposed to occupy the whole time and attention of us weaker vessels; hence, my silence on the subject might be taken as an implied compliment. So glad to find they have some of the weaknesses of humanity after all. Here are some little items for his private ear: Canes are even more used than ever—Madagascar vine, with a root handle, Russian briar, English holly, and the pimento being the greatest favorites; the French thistle and the African jungle cane, an African orange, and a kind of bamboo with a "dog's ear" handle are also popular. The helmet-shaped pith hat, so much worn at the East and in the Canadas, is the best head-covering made for seaside or mountain wear, and even for the city during the heated hours of the day. It has a wide peak in front, and a broad, drooping rim behind to shade the neck, and the crown is lined with the pithy inside of an East India tree, which is said to be better than cork even. They are made in the East Indies and finished and trimmed in London, and are intended for either ladies or gentlemen. I am glad to see that the awkward "plug" hat is going out of favor, and the graceful and artistic drooping felts are being more and more worn every year. It is a standing puzzle to your correspondent why men will persist in wearing the former, which are neither warm in winter, cool in summer, nor graceful at any time. The next time I write I shall have something of greater interest for—man. As ever,

LILIAS DUBOIS.

PLASTER OF PARIS.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PARIS, July 16, 1878.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—The Exposition has turned out as might have been expected: relatively a failure. It is now known that the whole idea was a speculation on the part of the Government in aid of the property known as the "Champ de Mars." Three years ago it was resolved to dispose of this property, and arrangements of sale were completed with certain railroads who wanted it for stations, depots, etc. The price was a good one, but a brilliant idea occurred to the Minister of Finance to turn the affair into an additional profit. It would, of course, be necessary for the railroads to build station-houses and to improve the property generally before they could use it. Why not let the Government make these improvements and use them for a season as Exposition buildings before turning them over, and in this way pay for their loss? The idea was seized upon, and the result is, the whole world is invited to come to Paris and spend its money. When it is all over, when the hotels and cochers have filled their pockets, and the deluded strangers have fully paid for these said stations of iron and glass, they will be turned over to the true owners for the purpose they were originally intended. Vive la Humbug! The whole affair as an exhibition is immeasurably behind the one at Philadelphia, and also that of Paris in 1867. But if the Exhibition is of lower grade than the American one of 1876, do not imagine that the hotel-keepers have not learned a lesson from our side of the Atlantic. They let no rooms separate from board. While in America the general tendency is to manage the hotels on the European plan, here all are transformed into genuine American hotels, at least so far as prices are concerned—that is, they get all they can just as if they never expected or cared to see the guest again. If an American complains of paying five dollars a day for a bed in a closet and one poor meal a day, the landlord shrugs his shoulders and says: "Ah! but you know how it was in Philadelphie-e." And that is supposed to finish the dispute. Paris, just now, is filled with distinguished strangers. Joseph A. Donahoe, the Shah of Persia, Mark Livingston, and Edgar Mills have been occupying the Grand Hotel all the spring, but left some time back, some for their respective homes and others to travel. Mark Livingston's rooms were adjoining those of the Shah, and they struck up an acquaintance, not, as it turned out in the end, much to the satisfaction of the Persian monarch. It appears that Nasr-Eddin has a fondness for sport, and Livingston is not backward in such matters. Somehow the game of "poker" was introduced, and the Shah dropped so many hundred thousand francs in two or three sittings that he was obliged to telegraph to Teheran for "more mud." Edgar Mills, also, took a turn with his Highness, but while his winnings were considerable, rumor says that they were so moderate as not to disturb the good feeling which should exist between gentlemen.

It is whispered in the American quarter that a young gentleman of San Francisco, but for the last twelve months visiting the Old World, is about to marry a lady of noble birth, whose acquaintance he made last winter at Nice. The gentleman is exceedingly popular in San Francisco society, and deservedly so. A lawyer by profession, liberally educated, handsome, engaging and courteous, it is not strange that he has gained the affection of the young lady referred to, who, by the way, is said to be as beautiful as she is wealthy and gifted. I am not authorized to announce the intended marriage, but it is an open secret that the name of the gentleman is George F. Baker, and that the lady is the Countess Thecla Von Pullovitz-Snitzel, sister to the Count Imhoff Von Pullovitz-Snitzel, so long secretary to the Russian Embassy at Vienna. The wedding will take place in October, and the parties sail for America in November for a wedding tour. Captain Talbot, of the firm of Pope & Talbot was here a few days ago on his way to Carlsbad. His son and one daughter, Miss Emily, accompany him. Washington Bartlett is here now, but I believe goes to Switzerland and Germany in a few days.

If there is one person who is more false and hollow than she who says, "You must come and see me again," it is she who replies, "Thank you, I will be pleased to."

And yet they have hardly as much labor-saving machinery as a screw-driver in Northern China, where thousands of people are starving to death every day.

AN EPISODE OF THE EXPOSITION.

It is said the days of miracles are past, and it is not difficult to laugh at the "grown-up child" who still believes in them; but they who laugh may please explain, if they can, what happened to me a few days ago.

It seemed to me about seven o'clock in the morning, and I was still in my bed half asleep, when the door suddenly opened and there appeared on the threshold, with a manner gloomy and mysterious, a stranger of dark and forbidding mien.

"There," he said, "this is from my master," holding out at the same time a small letter directly before me.

"Place it on the table," I exclaimed, petulantly, "and the next time you honor me with your unwelcome visit, come less noisily."

"And I," he replied sarcastically, "ask for a receipt."

"Receipt! Wherefore?"

"The letter contains two million francs."

"From whom?"

"From him."

"From him—who?"

"From my master."

I started up in my bed. "Who is your master," I asked, out of breath.

"Fortune—a happy accident—God—a devil—call it as you like."

I got angry, and pointed the stranger to the door, but he did not move. Exasperated, I tore up the letter and threw the fragments in his face, impulsively ejaculating, "d—n your millions!"

The stranger at once grew civil, and cried bravo, over and over again.

"As for that," he said, "we have considered it. He that despises money thereby doubles its value. There is another letter; it contains four millions. It does not need a receipt. Good morning!" and off he went like a vapor sucked away by the sun.

I would have thought the whole a dream but for the letter. It did contain a check; it was for four millions, and on the Bank of France.

"Well," I thought, "this is a joke of some friend."

I got out of bed, dressed, and went into the streets, toward the Bourse, where I had some business to transact. On my way I passed the bank, and entered in order to get a note of a hundred francs changed, as I needed some small coin. At that moment a clerk from Rothschild's was paid a million—quite a heap of those well-known blue notes, as high and as big as the latest critical edition of Shakespeare. With the same obliging manner, with which he paid the million to Rothschild's clerk, the teller changed my one hundred-franc note into small coin. The man looked so kind and good-natured, that I bethought myself of the already half-forgotten check of four millions, and took the liberty to show it to him, hoping he would not get too angry at such an unseasonable joke.

"Tres bien," said he, "shall I send the money to your carriage?"

"For God's sake"—I cried, feeling quite dizzy.

"It is true, it is very large," he said, smiling; "but you may take it by and by."

"Yes, by—and—by."

I stammered painfully, and took mechanically the check-book he offered me. To his question if I wanted some part of the funds now, I answered that I was not in need of money just then, and staggered confusedly down the stairs into the street. A friend whom I met asked sympathetically what was the matter with me.

"Oh, my God! my dear fellow," I said, "I have four million francs—don't you want some?"

He was so kind as to accept one hundred thousand francs. I gave him a check, always under the impression that the whole affair was a dream; but when he returned within ten minutes from the bank to the café, where I waited for him—when he showed me discreetly how, in the depth of the pocket of his coat he had concealed a large packet of bank-notes of all denominations—there was no more doubt. It was certain that I was fortunate enough to have become, all at once, a millionaire. I asked my friend to leave me. I wanted to be left alone, in order to bring my dizzy head to its normal condition, and to think about the proper vocation of a rich man. Before leaving, my friend asked for my address.

"You know it, you know it," I said; "it is always the same."

But while walking slowly along the boulevards it became more and more clear to me that my modest garret-room was not a fit habitation for a Cressus. I did not mean to buy a large palace, for, although a millionaire all at once, I had not become a shoddy.

I remembered then to have seen, only a few days before, a charming little palazzo, two stories, court, garden, stables, "to be sold, inquire Quai d'Orsay, No. 15."

A hack brought me there in ten minutes. Everything pleased me. The high, cool rooms, the old trees, the garden, the marble stables, and the central location. I bought it at once, for the ridiculously low figure of five hundred thousand francs. I gave the porter the hundred francs in small coin that I had changed at the Bank of France, and went on toward the Exposition.

"Of course," I thought, "I could not live here in summer, it is quite too hot; and, besides, it is not fashionable. But, then, I will buy, in Versailles, or St. Cloud, or St. Denis, or somewhere in the neighborhood of Paris, a nice château, with a large park, well stocked with deer, and complete in all its appointments, that will not cost more than three or four hundred thousand francs; but for the present no hurry. Nothing is more common than to wish to buy everything at once because you have the good fortune to suddenly come into the possession of money. A gentleman can wait; besides, I have first to provide the furniture, etc., for my charming little palazzo at Quai d'Orsay."

I had regained my presence of mind. People should not say I had become dazed on account of four millions. And then, it happens so very seldom that feuilletonists are millionaires, or that millionaires write feuilletons—so very seldom indeed—that for nothing in the world would I have deprived humanity of such a miraculous demonstration of a possibility.

Smiling and nodding, I went over the Champ de Mars, looked at all the exquisite things there exposed, and chiefly the flowers seemed to me more radiant and fresh than ever before.

"What is the price of this forest of rhododendron?" I asked one of the florists.

"Five thousand francs, sir."

"Only five thousand francs," I intended to say, quite horrified at the low price, but I bethought myself better, and said calmly and in a most gentleman-like and indifferent way, "Send this forest of rhododendron to my house, or rather" (thinking of my present narrow lodgings, "put it aside for me. Here is a check for five thousand francs on the Bank of France."

You should have seen the bows the florist made me.

It may have been an illusion, but it seemed to me that all the shop-keepers took off their hats most profoundly as I passed by their stalls.

I went to the French part of the Exposition. There you see, under a canopy of purple and violet silk velvet, interwoven with golden threads, behind panes of the heaviest plate glass, zealously guarded by officers, the crown diamonds of France—poor orphans now—a sea of indescribable splendor, in which there are seen floating here and there colored gems—turquoises, sapphires, and rubies of untold value. In the evening, when the Exposition closes, this dazzling splendor sinks, like some theatrical trap-door arrangement, into the earth, and the officers, double in numbers, sit down on the ingeniously-constructed tomb of these wonderful treasures in order that no thief, robber, or pretender to the throne may lay hand on them. But here I did not choose to ask for the price. The "regent" alone, which the first Napoleon wore, is valued at over ten millions. Such things can not be bought; they can be stolen only.

On I went to that exquisite porcelain that comes from the national factories at Sèvres. Every piece is a real work of art worthy to be immortalized by poets.

"Please reserve these two vases for me," I said to the shop-keeper, and drew my check for twenty thousand francs. They were exquisite. The narrow necks rested on rosy white bodies, and the delicately pictured amourettes on them were a perfect carnival of cupids. A crowd of little fellows with wings, and dressed as in Paradise, commit all sorts of funny freaks, play theatre, call the audience together with trumpets twice as large as themselves, and then tease the spectators in every possible way.

Then they hide themselves under the beds of pretty black-eyed girls to attend and watch their toilets. Of course they are punished for that; and the little Amazons apply brooms to their rosy-colored backs until they fly screaming out of the windows.

I bought some more Sèvres vases and gave some more checks.

Report of the arrival of a serious buyer must have spread very fast and far, for from every part of the exposition buildings the shopkeepers came and surrounded me, so that I could hardly move or speak, and was afraid of being pressed to death.

I thought of the thirty and odd rooms in my charming little palazzo in the Quai d'Orsay, and I bought for each room complete furniture and appurtenances.

For my bed-room I bought a splendid set of old, polished oak, inlaid with ivory, and carved in the most artistic manner; beds, sofas, chairs, etc., all covered with blue and gold, and a magnificent Oriental carpet representing "Leda and the Swan," with Persian rugs to match—"Eighty thousand francs," he said, when I asked the price, and I did not think it too much. Of course I had to furnish the other rooms and apartments with corresponding style, and, strange to say, for each set the salesman asked ten thousand francs more than for the last preceding.

From there I went to the American part of the Exposition, and bought some watches, clocks, carriages, jewelry, rare birds, Steinway pianos—in short, everything which I thought would be in keeping with my palazzo Quai d'Orsay. In the midst of my triumphal march through the Exposition grounds I met my friend of the morning.

"Very glad to meet you," he said. "I want another hundred thousand francs. The illness of my mother-in-law's aunt puts me to quite an extraordinary expense."

"With all my heart," I replied, "provided so much is left to me."

I made up my accounts in all haste, and found for a wonder that I had spent, up to one centime, just four millions and one hundred francs. After running the whole day and buying so much, I felt very hungry; but I had not a cent in my pocket.

"I should like some lunch," I said to my friend; "will you oblige me with ten francs?"

"Of course," he said; gave me the money, and left me with a deep bow.

At Paris, debtors are nearly as polite as florists, shop-keepers, and bank employes.

Awakened by a rude push at my shoulders, I started up from the chair in which I sat, and the fellow of the dark and forbidding mien stood before me. He was the waiter at the restaurant where I had dined.

"Am sorry to wake you up, sir," he said. "Of course you get tired, walking so much around the Exposition grounds—and then—you fall asleep after dinner—you don't know how—you wish to pay?"

I had forgotten my purse and money. The bill was exactly ten francs. Fortunately, I found a half-forgotten ten-franc piece in the corner of one of my vest pockets.

LOTUS.

"See here, mister, me and my wife have just been spliced, and I am going to show Amanda the town if it takes a mule a day. Now give us one of them rooms like the Temple of Solomon, you know." The clerk called a hall boy and said: "Show this gentleman to the bridal chamber." At this the tall rustic became instantly excited: "Not by a long shot! Ye shiny-haired, bifed-shirted, dollar-breast-pinned, grinning monkey, you can't play that on me! If I am from the country, ye don't catch me and my wife lodging in your doggoned old harness room!"

A kiss from my mother made me a painter. Benjamin West. Well, he liked paint better than we do.

XLIII.—The Home Fever.—A Reminiscence of the West Indies.

We sat alone, in a trellised bower,
And gazed o'er the darkening deep,
And the holy calm of that twilight hour
Came over our hearts like sleep;
And we dreamed of the banks and the bonny braes
That have gladdened our hearts in childhood's days.

We sat in that cool verandah's shade,
Where the fragrant ti-ti twined
Its fairy net work around us, and made
A harp for the cool sea wind
That came there with its low, soft tones at night,
Like a sigh that is telling of past delight.

And that wind with its tale of flowers had come
From the island groves that grow by the sea,
And the waves, like wanderers returning home,
To the beach came wearily;
For the conch's far home-call, the parrot's cry,
Had told that the sabbath of night was nigh.

And he, the friend at my side that sate,
Was a boy whose path had gone
Thro' the flowers and fields of joy that Fate,
Like a mother, had smiled upon;
But, alas! for the time when our hopes take wings,
And memory to grief like a siren sings.

His home has been on the stormy shore
Of Albyn's mountain land;
His lay was tuned to the breaker's roar,
And he loved the bleak sea sand;
The tempest's din, and the howling breeze,
Were all his soul's wild sympathies.

They had told him tales of sunny lands
That rose o'er Indian seas,
Where gold shone sparkling from river sands,
And strange fruits bent the trees;
They had wiled him away from his father's hearth,
With its light of peace and its voice of mirth.

And, now that gold and gems were near,
He strayed 'neath the tropic sun;
But the voice of promise that thrilled his ear
At that joyous moment was gone,
And the hopes he had chased, mid the wiles of night,
Had melted away, like a fire-fly's light.

Oh! I have watched him gazing long
Where the home-bound vessels lay,
Cheating sad thoughts with some old song,
Or wiping his tears away.
Oh, well I knew that that weary breast,
Like the dove of the deluge, pined for rest.

For there was "a worm in the bud," whose fold
Defied the skillful healer's art;
And consumption's hectic plague-spot told
The tale of a broken heart.
The boy knew he was dying; but the sleep
Of death is bliss to those that watch and weep.

He died; but memory's wizard power,
With its ghostly train, had come
To the sad heart's ruins at that last hour,
And he murmured: "Home, home, home."
And his spirit passed, in that happy dream,
Like a bird in the track of a bright sunbeam.

Oh! talk of spring to the trampled flower,
Of light, to the fallen star;
Of glory, to those who, in danger's hour,
Lie cold in the field of war;
But ye mock the exile's heart when ye tell
Of aught save the home where it pines to dwell.

* A kind of vine common in the West Indies.

† The sound made by blowing into the conch shell was the usual summons to the negroes to leave their work.

XLIV.—Ebb-Tide.

With her white face full of agony,
Under her dripping locks,
I hear the wretched, restless sea,
Complaining to the rocks.

Helplessly in her great despair,
She shudders on the sand,
The bright weeds dropping from her hair,
And the pale shells from her hand.

'Tis pitiful thus to see her lie,
With her heaving, heaving breast,
Here, where she fell, when cast aside,
Sobbing herself to rest.

Alas, alas! for the foolish sea,
Why was there none to say:
"The wave that strikes on the heartless stone
Must break and fall away."

Why could she not have known that this
Would be her fate at length—
For the hand upheld must slip at last,
Though it clings with love's own strength.

PHOEBE CARV

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, August 18, 1878.

Muskmelon.
Mock Turtle Soup.
Fried Sea Bass, Sauce Tartare.
Succotash. Baked Egg Plant.
Boiled Ham, Horse Radish.
Roast Veal. Baked Potatoes.
Peach Pie, with Cream.

Fruit-bowl of Plums, Gages, Peaches, Apricots, and Apples.
TO MAKE MOCK TURTLE SOUP.—Take some rich stock, and put into it two onions, six tomatoes, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one desert-spoonful of ground cloves, one of allspice, and some cayenne pepper. Cut four hard-boiled eggs fine, put in the tureen, and pour half a small cup of sherry wine over them. When the soup has boiled sufficiently, strain it into the tureen and serve.

TO MAKE TARTARE SAUCE.—To one gill of mayonnaise sauce mix in one tablespoonful of capers, one small shallot (or one-eighth of a small onion), one ounce of cucumber pickles, and half a tablespoonful of parsley, all chopped very fine. This sauce will keep a long time, and is nice for cold meats or salad dressing.

A scythe is a hay-cutter in that it believes all flesh to be grass, and while the latter grasps man by his fingers the former embraces his legs. Like the mighty reverberation of a clap of thunder to a half-pint of milk a scythe is very unexpected.

At a recent sheriff's sale at Lebanon, Pa., one dollar apiece. At this rate, for a few dollars have laid in enough coffins to last him a life.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 17, 1878.

For the first time in the history of the workingmen's movement in San Francisco we are disposed to accord to its action our approval. The petition of their delegates to the State Constitutional Convention, addressed to the President of the United States, is a dignified, well written, and courteous presentation of the Chinese question. Such a protest, coming from such a source, under present conditions, will not be without its influence. The question of Chinese immigration is, in our judgment, the most important one that our national councils have to consider. To us, it is the question of paramount interest, transcending in importance all others, pressing upon our statesmen and thinkers with all the force that belongs to the consideration of national safety. Our Eastern fellow-citizens do not appreciate it as we do, only because it does not, with its gaunt and horrid skeleton form, stand at their hearthstones and firesides. Could they find in Congressional aid some protection from their hard times, their bankruptcies, their shrinkage of property values, their labor strikes, their evils resulting from intemperance, their sunstrokes, their fearful, desolating tornadoes, their deaths by lightning, their pauperism, crime, and bites of mad dogs, there would be but one sentiment, one public opinion, one party upon the enforcement of the proposed remedy. The Chinese are the cause of our hard times, our labor difficulties, our bankruptcies, our shrinkage of values, our pauperism, our crime; they are our sunstrokes, our tornadoes, our mad dogs, our lightnings. If there had been no Chinese upon this coast we should not be as rich as now; but riches would be more equally distributed, and California would have been the exceptional spot upon God's footstool where there had been no hard times, and where poverty and destitution are forever impossible. We should not be as comfortable under the insolence of foreign servants as with Chinese in our kitchens, but more of our girls would cook, and wash, and bake, and mend, and do housework, and fewer would be able to play the "Battle of Prague" upon a discordant, rattlety-bang, cheap old piano. Our views are, we believe, fixed upon the necessity of restraining, by lawful means, Chinese immigration. We have given to the consideration of this question, now for many years, our most earnest thought. We have endeavored to discard from our minds all prejudice. We repudiate the sectarian and sanctimonious nonsense that prates of "the Fatherhood of God" and "the Brotherhood of Man," as the cant of sham piety. We consider this question from the narrow, selfish standpoint of self-interest to the race and family in which we are born, and to which we are allied by all the ties that bind us to life. We are on the raft at sea, with only enough for ourselves, and we would push the Chinese off to drown. We care not for history. Whether Genghis Khan and his nephew, Batu, were bloody-minded barbarians, who piled up their monuments of skulls to mark the murderous track of their devastating armies, or holy pilgrims and preachers of the one true God, we care not. This was in the thirteenth century, and we are now living in the nineteenth. To us this is a practical question—a question of to-day, a question of self-preservation. Because these fierce and bloody Tartars generously spared our ancestors six hundred years ago is no reason why their descendants should eat us up now. But we began writing not to discuss the Chinese question, but to say a pleasant word of Clitus Barbour and his associates, for their first sensible act since they were hatched from the sand-lot. Opposed to Chinese immigration as we have always been, and are, and always will be, we are, and have been, and always will be, more opposed to the cowardly and brutal insolence of a body of ignorant and audacious foreign miscreants who, being themselves of alien birth, dare to organize and menace the quiet of our homes, the security of our property, the safety of our lives, because we will not violate a national treaty and be guilty of inhuman and barbarous acts to a peaceful, industrious, and quiet people whom we have invited to our shores, and with whose government we have entered into reciprocal obligations. So long as this conflict is between alien Europeans and alien Chinese; so long as it is a quarrel in which the foreign element is wrong and the Chinese right; so long as common justice is with the Chinese, so long they will have our sympathy, our eloquence if we have any, and our pen if we can write. It is not against the Chinese we war, it is against the policy that invites them here; it is not the Chinese we would burn, it is the ships that bring them in violation of law, morals, and decency, as in the case of the steamer that, by bringing four hundred prostitutes, once provoked from the writer of this article a passionate and declamatory threat. With the workmen, upon this question, as upon all that affects their interests, we are in earnest sympathy. In all reforms; in all reasonable legislative aid to labor; in all honest movements for the elevation of the laboring class; in all cases where honest working men and women are seeking their rights, we are with Clitus Barbour and his associates, in feeling, heart, and sympathy. Anything in reason that will lighten the burdens and increase the rewards of labor we will heartily cooperate with, if led by moderate men and governed by moderate councils. But we do not favor murder, arson, and robbery. We do not favor a division of the accumulations of honest industry among the vicious and idle poor. We will not follow, nor will we stand at one side and applaud, ignorant and vicious demagogues who seek to stir criminals and unfortunates to deeds of violence and crime. We will not countenance nor uphold the miserable and cowardly wretches who think to intimidate American and foreign-born gentlemen by the cry of Heimp! or by the exposure of the hempen noose. Such treason as this we should aid to put down by the strong hand of the law. We will not countenance nor uphold a Legislature that panders to such insolence; nor a judge who prostitutes himself, his court, and his ermine for hope of future votes; nor the Democratic party that in a cowardly manner throws up its hands at the "stand and deliver" of these political miscreants; nor that last, worst, vilest, meanest, most mercenary and cowardly thing, the daily press of San Francisco, that for the hope of advertisements, circulation, and coin, either stands by in cowardly silence or in noisy bravado of financial desperation eggs on the mob to a violation of the law. To Clitus Barbour and his associates we say, you have our sympathy and the sympathy of many thousands of thinking men. We know and appreciate the wrongs of which you justly complain. We of the great middle class suffer with you, and we have as much to lose. Our families, homes, lives, and property, are dear to us; we love our country; we are for fair deal; anything that affects labor affects us. We are in sympathy with you, with your wrongs, with your search for remedy and reform; but we look for it along the path of law, under the constitution. So long as you are there we are with you; but when, in your ignorance, your passion, or your party zeal, you undertake yourselves to violate the law, and threaten to overwhelm us and society in a common wreck to alleviate your sufferings or relieve your inconveniences, we cry "Halt!" To the honest workmen we proclaim ourselves allies. To the vicious, idle, cowardly agitators we proclaim ourselves enemies. Thinking we observe that more temperate counsels are prevailing in this new organization, we hail it as the omen of better days and the promise of needed reforms. We shall not regret if out of this agitation there shall come to the statesmen of the nation an appreciation of the difficulties under which we now labor. We shall not regret this upheaval of the masses if it make the thinking men of the nation think in the direction of reform. We shall not regret the formation of a great national labor party if the principles of that party are wise and reformatory; its leaders prudent, legal, and law-abiding. We shall not regret any political change that is for the better, and it really seems as if none can be for the worse.

We have said, "there are two dangerous classes, the very rich and the vicious poor." The rich owe a duty to society which they alone can perform. Last winter our town was threatened by the moblots with violence; the same scenes will be reenacted this coming winter unless wise precautions are taken to prevent them. The first and paramount duty of organized government is to provide remunerative labor to the working poor. We declare, that when a poor woman or a poor man comes to the representative of organized society and says: "I am starving for bread, and have no other way to earn it than by labor—I can find no work to do," then society must provide that work and pay for it. Our city government has no such authority. Our city officials can not do this thing, because there is no law authorizing it. And yet this work must be provided this coming winter. If it is not, there will be disorder and violence. The wealthy men of our city must organize and do that as individuals which the city government can not do. Labor at one dollar a day must be furnished to every man who seeks it. Then when the tramp comes to our doors and says, "I am hungry and want work," we say, "go to work," and show him the place. If he will not work, then we know he is a fraud and a tramp; then we can treat him as a criminal; this is a test of his sincerity and his necessities. Thus we segregate the vicious from the good, the idle from the industrious. Having first done our duty to honest men we can deal with the dishonest in conscientious security. When the mob demands "labor for bread" we can not fire upon that mob if there is one honest man in it who is willing to work. First give employment to the willing workers, and then deal sternly with the criminal element that would rather steal than toil. We have a right to ask our rich men to act in this matter, for they alone have the ability to act. We have an abnormal condition of things in San Francisco. By a chapter of accidents, by the bounty of government and the bounty of God, by luck, genius, and financial skill, one hundred and ten men have accumulated an average of more than three millions of money each. Three hundred and fifty millions—an amount equal to the entire assessed value, real and personal, of San Francisco—is owned by one three-thousandth part of the population. This wealth has been gathered from the community; it is the earnings and the accumulation of all. Those who are richest have not worked the hardest; they are not above the average of the middle class in ability, industry, or economy. Circumstances have made them the favorites of fortune. The great middle class is poor, and all it can do is, by diligent toil and prudent economy, to hold its own. This being the condition of affairs in San Francisco, the middle class has a right to say to the great corporations and the millionaires: "It is your duty to see to it that we have no bread riots. The easy way to prevent an uprising is to provide labor for all who will work, and give them for eight hours of labor one dollar." This is a practical remedy for a great threatened evil. It is simple, just, and easy of accomplishment. Let us make figures in demonstration. December, January, February, and March are the hard months, one hundred working days to be provided for. Let us estimate the number of men who would ask this employment at 5,000—and this a large estimate. $5,000 a day, for one hundred days, is $500,000. It is the one-sixth of one per cent. on $300,000,000. The whole amount is half the cost of the Hopkins mansion. More money is annually squandered in the public schools. It is not half as much as is filched from property-owners through the street department. It is only a fraction of the amount spent in French wines and Havana cigars. This money is not given away, for every eight hours of honest labor is of the value of a dollar. It does not demoralize the poor, as does giving alms. It does not encourage tramps, as do free lunches and gift soup. It does not hurt the honest pride of the honest poor; and, better than all, it applies the test of labor to determine real poverty from grumbling discontent. By giving this one dollar per day we do not interfere with legitimate occupations; we do not permanently reduce the value of labor; on the contrary, by furnishing employment for a limited period we enable the laborer to tide over a temporary difficulty. If he is not necessitous, he declines the wages. It is a means of aiding the working poor without giving alms which is hurtful to both those who give and those who take. We have devised a plan for carrying such a scheme into practical operation, and in time shall suggest it to such gentlemen as shall have the inclination, the ability, and the leisure to charge themselves with the details of a philanthropic labor bureau.

A convention of German teachers in New York urges the teaching of German in the public schools. This is as appropriate as it would be for a convention of German sausage makers to recommend the eating of bolognas and black pudding to all American citizens. Leading journals of New York disapprove of teaching German in the free public schools. We quote: "We consider it wrong to make the teaching of any foreign language in the public schools obligatory, or to use the school funds for such a purpose. English is the language of this country. All our laws are written and administered in that language. No other language is necessary in any and all the affairs of life. No other language is necessary for the duties of citizenship. To teach any other as a part of public school education only tends to perpetuate race distinctions, which should be obliterated as soon as possible in this republic. We want only a purely American education in the public schools. The study of different languages is useful, undoubtedly to those who like the study and have the means and time to cultivate their minds in that way. This, however, is an accomplishment which those who wish their children to possess should pay for themselves. It is an accomplishment this American public should not be called upon to pay for. The movement to force the study of foreign living languages at our public schools comes from parents who were born abroad and who have their old native prejudices clinging to them. A good, solid, and practical American education, and one that will not foster distinctions of race or nationality, should only be sanctioned by government or those who have charge of our system of public instruction."

Mr. Tunstead, the Sheriff of Marin, is the only hero that the Kearney movement has yet developed.

AFTERMATH.

The discovery of new mines which may be worked to profitable advantage is a good thing. The development of ore bodies of great value in the Bodie district is a subject of congratulation if the result shall not excite our people to speculative investments in wild cat and other worthless mines. Mining is an honest and legitimate employment; gambling in stocks is as hazardous, criminal, and disastrous as gambling upon the green cloth. The result of all kinds of gaming is the same—a few get all the money. Where there is one prize there are a hundred blanks; where one gets rich ten commit suicide.

A new deal in mining stocks, and a lively one, now engages the attention of operators in this line of business. Whether the advance in values is attributable to discoveries, or whether it is the result of speculative manipulation, we have no means of determining. If the activity is due to legitimate causes, such as new-found ore bodies, it will be productive of good, and calculated to advance the general interest. If it is but a stock operation sprung upon the credulous to gather in the summer's earnings from manufacturer, mechanic, farmer, and laborer, it will belikely to prove a disaster to the material interests of our city and State. Stock gambling is becoming to the people of this coast a serious business. It is paralyzing all legitimate industries, and absorbing money, enterprise, and effort that ought to be turned in other directions. We shall be glad when this stock dealing shall be confined to a class. So long as the gambling mania continues—as now, extending to all classes of society, so long will there be a want of general prosperity.

The Prince of Wales has christened his new steam-launch Natika, after an American young lady, and other American young ladies are gone pea-green with envy. But who is Miss Natika?—the forward thing!

"We've escaped from England," writes a good young lady who has died and gone to Paris, "but we've not escaped from the English language, my dear. It pervades the atmosphere. Even the classic stage of the Théâtre Français is not free from the infection. You will hear such words as 'shoking' and 'luncher' in Les Fourchambaults, while Judic says 'I loaf you' at the Variétés." The young woman seems to have "escaped from the English language" pretty effectually, we should say, and the same thing can be done by hearing our local version of Les Fourchambaults at the Baldwin.

The Bulgarians are about to erect a statue to the late Mr. MacGahan, the correspondent of the London Daily News, who wrote up the famous "atrocities." Mr. MacGahan, by the way, was an American—born, we believe, in Ohio. The circumstance that he once expressed a wish to visit Yosemite Valley might, perhaps, justify us in claiming him as a Californian.

This did not, really, occur at Mr. Sharon's party last week. A fresh-looking young woman, evidently from the country, but pretty for all that, was "attracting the males." A noted beauty was asked what she thought of her. "Not bad—for an amateur."

The following incident occurred out of San Francisco, too, unfortunately. A local "swell" called at a well known boot and shoe store. "I bought a pair of shoe-laces here the other day," said he, loftily, "and they were not worth a d—! I shall buy no more in this shop." "Put up the shutters, John," said the proprietor, turning to one of his assistants, "it's no good going on with this business: this gentleman will never buy another pair of ten-cent shoe-laces here."

"You look weary," said a friend of ours as a friend of his entered a Kearny Street saloon; "take something?" "Thanks, it is good after exercise. I have been clear out to Lone Mountain." "Yes?" "Yes." "Long way out." "I went to attend the funeral of my mother-in-law. It might have been further."

We are requested to please notice "a farce in one act," written by a member of the California Dramatic Club, Mr. T. P. James, author of—but, bless him! we have not room for the list of his previous works. As the play in question contains in its first two pages a critical judgment, highly appreciative, from another hand (let us hope not the author's), the necessity for one from us is not apparent. So we have not taken the trouble to read it, but are glad to learn from the appreciative criticism mentioned that a work having all the ear-marks of a silly performance is a most meritorious one. There seem to be other plays in the same book.

The President, it appears, does not apprehend any difficulty in making the Chinese Embassy take the same views of Chinese immigration that he holds himself. If his confidence is well grounded it becomes a matter of considerable interest to know what views he has the wisdom to hold. It is to be remembered that the State of Ohio has not as yet been seriously threatened by the "Mongolian hordes."

They are going to erect a monument to Raphael Semmes in Mobile, but in San Francisco we still lack one to Col. Jackson, of the Post. True, the latter has not the good luck to be dead, but his feats of piracy in publishing the contents of the school-readers as original contributions to his paper seem to call for some kind of prehumous recognition. No doubt, however, he finds a certain gratification in fancying he is, as a famous author expresses it in another tongue, "a statue of himself, erected by public subscription." But what an execrable artist he must think the sculptor.

Unless "an appeal" shall result in mitigating their hard lot, Messrs. Bächelder and Henninger, the men who managed the police brokerage business in this city with such admirable results and so intelligent a sense of personal profit, will have to go to jail, the first for a year and the second for six months. It is to be hoped they may be spared the annoyance of being conducted to the "Bastile" by officers to whom they sold appointments. The object of punishment—it cannot be too often repeated—is merely reformatory; and this end will have been sufficiently accomplished if these gentlemen, entering jail as common swindlers, shall emerge as common thieves.

When a capitalist gives in his adherence to the working-man's cause he does so with a temperate and graceful zeal suggestive of a reserved power from which those who have lost faith in the empty declamation of the ragged demagogue are justified in forecasting great results. An instance in point. Down at the Oakland wharf last Tuesday a "fat and well-liking" gentleman who lives on Nob Hill approached with stately step a little Chinese cub not bigger than a water-pitcher, whose pagan guardian was chaffering with the ticket-seller at the ferry, and, spreading his fatherly palm all over the top of the little creature's nowl, smiled a courtly smile and said in his blandest tones: "My child, you must go." It was a mere experiment; the gentleman has political ambition, and was rehearsing his part. One must creep before one can walk.

The London World, in presenting a sketch of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, formerly Mayor of Birmingham and now member of Parliament, says that during his first tenure of the mayoralty commenced that series of municipal reforms with which his name is indissolubly associated by his fellow-townsmen. He set to work to conduct the negotiations and draw the Acts of Parliament necessary for the acquirement of the local water-works, and subsequently of the property of the two gas companies existing in Birmingham. This policy has proved brilliantly successful, having relieved the rate-payers of considerable burdens. The gas department is conducted so cheaply as to return to the town a profit of fifty thousand pounds per annum, while the water-works bring in five, the difference being explained by the indisposition of the corporation to make more than just a clear surplus out of the water, which must be regarded as an article of prime necessity, while gas is employed at a profit in conducting business. If we could have an honest municipal government, nothing could be more desirable than that San Francisco should own her gas and water-works. The first it can construct, and thus supply light. The second it can purchase either from the Spring Valley or by obtaining Lake Merced; and if properly and honestly conducted would be a source of profit to the city. Common sense and common honesty are all that is required.

It is becoming the fashion among the ladies of England to have their monograms embroidered on their shoes. This is an idea for those who have pretty ankles and small feet.

One of the most promising signs of the times is the disintegration of the Democratic party of the "solid South." Disaffected Democrats, Republicans, and darkies are organizing in opposition to the brigadier-general machine politics of the unreconstructed element of Southern chivalry. We told Pen Johnson so.

From a paragraph in the "social" column of a local Jenkins we learn that on Monday last the Superintendent of Streets was "surprised." It was by a party of admiring friends at his residence, not, as one might infer, by finding a section of clean and well-paved street broad enough to lay out a dead contractor on.

"I have always liked your paper," said a well-known mining "manipulator" entering this office, "and now I think I can do something more than praise it." "Speak to the Business Manager," said the editor, not looking up. Exit offended manipulator. "You imprudent man!" shouts the B. M., who had overheard; "how do you know but he had a corrupt proposition to make?"

We recommend to persons having contracts to let requiring only unskilled labor—such as grading—to withhold the same until the winter season in order that employment may be furnished to common laborers. Work is now abundant in town and country. During the rainy season there comes to the poor a severe pinch. If this suggestion is heeded the winter will be tidied over easily.

Two Englishmen, one of whom was, in his own country, a politician, the other a littérateur, met the other evening at the Bohemian Club in this city and naturally began talking on the one subject that now occupies the English patriotic mind. "Really," said the statesman, "it has been a wonderful and glorious career, that of Lord Beaconsfield." "Very," assented the man of letters, and pathetically added: "What a pity Mr. Disraeli is not living to describe it."

As an evidence of the influence of the ARGONAUT upon the effete monarchies of Europe, we are informed that the entertainments given at Marlborough House by the Prince and Princess of Wales are styled "Olla Podrida."

Miss Lotta Crabtree, the actress, says she will not play any more in San Francisco for fear people will think that her gift of a fountain was only an advertisement of herself. Her acting is popular and her fountain pretty generally avoided, but if we can have but one of them we prefer the fountain.

What a number of "primitive Christians" and "fathers of the early church" one meets in San Francisco, awaiting canonization. Mr. Lecky informs us that the saints of Mesopotamia considered washing a pollution to the soul, and no man was thought to be saintly until offensive. When Saint Anthony was very old he refused to put his feet in warm water, explaining that any kind of ablution was a "fleshly vanity." Then there was another nice old "father," whose name we do not now recall, who never washed his face, because, he said, "the face should reflect only the purity of the soul." Saint Euphrasia joined an order of religious devotees who shuddered at mention of a bath. In short, the more ardent pietists of "young Christianity" seem to have been staunch believers in some Gospel of Dirt which has, unfortunately, not been handed down to us; but we have a lex non scripta which many of their modern successors faithfully observe. It is our bigoted opinion that these heretics ought to be persecuted.

The San Rafael ferry-boat. Beautiful young married woman beleaguered by male adorers competing for smiles. Beautiful young married woman's husband looks over the top of his newspaper and mutters sotto voce: "Now what the devil do those idiots find to admire in her?"

Boston has a "Society for the Elevation of the Stage." This is a noble work in which actors and actresses ought to assist by forming a "Society for the Elevation of the Public." The former league might then advantageously disband.

The man Troy Dye, of Sacramento, who is suspected of having murdered Mr. Tullis in order to have, as Public Administrator, the handling of the dead man's estate, has, naturally, a "complete answer." Probably it will turn out to be that he could not have made any money of the estate except by official dishonesty. Later.—He has confessed, and must be considered a dishonest official.

An irascible Front Street merchant, to whom a pertinacious collector had for the third time presented a trifling bill and been told to take it to the store, kicked him soundly, roaring: "Take that!" "On account, yes," replied the dun, pulling himself together and walking away; "give you a receipt when you pay the balance."

Mr. Alexander Del Mar, formerly Director of the Bureau of Statistics at the national capital, has not been very long in California, but he has already found time to make a gift of a valuable library of some two thousand volumes to the State University. It is a generous act, intelligently performed. Abi tu et fac similiter.

Amongst the ladies whose grief for the sudden death of Montague was most clamorous and inconsolable Miss Jeffreys-Lewis shone with considerable splendor. When the Diplomacy Company went East with the body Miss Lewis accompanied them as far as Oakland, where, to their astonishment and renewed grief, she bade them a tender farewell, returned to this city, and married a stock-broker. The lady and her husband are now engaged in drying the handkerchief she used at the funeral services—which will then be preserved in a suitably accessible place where it can be reverently inspected by the sentimental public.

The Call is authority for saying that the Hebrews of New York propose to express in some suitable form their thanks to Lord Beaconsfield, Prince Bismarck, and Count Andrassy for their emancipation of the Roumanian Jews, and for securing them their rights in Servia. This is a proper and graceful thing to do, and might be profitably imitated by the leading Hebrews of San Francisco.

Ex-Secretary Fish declares himself "out of politics," and shows the callosities of his palms, made by guiding the plow and swinging the scythe. With all respect for the word of Mr. Fish, we venture to remark that in this "out of politics" man who parades his "horny hands" is commencing a new career, and that he is about to "fling himself into the p...

ROMANCE AND REALITY.

"Here is the bed where Nellie slept."
She turned the snowy coverlet down;
In through the lattice the ray crept—
What a blissful change from the heated room!

"Good night!" She left not the muslin-arms full
Of flowered carpet and dainty bed,
I smoked and pondered, but strange to tell
I couldn't get Nellie out of my head.

My aunt had never a friend," I said,
"Named Nell, or Nellie, yet I am here
Seated on Nell's, or Nellie's, bed—
My clothes upon Nell's, or Nellie's, chair.

"Nellie! I always liked that name."
The gods are propitious, and I perceive
Who voted the country dull and tame,
Am here beginning my first romance.

"How fragrant this soap, and this ewer quaint!"
Has the water held in which Nellie washed—
Nellie, whose face needs no nasty paint,
And the basin, too—what a pity its smothered!

How soft this towel! Nellie, or Nell,
Has hung it thus—What a dear sweet girl
She is, to be sure; and this flush—ah, well,
I wish I could drop on a truant curl.

"Is she a blonde? or is she brunette?"
I'm sure to love her—These nights of bliss
Are made for loving. I knew that yet
I should meet my fate in some way like this.

I sank on the pillows. "O dear, sweet Nell,
To think that your cheek has pressed this down,
And your limbs reclined here, my country belle,
One day to be queen of my house in town."

My sleep was broken. 'Twas not the breeze
That sighed through the trees the whole night long
I rather fear that it was the fleas,
Though the thought seemed wicked, and base, and wrong.

I looked in vain in the breakfast-room
For Nell, or Nellie. She was not there,
"Dear aunt," I said, "are we not too soon?"
Miss Nell has not finished her morning prayer.

"Nellie, come here." With cheeks aflame
I could not raise my eyes from the floor,
But grim was the air of the ancient dame
As Nellie, her poodle, came in at the door.

Fated.

The fair Norse princess, Gundahar,
Spoke to the maidens robing her;
"My life's white hour is very near,
And the great ash-tree's leaflets stir
With some strange message meant for me
Before next morn I may be dead;
Even now I hear the mystic sea,
So tire me as a bride new wed."

They murmured low she was distraught,
Yet the large eyes were clear and far;
Then all her rich attire they brought
And looped it with a pearly star.
So she went down into the hall
Clothed in pure womanhood, unmoved;
A new knight rose among them all,
And looked on her, and deeply loved.

Thereat she smiled—their glances crossed,
And they were one in joy and pain;
She thinking, "Mayhap I have lost,
But yet the loss is sweetest gain."
He thinking of the savage king,
And his own loyal island home,
And glory, bearing from that ring
His bride, across the laughing foam.

That night, at sunset, from the shore
A light boat parted, bearing them,
And after it a long ship bore
With eight swift rowers armed and grim.
Next morn, upon the lonely sea,
A drifting and dismantled boat;
And in the shadows, calm and drear,
The princess, veiled across the throat.

NILES, August 10, 1878. CHARLES H. SHINN.

Mountain Lilies.

Pure, pallid lily, lifting up racemes
Of scented, milk-white blossoms to the sun;
Pale, passionless thou art, as some cold nun
Who slays love's memory except in dreams;
Thy flawless purity bathes in the gleams
Of the sun's gracious love which thou hast won,
Unrecking in that love thy death began,
As thy flowers breathe their hearts out on his beams,
Sweet victory, I would my love were worth
A like the fragrant sacrifice of thine;
I would there were such homage on the earth
As that thou layest on the day-god's shrine,
That the intangible spirit of thy birth
Infuse its essence at thy death in mine.

NORTH COLUMBIA, July 23, 1878. MAY N. HAWLEY.

Wild Roses.

After the spring-ide blossoming there linger,
With petals yet unfurled,
And clung in thorny, half-reluctant fingers,
The rose of all the world.

A vagrant blossom, proofed of summer—
Child of the after-math—
Smiling from every careless, wayside corner,
From lane and meadow path.

Two touch the buds and buds with wistful splendor,
See and her a stars far—
Sweet that reminds, who unt, summer tender,
Service without compare.

By some sluggish brook and pool they gather,
With faces flushed and bright,
Velling their tender dew-kisses rather
To love than unto night.

There first, sweet odor, like a soul unshorn,
Is led by memories,
And woodland secrets to the air are given
With every rose that dies.

With shy, frail things, they mock my vain endeavor
To hear the song they hold,
And so their soul and secret wait forever
Unfashioned and untold.

CURIOSITIES OF JOURNALISM.—I.

Having been engaged in journalism, off and on, for the past twenty-seven years, I have taken some pleasure now and then in collecting a variety of curious errors which have occurred during that time in leading papers in the United States and elsewhere. The most common and most unavoidable class of errors is that arising from mistakes in punctuation; and next in order, errors resulting from defective orthography. Hardly a newspaper in the world, of account, is there that has not suffered in this way, and, as a general thing, the errors most infernal to the editor, but funny to his readers, are to be met with in the most influential and best circulated sheets. This fact is easily accounted for: a great deal of the "late matter" of a morning paper finding its rapid way into "the columns" without the knowledge of that indefatigable enemy of "blacksmiths," the proof-reader. In the first place I will present a few of those oft-occurring errors—the results of defective punctuation. Some twenty-one years ago I cut the following from the advertising columns of the New York Herald:

"WANTED. A gentle, sorrel colt, suitable for a young lady with a long tail."

"HOSEKEEPER—A highly-respectable middle-aged woman, of economical habits, who has been filling the above situation for upward of eleven years, and who is now deceased, is anxious to meet with a similar one."

"These lines were written nearly fifty years ago by one who has for several years lain in the grave for his own amusement."

The following is a Philadelphia Ledger advertisement:

"WANTED—At the Labor Exchange, two married men and their wives to do farm work; also, four single men to drive horses; also, two stout boys to milk four young girls, who must understand general housework."

This combination of defective punctuation and grammatical impurities is not entirely confined to the advertising columns of our newspapers. Reporters, who ought not to, are constantly making their departments ridiculous by such startling announcements as follows, in an account of a steamboat explosion:

"The captain swam ashore, and subsequently saved the life of the stewardess; she was insured for fifteen thousand dollars, and was full of railroad iron."

The inimitable Joe Howard, author of the "bogus proclamation" of Lincoln, formerly of the New York Times, and now of the Herald, wrote of the Bill Poole obsequies in New York, in 1855: "The procession was very fine, as was also the sermon of the minister." He afterward inserted after the word fine by a caret, "and nearly two miles in length"—forgetting that this addition would also refer to the sermon. The pronouns are the source of vexatious contractions, and I select two at random from my scrap-book:

"During the storm a cow was struck by lightning and instantly killed, belonging to the village physician, who had a beautiful calf seven days old."

"During the celebration a child was run over, wearing a short, red dress, which never spoke afterward."

Persons unaccustomed to advertising phraseology frequently express themselves in language liable to exceedingly absurd misinterpretation. Thus, in "Situations Wanted," we read that a "respectable young woman wants washing"; the proprietor of a bone-mill advertises that "parties sending their own bones to be ground will be attended to with fidelity and dispatch." A miller, in a testimonial to the merits of a powder for destroying vermin, writes:

"Two weeks ago I was full of rats, and now I haven't one."

The next most common class of errors is that resulting from mistakes in orthography. Thus, upon a gala occasion among the "strong-minded" at Rochester, N. Y., in 1859, Mrs. Stanton declaimed violently against what she termed "white males." But the next morning the Democrat had it "white mules." In all probability, however, the word mules was perfectly satisfactory to the pertinacious "E. C. S." aforesaid. The Washington Chronicle, during the early part of our late civil war, had occasion to refer to Governor Seward's "little bell," etc., and made the sentence read: "The Secretary returned from the War Department, and raised a little hell!" etc., which was indignantly contradicted. In Mr. Curtis's oration at the unveiling of the Sedgwick Monument at West Point, some years ago, he used the familiar quotation, "Ubi libertas ibi patria." ["Where liberty is there is my country!"] Imagine the astonishment of the cultivated author of "Prue and I," when perusing his address in the Standard the next morning, to meet: "You be libertas, I be patria." A most villainous kind of newspaper error is that which results occasionally from a "mixing up" of two or more articles. While "benzene" has something to do with these "mixtures" sometimes, they are generally the effect of rapid "making up" of "forms" in the mysterious midnight preparation of a daily morning paper. One of the most provoking of the kind appeared in Senator Anthony's excellent newspaper, the Providence Daily Journal, in 1853, and resulted from a "mixing up" of two articles, for which an old typo named Ned Angell secured his walking papers, which raised a dreadful commotion the next day throughout the "State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations." The articles mixed up were the announcement of the departure for Europe of a prominent and beloved pastor of C— Church and a description of the peculiar movements of a dog affected with hydrophobia. As it appeared in the Journal:

"The Rev. Mr. R—, after many years of faithful service in the cause of Christ, will take his departure from us on Tuesday, so as to take the Collins' steamer Arctik, which leaves New York on Thursday. Mr. R— has for a long time been in ill health, a fact which has for some time been painfully realized by the members of his congregation. So they resolved upon a European trip for their beloved pastor, and on Saturday made him acquainted with the delightful fact. Accompanying the report of the committee was a nicely-filled purse, which was placed at the disposal of the pastor, who, after thanking made a run down South Main Street as far as Planet, then up Planet to Benoit Street, where he was caught by some boys, who led a tin pan to his tail. Away he went again, up Benefit Street, and down College, at the foot of which he was shot by a policeman."

Is it to be wondered at that such an item raised Ned?—out of his situation? BEN C. TRUMAN.

SPURGEON.

From Our Own Correspondent.

LONDON, July 18, 1878.
EDITOR ARGONAUT:—The Rev. Mr. Spurgeon has been so long a great London celebrity that I fear your readers may not care to read about him. Twenty-five years is a long time for a preacher to hold the ear of such a city as the British metropolis. But this Spurgeon has done, and even Beecher can boast of no more. True, Beecher is able to say, besides, that as he grows older he grows more interesting, at least to the public, whatever he may be to his congregation, while Spurgeon, for fifteen years past, has apparently been satisfied with holding his own. What developments he may have in reserve time only can tell. He may intend some brilliant play in the future.

For a month past I have been moving heaven and earth to get tickets of admission to Spurgeon's Tabernacle, for you must know that enormous as is the building, the public generally understand that it is always filled to overflowing with the pew-holders, leaving no chance for strangers except by special and exceptional favor. And so I thought until I was assured, a few days ago, that there was and is a method, and a very commonplace one, too, to pass the door of Mr. Spurgeon's establishment, which anybody can try if he only will. And would you believe it, the hint conveyed to me was to the effect that the talisman that would unlock the place was simply coin! So last Sunday morning, at 10:30 A. M., I called a hansom and drove over Westminster Bridge to Newington Butts, fully intent upon bribing the door-keeper of the great Surrey Conventicle up to any sum within the limit of five "hob." I had not the least trouble in the world, I assure you. On the contrary, at least a half dozen vestrymen or church-wardens stood at the entrance ready to be corrupted, and only wishing for the chance.

The way the thing is done is simple enough, and I give it to the readers of the ARGONAUT (many of whom have large church interests), to use as they may think best. Under a portico, at the right of the main door, three persons stand with a package of envelopes in their hands. You tell them you would like to get in, and that you have no seat, whereupon you are handed an envelope, into which you slip a half-crown and seal it up "why seal it up I don't know, but seal it you do," and return it, whereupon they pass you through, just like a camel passing through the eye of a needle. The Tabernacle, as it is called, is immense. The main floor holds at least three thousand people, and the four galleries more than as many more. I made an estimate of between six and seven thousand present.

Mr. Spurgeon is a stoutish, thick-set man, of medium height, and weighing over two hundred pounds. His voice is strong and clear, without appearing to be very powerful. He aims at nothing like elegance of manner, either in style or delivery. His matter is simple, and his manner only impressive because earnest. He is a good speaker, but by no means equal to many we have in America. The Rev. Mr. Kalloch, of Fifth Street, in your city, is his superior in every possible respect—better voice, better manner, and better matter. As to the quality of religion preached by them, respectively, of course I cannot undertake to decide. That your readers must settle for themselves.

Mr. Spurgeon preaches Calvinism in its strictest sense. He either is not in communication with Beecher or does not agree with him, for up to last Sunday he believed fully in an actual hell, and spoke of it more than once with that familiarity that can only come from an intimate acquaintance with the subject in all its bearings. He also believes strictly in justification by faith, and by faith alone. He warned his listeners that nothing was more dangerous than the habit he feared too many of them indulged in of thinking they could make their way to heaven simply by doing right to their fellow-men, by acts of charity, mercy, benevolence, justice, humanity, and the like trashy and superfluous nonsense. He called upon them to come out of all that, and to believe in the Lord Jesus, and to depend wholly upon Him and He would save them.

His manner at this portion of his discourse was wonderfully impressive, and when he went on to declare that that would be his course, that Christ had invited him, in common with all mankind, to lean upon Him, to trust to His sufferings and atonement for salvation, and that he (Spurgeon) should do it; "and," said he, raising his voice till the very roof of the vast building reverberated, "if after that He fails me, if after I have abandoned all confidence in any power of my own to work out my own salvation, he lets me fall, I declare now that I will rove up and down hell throughout all eternity, denouncing Him to His teeth, even at Jehovah's throne, as a liar and deceiver!"

Then pausing for a moment to watch the effect, he added: "But do you think He will do it? No, never!"

The effect was electrical, and a hum of excitement rose from floor to ceiling. I thought the language almost blasphemy in its directness; something like a challenge to Deity itself. But this is one of Spurgeon's methods, and he certainly produces marvelous effects by them. Whether the Saviour will let any believing soul drop into hell or not, of course no one at this time can do more than venture upon the merest conjecture, but it seemed to me quite certain that had He been personally present at the Tabernacle last Sunday He would think twice before He would try it on with Spurgeon.

The reverend gentleman is a great sufferer from rheumatic gout, and last Sunday was the first for several weeks that he had preached. As it was, he was obliged to stand with one leg supported upon a chair. The real secret of Mr. Spurgeon's success is that he adapts his discourses to his audience. London has a vast number of sincerely believing, if not fanatical, non-conforming Protestants of the Calvinistic school. To them he preaches, apparently leading, but most probably following, the mental drift of his congregation. He pleases them, and no doubt they somehow succeed in pleasing him, for they appear to be as much in earnest as their pastor.

SAN FRANCISCO.

There are those who can't see any fun in a church picnic, but it isn't the boy who has charge of the ice-cream tub.

INTAGLIOS.

A Wedding.

He stands before the altar-rails
To plight his troth to her—a child,
Who had not heard the o'er-true tales
Of his rash youth and manhood wild.
And overhead are smiling skies,
As though to augur all is well;
And village swains
Sing merry strains
And gaily ring the village bell.
She little knows, that lily-bride,
What those glad joy-bells said to one,
Who, sitting by her lone fireside,
Nursed tearfully her little son.
Yet overhead are smiling skies,
As though to augur all is well;
To drown the sighs
That may arise,
Sing, village swains! Ring, village bell!

Music.

O cease, sweet music, let us rest:
Too soon the hallowed light is born!
Henceforth let day be counted night,
And midnight counted morn.
O cease, sweet music, let us rest
A tearful, languid spirit lies
(Like the dim scent in violets)
In Zela's gentle eyes.
There is sadness in sweet sound
That quickens tears. O music, lest
We weep with thy strange sorrows, cease!
Be still and let us rest.

Rondeau.

FROM FRENCH OF CARL RIVE.

I love thee still, nor time in flight
Can dull the vows I made that night.
I loved thee then so strong and true,
And now I pledge the love anew.
The coming year, (God make it bright!)
Not for thy beauty do I plight
My only troth: not for the sight
Of eyes that rival heaven's blue—
I love thee still;
Not these alone my praise invite—
Thy simple self it is, Ah! might
I strive forever with words, too few
And poor this pleasing task to do!
Come darkness, precious, or come light,
I love thee still!

Unrest.

"The flying sun goes down the burning west;
Vast night comes noiseless up the eastern slope,
And so the eternal change goes round the world.
Unrest, unrest! The passion-painting sea
Watches the unveiled beauty of the stars
Like a great hungry soul."

Do You Remember.

Do you remember a day long past,
When we roamed alone through a wind-filled wood,
And came to a ledge of a rock at last,
Where with hands clasped close we silent stood?
We heard the murmur of shining streams,
The whisper of leaves that swayed above,
And over our souls swept the golden beams
That came with the dawn of love.
Do you remember the sigh that stirred
The bending grass in the rising breeze,
That brought us the note of a distant bird,
And wild, weird murmurs from far-off seas?
The bird's call came like a happy song,
And we gave no heed of the sea's sad tone,
For fear is forgotten, and hope is strong,
With love's great gladness known.
Do you remember? Will you forget?
These words are common and quickly said;
But they will be treasured when eyes are wet
With the tears of those who mourn us dead.
Not dead, but sleeping; we can not die;
Our souls are deathless by love's sweet grace;
And whenever God's glorious kingdoms lie,
There I shall see your face.

THOMAS S. COLLIER.

At the Last.

There must be something after this too;
A sweet fruition from the harrowed past;
Rest some day for this pacing to and fro;
A tender sunbeam and dear flowers at last.
There will be something when these days are done,
Something more fair by far than starry nights—
A prospect limitless, as one by one
Embodied castles crown the airy heights.
So cheer up, heart, and for that morrow wait!
Dream what you will, but press toward the dream;
Let fancy guide dull effort through the gate,
And face the current, and what she cross the stream.
Then, when that something lies athwart the way—
Coming unsought, as good things seem to do—
"Will prove beneath the flash of setting day
A nobler deed than now would beckon you.
For lifted up by constant, forward strife,
Hope will attain so marvelous a height,
There can be nothing loath within this life
After this day to form a fitting night.
So heaven alone shall ever satisfy,
And God's own light be ever light enough
To guide the purified, ennobled eye
Toward the smooth which lies beyond the rough.
There will be something when these clouds skim by—
A bounteous yielding from the fruitful past;
Sweet peace and rest upon the pathway lie,
E'en though but death and flowers at the last.

JAMES BERRY BENNER.

The Valley of Oblivion.

VIDE VIRGIL'S SIXTH ÆNEID.

Sweet is that vale retired, unmarked by gloom
Of rustling bushes, whence Lethe's river rolls
Where swam with bee-like hum the countless souls—
Corporal limbs about to reassume,
After their exile long from life and light—
After their penance dread of fire and wind—
Quaffing the wave of dim forgetfulness,
Which memory of the past erases quite
With discontinuous life the heart to bless,
And give from sharp remorse deliverance sweet.
Thus reminiscence leaving far behind
Emerge thy fresh existence to repeat:
Thus laved and clean they pass in long review,
After their draughts of Lethe's healing dew.

E. W. B.

Peacefulness.

A blessing blighting Future's longed-for rest,
A golden grain amid the sands of Time,
A zephyr's smile above a storm sublime.
The sought-for haven in a mortal's quest:
Thou, Peacefulness, appear! Oh, blessed best—
Here, now bestow—or in some far-off clime,
Where Nature's tinted by the morning's prime,
Reward a wearied votary's bleeding breast.
A cloud has passed, enshrouded all on high,
But still she laughs a laughing star of silver light
Wafts down along its beaming current night
Unto my soul, a wave of nectar bright:
"Peace! drink thy fill," an angel's tones reply;
"Thy wish is won—thy dreams have vanished night."

MAUD'S REVENGE.

"You see," he said, "this may be our last afternoon together."

She looked up into his face with her beautiful blue eyes.

"What do you mean?" she said.

"I'm going away," he answered; "and you know how it is in this world. People just meet as they do in a railway carriage, like each other, part, and go by different paths to different places. Probably we shall never meet again."

She made no answer. Something that did not seem to be her heart, it was so cold and heavy, beat against her breast, and choked her. This man had been making love to her for three months—an age in the life of a girl of sixteen. She had every reason to believe that he desired her for his wife. He had taught her to love him, and now he was coolly profiting his adieu; but what could she do? Nothing but stifle every appearance of emotion, and bear the blow in silence as best she might.

In love woman has no rights that can be asserted. We all know that well enough. She may have her own purse, perhaps some day her right to a vote; but in those matters that touch her most deeply she is, by the law of custom, by the command of her own pride—the veriest slave.

"And so," said he, "I thought we might see our pretty river bank once again."

And she got back her voice.

"I do hope it is not so damp as it was yesterday," she said. "Thanks; I'll not take your arm—I must lift my dress and hold my parasol, you know."

"She need not mind it so much as I thought she would," he said to himself.

"If I were only dead," she moaned, inwardly; "if I were only dead."

And then they took their walk and chatted, and he escorted her to the villa door, bowed to the old aunt sitting at the window, shook hands, and hurried away.

Paul Redlaw was gone out of Maud Hermon's life. Well for her it would have been had he been gone from her heart also; but she had loved him so much, trusted him so well, the blow was more than she could bear. Next day she was very ill, and for a long time she lingered at death's door. The blinds of the little villa were closed. The old lady went about on tiptoe, with tears in her eyes. The doctor's carriage stopped at the door twice a day, and in all the village it was breathed that she was dying. But youth is very powerful. The girl grew well again, and with her very recovery a great good fortune fell upon her.

Some far-off relative, dying, left her his heiress, and the poor young creature, who had had much ado to find herself in simple muslins and neat delaines, was now able to wear royal purple velvet and glittering diamonds, if she chose.

Her health was still delicate, and travel was recommended. Why should she not travel, if she chose? Money need not be thought of now. The old aunt was sufficient protection; and the two went abroad, lingered long in Europe, and returned after a five years' absence to establish themselves in a good house, where a circle of fashionable friends soon sprang up about them.

Money makes a mighty difference in people's lives. Probably Maud would never have known she was beautiful had she remained poor; but she knew it now. The lips of flatterers told her of her charms. Lovers were at her feet. She could marry when she would; but she had no heart to give to any one. Love died within her in that long illness haunted by Paul Redlaw. Her face had only changed for the better; her manner was more charming than it ever had been; but within her soul she felt a strange and terrible change. She who had loved so fondly and so tenderly had no tenderness left. All these soft feelings had perished, and the man she had loved she positively hated. Thinking of him, her soul was lashed into a fury, and she longed passionately for revenge.

"Is it possible?—Miss Hermon!"

It was a crowded drawing-room; music filled the air. Miss Hermon turned her head and saw Paul Redlaw. They had met once more. A strange thrill swept through her frame for a moment—she remembered her old feelings for him; and then followed an emotion of triumph. He was here. Somehow she knew he was a bachelor still, and she was now rich and an acknowledged belle. She understood her power, and she meant to exert it. This man should be at her feet, and she would humble him as he had humbled her, and she gave him her little hand and looked sweetly up into his face.

"It is an age since we met," she said. "Do you remember the garden, and the river bank, and all the pretty places?" And how did you know me after all this time?"

"One expects a beautiful bud to become a beautiful rose," he answered.

He took her down to supper that night, and saw her to her carriage, and he called, as she had asked him to do, in a day or two.

He had been a good deal in love with her in those old times, though it had not been prudent to marry a poor country girl, and he had always thought her beautiful. Now the passion of his life fell upon him. Ambition was satisfied, and did not restrain his heart. He adored her. And the fact that she was rich, and a belle, inflamed his pride and helped his love along. He flung himself into the pursuit of her heart with ardor, and at last gathered hope enough from her glances to speak to her. He offered his heart and hand; and she whom a glance or word once thrilled so, accepted them as she might a bouquet of flowers.

It troubled him a little that the blushes and sweetness of the old time did not return; but perhaps the society-manner he admired so much forbade that. At least she was his; and when she was his wife, she would no longer refuse those kisses which he found it so difficult to beg from her now.

The man who had coolly set aside the tenderness of that fresh young heart that loved him so, pined for it now as a weary traveler pines for the cool spring and the shady resting place beside it. Yet she had not given him that "yes" which meant she loved him.

He put by his doubts, and looked forward longingly to the wedding-day. And Maud—what was her heart? Why did she laugh to herself as she sat alone? Why did she recall over and over again the cruel parting by the villa door? Remembering that then she was poor, and that now she was rich. Were these memories to carry to the altar?

The day was fixed. Every one knew it. Maud herself told fifty confidential friends. He, in his happiness, as many more. The wedding would be a public affair. It was not like Maud to desire much publicity; but she had made sure of this for some private reason, and the happy pair were to meet at the church.

At an early hour of the appointed day the church was crammed from one end to the other with people in full dress. It took three clergymen to manage so fine an affair. They were there at the altar. What a bustle, what a crush! And now they are coming! No, only the bridegroom and his party—not the bride yet. She must be here in a few moments. The ladies grew more restless. Ten minutes passed—twenty—thirty.

"The bridesmaid," said one: "that's the delay."

"No, the gloves; they are always tight," whispered another.

An hour. There must have been some accident. She must be dead, or at least dying, otherwise she would come.

People are on their feet now. They look at the door. Some one is coming. It is only a footman.

He advances to the bridegroom, and hands him a little note. He tears it open. "This is what he reads, as the eyes of that great throng turn upon him."

"Poor fool! Do you forget that there is no demon like a woman scorned? When you jilted me long ago you turned my love to hate. When you courted me again, because I was an heiress, you made me burn for revenge. I know you love me now, and I know you are a proud man. I am sure you will suffer very much, for I shall not meet you at the church, or ever again, I hope. I leave to-day for Paris."

Maud had written this sitting in her own room, in the bride's dress she had allowed her maid to dress her in, that there might be no suspicion of her plot, and she had called her footman and sent him to the church with this note in his white envelope. And now revenge was satisfied; she had punished him; she was triumphant; she had avenged the wrong done to that other self who loved him so.

She stood at her window looking down into the street, watching the footman as he hurried away, when suddenly a dusty ballad-singer, with a kerchief over her head, stepped out into the middle of the street and began to sing, to an old tune Maud knew well, an old love song that she had never heard before.

Maud listened. The tears stood in her eyes. Suddenly her heart softened. What years had not done, this song had accomplished in a few moments. She was a girl again. She loved Paul Redlaw once more. All this childish longing for revenge was gone. Yes, she loved him—she would be his wife. She could overtake the messenger yet. Her carriage stood at the door. She rushed down stairs and hurried into it. "Drive for your life!" she cried to the coachman. "Overtake Thomas—he has a note that I must have back."

And the astonished coachman obeyed. He drove her as bride was never driven yet. But the footman's feet had crossed the threshold of the church ere they neared it.

She stepped from her carriage as bride has seldom done—unattended. She had forgotten those who were to be with her; she thought only of him—of her lover. The crowd did not turn at her entrance. It had massed itself in the aisles, and stood on the pew cushions. Women were screaming, girls sobbing.

"Let me pass—let me pass!" she pleaded; "what is it—what has happened?"

Then some one said, "The bride," and they all looked that way; but, instead of making room, they tried to bar advance. And then, somehow, the principal clergyman had made his way to her, and took her by the arm; and a voice—the voice of an hysterical woman—rent the air.

"The doctor says he is dead!"

Maud knew no more. There is an old, half-crazed woman wandering in Europe now, with a maid and a courier. She will wander there until she dies. They call her old Miss Hermon, and tell how her bridegroom died in church on his wedding morning; but they do not know all. No one ever guessed the contents of that little note that was swept away next morning when the church was swept, or guessed why Paul Redlaw died.

Congratulatory Ode.

The Pall Mall Gazette says that a correspondent informs it that the following is the true version of the Latin ode to the Berlin Congress by Gustav Schwetsehke:

Rideamus igitur
Socii Congressus;
Post dolores bellicosos,
Post labores bumpicosos,
Fit mirandus messus.
Ubi sunt qui apud nos
Causas litigare,
Milde-Walliche tramentes,
Graculi esurientes?
Heu! absquatulare.
Ubi sunt provincie
Quas laus pacis?
Totae, totae sunt partitae;
Has tolerant Muscovitae,
Illas Count Androssy.
Et quid est quod Angliae
Dedit hic Congressus?
Jus pro alius pugnandi,
Mortuum vivificandi—
Splendidi successus!
Vult Joannes decipi
Et bamboosulatur.
Io Bacche! Quae majestas!
Ostreae reportans testas
Domum gloriatur!

This version, which from internal evidence will be seen to be the true one, may be roughly Englished thus:

Let us have our hearty laugh,
Greatest of Congresses!
After days and weeks' pugnacious,
After labors ostentatious,
See how big the mess is!

Where are those who at our bar
Their demands have stated:
Robbed Roumanians rampaging,
Greeklings with earth-hunger raging?
Where? Absquatulated!

Where the lands we've pacified,
With their rebel masses?
All are gone; yes, all up-nobbled:
These the Muscovite has nobbled,
Those are Count Androssy's.

And what does England carry off
To add to her possessions?
The right to wage another strife,
The right to raise the dead to life—
Glorious concessions!

Well, let John Bull bamboozled be,
If he's so fond of sells!
Io Bacche! Hark the cheering!
See him home in triumph bearing
Both the oyster-shells!

The Wonderful Geysers!

THIS WONDERFUL SPOT OF CALIFORNIA

ifornia should be visited by all residents and tourists. The Geysers of Iceland and the Geysers of the Yellowstone have their counterpart in the remarkable Canyon of the Pluton in Sonoma County. Wonderful as a curiosity of nature, wonderful as a health resort, and delightful as a resort of pleasure. By steamer, train, and coach, over a beautiful Bay, through beautiful valleys and romantic hills, the trip alone more than compensates for the cost and time. Leave San Francisco daily at 3 P. M., by steamer for Donahue; take train for Cloverdale; stay all night at Cloverdale, and leave in coach—four-in-hand—at 7 A. M. for the mountain drive over the hills to the Geysers. Returning passengers reach San Francisco in a day by the Calistoga way. A trip to the Geysers is the easiest, most inexpensive and most delightful of any in California. The hotel accommodations, the trout fishing, the hunting, the walks, and drives, the bathing, the everything, are perfection.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 15, 1878.

MY DEAR MADGE—I have had an exceedingly lugubrious week of it in trying to enjoy myself. Les Fourchambaults is not uninteresting, Mignon is positively dispiriting, and is even more so when following close upon Diplomacy, whose mosaic completeness and finish have been more irrevocably fixed in our minds by the sad close of the season. Poor Montague! He was not a commanding genius, but the stage has suffered in his loss, for he was gifted in his own line, and a courteous, kindly gentleman of a type too rare in his profession. Of course you have read all the incidents of his last hours in the newspapers, where they were faithfully recounted. In fact, so much clap-trap and mock sentimentality has been visited upon the poor fellow's memory that the genuine grief of the friends to whom he had endeared himself suffers by it. There was some very real feeling in it, however, for the players in Baldwin's on Monday were visibly affected by the gloom, and the applause in the California on Tuesday had a hollow, spiritless echo, as if it were all that was left of the subdued applause and the curtain fell on Friday night. I promised to tell you all about the change of bill; but everything has turned out so differently from what was foreseen only a week ago, that there is really nothing to tell. Falste Shame could not be subjected to criticism under the circumstances. On Saturday night the company gave a mixed bill, which was really a more satisfactory entertainment than mixed bills usually are. Jeffreys Lewis put on a plain white satin frock, and played "Juliet" in the balcony scene; later, she put on a mauve satin, and played "Pauline" in the Lady of Lyons. My dear Madge, it is my candid opinion that this lady's head has been turned by her success in "Zieka." She plays everything on a high key. She has tuned herself up several degrees above concert pitch. She has become intensely feline; and, while she only purled in "Juliet"—yet there is a subdued savagery in the gentlest purr—she clawed the air in "Pauline" until I was quite alarmed for "Claude." He was a very rational sort of "Claude," however—Mr. Fred Ward—and submitted to her gymnastic emotion with imperturbable sang froid. Yet he played both "Claude" and "Romeo" delightfully. Pretty Maud Granger, with her big sad eyes, and her many little unconventional tricks of gesture, played in the fourth act of Camille. She is a far better actress than I gave her credit for, and wonderfully earnest, if not so intensely emotional as Clara Morris or Modjeska. I should have given a regretful good-bye to such a company under any circumstances. I was therefore in a very hard-to-please frame of mind when I went to see Mignon. I know, Madge, that it is sacrilege to quarrel with the treasures of German literature, but the gypsy-founding heroine is such a very improbable young woman that, in this case, you will forgive me. No one minds such things in opera. It is already sufficiently absurd that every one should go around screaming their feelings at the tops of their voices without questioning what they are doing it all about. But I am puzzled to know, in the drama, how "Sperati," after wandering about in the neighborhood in a brown cotton gown for many years, and no one knowing him or anything about him suddenly bounds into his courtship and his estate without any lawsuit. Why are the gypsies allowed to camp with impunity on the very doorsteps of the castle? and what a generally useful place the castle is. It is theatre, lodging-house, banqueting hall, and a sort of sans souci establishment generally. Why does "Mignon" dress herself in boys' clothes, when every one knows who she is and calls her by name? And how she out-rivals Lingard and followers in the lightning change act, jumping into and out of her gypsy wardrobe with every change of temper. As for "Felina," she is a coarse monstrosity. I am not going to tell you anything about Miss Marie Prescott this time. She is a stranger, and I do not like to express myself until she has had some other chance than "Felina." I heard some one remark that she went on the stage but recently. I thought at the time it must have been the day before yesterday, Maggie Mitchell, of course, every one has seen. She is one of the perennial kind, for she still looks young at a discreet distance, and she acts sometimes as if she were about six years old. What a tiny midget she is, and what a blessing that little circumstance has been to her! I suppose she is unquestionably a genius. I am compelled to acknowledge it somehow, though I do not fancy her myself. I do not like her quick, incisive way of speaking, nor her intonations of accent. For the life of me I cannot see the connection, and yet she always reminds me of a Yankee school-mistress. I think it is by her constant action that she attracts, for she is as quick and restless as a fluttering bird. Her transitions are sudden and impulsive, and startle one into demonstration. One moment she is child-like, life-like; the next, stilted and stogy. There is some fascination in following up a person like that. She gives "Mignon" a character, and takes it through all the processes of development; and although it is not a soft, pretty, lovable character, she wins the sympathy. I think her judgment ill-advised in selecting "Mignon" for an opening piece, but she met with an indulgent audience, and was called before the curtain repeatedly. In point of fact I never saw so polite an audience, for they very cordially demanded the appearance of all the new comers in a group. It could have been nothing more than simply cordial politeness, for they were one and all favored with parts to put them in the worst light possible. I do not imagine that, in any event, they will create a sensation. They are all pretty good looking, and all, I fancy, very crude. Miss Prescott has rather a pretty face, a good voice, a very amateurish style, and most atrocious taste in dressing. I have seen them get over the last fault, however, very frequently. For the rest time will make good actresses of them, only I prefer to see them after time has been at work. Mr. Harris, the leading man, is big, handsome, and heavy. I have an idea that he is just promoted to leading business, and, like Miss Prescott, needs a little time. He has not the repose which marks the cast of Vere de Vere. Mr. Cotter, the new juvenile, promises better than any of the others. Mr. Bock—what a funny name—was inflicted with a part which was enough to ruin him with a new audience, a sort of emtorped "Devilshoof," so I have no idea how much of an actor he is. He towers head and shoulders above every one in stature. Nothing was visible of Mr. Bassett but a pair of big eyes, and I should think, by what I saw of him, that he had a confirmed habit of playing the "Ghost" in Hamlet. I momentarily expected to see him wrapped in green tarlatan, and waving "Wilhelm" to a more removed place. They are all tolerably unknown to fame, and Mr. Lawlor probably picked them up rather for what he thought they could do than for what they had done. You should have seen the reception of John Wilson and Mr. Long, my dear girl. You would have thought they were stars of the first magnitude who had been obscured by a temporary eclipse. Everything was so radically new at the old theatre that the dear public were absolutely lonely, and stretched open arms to the remnants of the old stock. Mr. Long reproduced his stock top with really good effect in this case. He looked remarkably like Steve Massett about the head. John Wilson appeared but a brief minute; long enough, however, to give me time to admire a remarkably beautiful velvet coat. I have an idea that he was a dresser in his palmy days. I went to see Les Fourchambaults the other night. Naturally, when anything comes from the Comedie Française, one expects something very perfect. I conclude that at the Comedie Française the perfection lies in the acting. The plot is not intricate, and the dialogue, though sometimes witty, is not extraordinary. The characters are decidedly various. There is a dignified banker who has committed an indiscretion in his youth, but forgotten it in the press of financial matters. There is his wife, a rich lady with an exceedingly vixenish temper and a remarkable propensity for "twitting." That is an accomplishment not confined to France. There is the son of these twain, a specimen of the Parisian jeunesse doree and a mild rake. There is the daughter, a frolicsome young woman with about as clear a comprehension of the marriage state as an owl has of a big joke. There is the heroine, a dependent young lady with a very independent temperament. There is the hero, who is vaguely described as a heart of gold. There is his mother, a regular goody-goody; and there is the "Baron Rastiboulis," a hateful, calculating, mercenary old wretch, whom Mr. Mackay draws in very strong colors. The strongest color, perhaps, is his hair, which is a bright vermillion, and as thin as it is red. Kate Denin plays the good mother, the "indiscretion" of "Fourchambault's" youth. Her head, with its snow-white hair, is a perfect picture. Indeed, she might sit for Martha Washington as she appears in "Madame Bernard." She has not a particularly strong part dramatically; neither has any one else, not even Rose Wood, but they all jog along in an incidental sort of a way, so that they make a drama of it by eleven o'clock. Mrs. Farren makes a perfect spitfire of "Mme. Fourchambault," a circumstance which perhaps enhances the interest in "Mme. Bernard." As for "Bernard" himself, it appears he is a very rich man, though why is not explained. I take it, however, that it is because his mother keeps his books, so that he has never had any defaulting clerks. His devotion to his mother is complete. Indeed, no one but a Frenchman could ever have imagined such devotion on the part of a son; but you know how their fancies leap to the improbable. He goes through another situation which only a Frenchman can conceive. He tries to make another man marry the girl he loves, to save her honor—which he himself does not doubt—without first trying his own chance. There is a very good scene between the two brothers, in the last act, which is really well played by Lewis Morrison and James O'Neill. Indeed, Mr. Morrison, as young "Four-chambault," quite outshines his usual self, and sometimes looks really almost Parisian. O'Neill's part is not strong enough for him. In fact, nothing in the play amounts to anything in particular, and it can only be the extraordinary finesse of the actors in the original cast which carried it to such success. As represented here, it is simply a rather pleasant play. The translation is faithful, but not elegant. I can not imagine one of the trained elegances of the Comedie Française responding with a brief "get out" to an impassioned declaration of love. It was quite refreshing to see Miss Louise Sylvester wreathed in smiles again. She looked unusually well, as indeed they all did; for when the curtain rose upon a pretty blue drawing-room in which several of the characters were grouped, one really was obliged to study a moment to recognize them. Rose Wood appeared in a riding-habit—the prettiest costume in the world when the wearer is in the saddle, but on the stage she needs a petticoat or two to give it grace. I do not believe in such extreme realism. It always reminds me of the actor who blacked himself all over to play "Othello." One of the features of the evening was a young woman with a remarkable French accent, in which she had been indefatigably drilled. It was evident that she meant business every time she entered to make an announcement. She deliberately took her place and settled herself in position. Then the name went off like a Fourth of July pistol, with a vicious emphasis on the last syllable which made us all jump in our seats. Jack remarked that he had frequently heard of the soft, sweet accents of the French language, but like the poet in Casablanca, he felt constrained to say, "Give answer, where are they?" The play was well mounted, but I observed that the counting-room—such I took it to be—of "Bernard," the illegitimate son, resembled a baronial hall, while the apartments of the ancient house of Fourchambault were fine specimens of modern upholstery. I forgot to say, and I suppose it is of some consequence, that the motif of the play consists in the self-negation of "Bernard" in extending a helping hand to the house of Fourchambault when it is threatened with bankruptcy, a generosity which is made difficult by the discovery that "Fourchambault" is his own father who had abandoned his mother after betraying her. French morality is always a little strained, so the bad people in the play are all very good and the good people are not so very bad. I do not go to hear the Minstrels often nowadays. They are really too stale for patience. Even Gus Williams, who is an artist in his line, and who has rather a fertile brain, has given nothing but old stories and older songs. There is really but one feature in the entertainment latterly, the finale to the first part. They get it up with some little show of attention to scenery and they conjure up some very amusing concerts, but as a whole it is stale, flat, and unpopular. So thinks

BETSY B.

A very clever actor and, so far as known, a very respectable person of the name of Montague, after a brief illness, dies at the Palace Hotel. He had been playing a successful engagement in Diplomacy at the California Theatre. The Chronicle says that his immediate friends remained all night with his remains, in c'airs, and upon cots on the floor. The ladies of the company were frantic with grief, hundreds of persons visited the room with gifts and flowers. The casket was covered with flowers. Mrs. Eberle sent a wreath wrought in pansies; Miss Imogene Eberle, a wreath; Miss Eleanor Carey, a magnificent cross; Haverly's Minstrels and the German Company a wreath; bouquets from Barton Hill. Miss Maud Granger, Miss Lewis, Mrs. Shannon, attired in the deepest mourning. Dr. Platt (out of his custom) "rang down the curtain." A dense crowd visited the remains. Miss Rose Wood, of Wallack's company, threw herself upon the coffin, and kissed the glass that hid the dead face, and was with difficulty removed. Mr. Carroll, of the Diplomacy party, showed similar emotion, and it required the utmost entreaty of his friends to induce him to leave the place. Mr. and Mrs. Shannon were overcome with grief. Before Miss Lewis and Miss Granger took their last look, all were requested to leave the room. The scene that followed is said to have been beyond description. Miss Granger declares she will never again go upon the stage. The remains of Mr. Montague have been embalmed and sent East by the overland train, accompanied by his sorrowful company—also Mr. Samuel Percy to play the parts hitherto taken by Mr. Montague. Mr. Phil. Simmons, agent of the company, states that it will fill all existing engagements, opening at McVicker's Theatre, Chicago, on the 29th instant. "And the bereaved widow will continue to carry on the business at the old stand." We recall those refined and elegant times of Washington Irving in which the question is so touchingly asked, "Who can look down, even upon the grave of an enemy, and not feel a compunctious throb that he should ever have warred with the poor handful of earth that lies mouldering before him." We mourn the loss of good and great men; we mourn the loss of friends and relatives; we sympathize with surviving mourners as they pour out their grief at the dying bed and grave of a loved one who has passed away; but we have neither sympathy nor patience for that sorrow that flaunts itself in public, nor for the grief that bows, nor the inconsolable sadness that waves its disconsolate banner of black over the highly ornamented rose-wood casket with silver-plated handles. Of the deceased gentleman and actor—who furnishes us the opportunity for saying that which, to be effective, must be said over somebody's grave—we know nothing; hence this writing is, as to him, impersonal. It is against this breach of good taste, this display of unreal grief, this public rehearsal of the last sad scene of life's most solemn tragedy, that we protest. All this kissing and fainting upon the part of women, bearing to the deceased only a professional relation, and of men, who had with him in life only a business connection, is to us unpleasant. It suggests rehearsal and advertisement for the next benefit; it smacks of merchandise in grief and commerce in tears. It does not occur in real life. The most devout clergyman would find no sorrowing women of his congregation to "take on" at his funeral; no attorney or physician would have client or patient to sob out their hearts' grief over his metallic casket; not even the most loved and honored editor would be wailed for by an inconsolable grief; nor does the deeper and tenderer sorrow of mother, wife, or sister find expression in acting the mourner at the grave. If this dead gentleman leaves a fond mother and an affectionate sister to mourn his early death, their sorrow in that bereavement will not be softened by the reflection that Maud Granger, Jeffreys-Lewis, and others of the company so successfully played their parts over their dead son and brother before the gravedigger played his.

Notes.

Miss Maud Granger has gone East with the Diplomacy Troupe, and will renew her engagement.

Diplomacy will be put upon the stage at McVicker's, Chicago, on the 29th.

Married, Thursday, August 15th, A. J. Maidland, of San Francisco, to Miss Jeffreys-Lewis. No cards.

A story is current in Moscow, apropos of Russian official routine, which, whether literally true or not, certainly illustrates to perfection the character of the prevailing system. An operatic star of some note, connected with one of the principal Moscow theatres, wishing to make a short excursion into the country, went to get her passport countersigned by the local authorities. The presiding official received her very politely, and having learned her business inquired for her "written petition." "My written petition!" cried the lady. "I have none; I never knew that anything of the kind was required." "Not required, madam? On the contrary, nothing can be done without it." "What can I do, then?" "Nothing easier; be good enough to take this sheet of paper, and write according to my dictation." The applicant obeyed, and transcribed word for word a formal petition requesting leave of absence from the city for a stated time, which was then duly signed, folded, and sealed. "And now," quoth the man in office, "you have only to deliver it." "To whom, pray?" "To whom?" echoed the official, with a slight smile at the absurdity of the question; "to me, of course." The document was accordingly handed across the table. The great man adjusted his spectacles, broke the seal, gravely read over his own composition from beginning to end, folded and docketed it with methodical slowness, and then, turning to the impatient artiste, said, with an air of official solemnity: "Madam, I have read your petition, and regret to tell you that I am unable to grant it."

Montague.

To thee, who every grace comprised,
Their sighs all women gave.
Now but an "actress"—name despised—
Lies fainting on thy grave.

The following remarks of the New York Dramatic News are neither very new in idea nor very brilliant in expression, but they are so true that we commend them to the theatrical reporters of the local daily journals, in the pious hope that they may prove sufficiently offensive to do great good: "The critic who tells the truth becomes almost an ascetic. He must purchase respect by fear, and fear means to be shunned and avoided. Few men have the moral courage to undergo the ordeal. Yet it is the crucial test of the critic. Personally, he must be without reproach, he must sacrifice personal friendships in his calling, and he must be utterly hardened against favor and against threat. Is it any wonder there are so few good critics? The actor, on the other hand, is the very last man who can brook true criticism. As a rule, he is accustomed to public notice and public applause, and he is always ready to ascribe censure to private animosity." People will hate the critic who tells the truth about them, but really it is but little, if any, worse to be hated than it is to be despised.

Mr. Hill and Prima Donna di Murska, at Detroit, were counting up the week's receipts, and the rolls of greenbacks were lying on the table in front of them, and a lively dispute began over a matter of six or seven dollars which rested quietly on the marble table. The words grew warm, and di Murska took the roll of greenbacks from the table and threw it into the blazing grate. "Zere, now, ve vil no more trouble have about sat." What was the donna's astonishment when she discovered that she had pitched the wrong roll into the fire, and that they were poorer by $800.

BEST KOHLER & SONS SAN FRANCISCO & OAK

The mode of making love in Portugal is very simple, but it lacks energy and the true inwardness of the American article. The Portuguese young man pays his addresses by simply standing in front of the house occupied by the object of his affection, while the young lady looks down approvingly from an upper window, and that's all there is of it. No gun-drops, no measuring of waists with arms, no peanuts, no gazing into the liquid depths of love-melting eyes, no—and-so-forth. It is a great saving of the old man's gas and fuel, but on a cold night the young man is liable to have his ears frozen, unless he carries a stove in his coat-tail pocket. These silent courtships, we are told, sometimes continue for very long periods before the lover can ask the important question, or the lady return the final answer. There is big room for improvement in the matter of Portugal love-making.

Just before a late thunder-storm a man stepped into a telegraph office and requested the privilege of talking through the telephone with his wife, who was visiting the manager's wife at a distant telegraph station. The assistant manager granted the request and the man began operations. He couldn't be prevailed upon to believe that it was really his wife who was talking to him, and she so many miles away. He finally asked her to say or do something known to themselves only, that he might be convinced that it was she. Just then a rumbling streak of lightning came on the wires, hitting the husband violently on the head, when he jumped to his feet and exclaimed: "I am satisfied, all correct."

A lieutenant on board an English guardship applied to his captain for leave to go on shore. It was refused. He asked again the same answer, more peremptory than before. He repeated his request and asked for reasons of refusal. Both were still obstinately withheld. "But sir," he expostulated, "if I ask for leave, and you refuse it without giving me any reasons, I shall walk about the deck with a stigma on my back." "By George, sir," cried the irate and rather unreasonable captain, "if I catch you walking up and down her Majesty's deck with anything but her Majesty's uniform on your back, I'll have you tried by court-martial."

Two Bohemians, one of whom is going to try to get himself asked to dinner, while his companion has not even that slender resource meet on the boulevard, growing about the hard times. "You needn't complain," says the second, "perhaps you will dine to-night." "Aye," replies the other, "I may, and yet again I may not, whereas you know you won't, and know what to expect, and that's where you have the advantage of me."

"THE CHINESE MUST GO!"

A Reply to Kwang Chang Ling, the Chinese Literate.

"The Chinese must go!" tersely ejaculates the orator of the sand-lots. "Why should the Chinese go?" pleadingly asks Kwang Chang Ling, the Chinese Mandarin, writing from the Palace Hotel.

Neither the rude demand of the Irish agitator nor the pleading response of the Celestial savant accurately states the true issue involved in the Chinese question. The problem for statesmanship to solve is not whether the Chinese in America shall be required to go, but whether the uncounted millions in China shall be permitted to come. Not whether our American laborers, who have contracted the extravagant habit of "eating roast beef," and "living on carpeted floors," can afford to compete with the economical coolie-laborers from Canton, with their "rice, one suit of clothes, and bare walls," but whether, when they have succeeded in doing so, our "civilization" will not have been subverted. Not whether we recognize in the coming of the Chinese "a menace to our sensual indulgence," but whether we shall be forced to accept feudal serfdom in lieu of educated labor. Not whether Genghis Khan, the mighty Mongol Tartar with his conquering legion, was a unitarian missionary in disguise, whose real object in causing the slaughter of five millions of the human race was to convert India, Persia, Russia (and China) from their idolatry; but whether we shall permit the descendants of those Tartar hordes to gain a foothold in America. Not whether Batu Khan, with his "millions of warriors," could have overrun and devastated Europe in the thirteenth century if he had not exercised a "sublime restraint" (?) in favor of the Christians; but whether we are called upon to exercise any such "sublime restraint" in permitting the modern Tartars to overrun us. Not whether the true cause of Chinese exclusiveness is to be traced to the piratical plunderings of the sixteenth century, or whether to an ancient characteristic of the race which caused them to erect the Great Wall. The Chinese question of to-day has nothing to do with the sentimental relations of the two races. It does not ask "who struck the first blow." It is a question of whether the races and civilizations are not antagonistic and non-assimilative. Any historical view of the merits of the respective grievances of the races of mankind against each other will necessarily be irrelevant as well as unsatisfactory. The question is, what has been the effect of the mixture of distinctive races? Are there certain races which mix, amalgamate, and melt into each other, and others which are immiscible? If so, what has been the result of the contact of these non-assimilative races? What is the result of the amalgamation of superior with inferior races? What is the character of the "civilization" evolved from these unnatural mixtures? These are questions to which I respectfully call the attention of this Chinese "literate of the first class"—Kwang Chang Ling. If he will not admit the superiority of any one race over another, let him tell us what is the effect of inferior "civilizations" upon superior, as among people of the same race who amalgamate? History teems with examples. He need not search the "lying records of the heathen," but may confine himself to the official annals of the Chinese Empire, beginning with the Yuen dynasty, founded by his special hero, the mighty Genghis Khan, whose praises he has not failed to sound in each of his three learned and ably written articles.

Who was Genghis Khan? Was he a Chinaman? Ask Bismarck if he is a Frenchman, or Beaconsfield if he is a Russian! The Chinese, the Tartars, the Manchus, and the Turks are but branches of the great Mongolian race—precisely as the Germans, French, English, and Russians are branches of the great Indo-European or Caucasian race. The innumerable hordes of barbarian savages who have from time to time, along down the history of the world, swarmed forth from that immense plateau of Central Asia, the very geography of which is scarcely known to this day, were Mongolians. In ancient times they were known as Scythians; in the fifth century, under the command of Attila, as Huns; and still later, under Genghis Khan and Tamerlane, as Mongols and Tartars; and still later, as Turks. They have always carried with them dismay, destruction, and death, and they have ever left desolation in their track. Justly have they been termed by historians "the scourge of mankind." The Chinese, however, have ever been known as a peace-loving people, prizing peace above all things and being willing to purchase it at any price. Gibbon tells us that one of the ancient Chinese sovereigns gave annually five hundred of the most beautiful maidens of his realm to the rude embraces of the Tartar-Huns—the most hateful and deformed race described in history—and that even this most shameful tribute was not sufficient to purchase immunity from their annual incursions. The Chinese lived for ages in constant dread of these savage Mongol hordes. The Great Wall—the most stupendous line of fortifications ever undertaken by any nation—was erected for the express purpose of protecting their peaceable homes from the annual incursions of these savage barbarians. The father of Genghis Khan was the chief of a Tartar horde, and paid tribute, not to China, but to the Great Khan of Eastern Tartary. Genghis Khan was born in the province of Mongolia, outside of the Chinese wall, and was taught to despise the cowardly peace-loving Chinese people. The first exploit of young Zingis was to conquer seventy of the surrounding hordes, the chiefs of which he deliberately tortured by putting them in pots of boiling water. Another neighboring prince, who ventured to draw his sword against him, forfeited his head for his audacity, and his skull was trimmed with silver and converted into a drinking-cup. He aspired to rule the world. He led his conquering warriors over the Great Wall into China, carrying death and destruction to that timid people. Finding himself encumbered with prisoners, he selected the aged who could not follow his army, and choked them to death. He forced the sovereign of China to purchase peace at the expense of five hundred young men, five hundred maidens, and immense quantities of silk and gold. His maxim was "the conquered can never be the friends of the conquerors, and the death of one is essential to the safety of the other." Acting upon this maxim he put the inhabitants of the countries through which he passed indiscriminately to the sword. In a battle with the Russians on the banks of the Dnieper, when scarce a tenth of the Russian army had escaped from the slaughter, the people fled to the churches with groans and cries, imploring the protection of God; but the Tartar hordes of Genghis Khan were "deaf alike to their prayers and their entreaties." When he died, after enjoining upon his son "never to make peace but with a vanquished nation," it is said that one hundred young girls were slaughtered and buried in his grave, their innocent blood being offered up as a sacrifice to propitiate the Deity. And this is the monster who championed the cause of one God, by causing the slaughter of more than five millions of the human race, and is presented to us as a hero by the Chinese mandarins of to-day. The spectacle of a conquered nation boasting of the valor of its conqueror may be sought for only in that country where the badge of its servitude is worn as a badge of honor. It is amusing to hear this Chinese "literate of the first class" talk of Genghis Khan as a Chinaman, and boast that in the thirteenth century "our name was a terror to Western Europe," in the face and eyes of the fact that Genghis Khan, the founder of the Yuen dynasty, was the conqueror of the Chinese people. His immediate descendants completed the conquest, and from that time dates the decline of Chinese civilization. The fresh, vigorous blood of the Tartar hordes, which it might be supposed would have infused new life into the decaying Chinese nation, failed to stimulate either intellectual force or physical vigor. The Tartars of Mongolia were savage barbarians; the Chinese were a semi-civilized people. The effect of the Tartar invasion of China, so far from elevating and improving the Chinese race and civilization, absolutely subverted and destroyed much of even that which they had. Decay has for ages been written in bold lines in every province of the Chinese Empire. There is no richness in the Mongolian race to stimulate the growth of any nation with which it amalgamates. Among the myriad Mongol nations who have overrun and devastated Europe but two out of the entire number have ever gained a permanent foothold—the Turks and the Hungarians. The Turks are to-day being scourged out of Europe, and there has ever been serious doubt among ethnologists as to the Hungarians belonging in any sense to the Mongol race. The Germanic and Scandinavian races, who devastated the Roman Empire, blotted out for a time every vestige of civilization; but "blood will tell." The rude Goths, Franks, and Teutons of five hundred years ago are the learned, brave, freedom-loving Europeans and Americans of to-day. The rude Mongol Tartar of five hundred years ago is the same rude Mongol Tartar of to-day. What is the lesson to be drawn from these facts? (1.) That the Mongolian and Caucasian races do not assimilate. (2.) That the mixing of inferior with superior civilizations subverts and destroys the superior. If any further evidence than that furnished by ancient and medieval history is necessary to establish these propositions, I need but refer to the history of the last quarter of a century to prove the blighting influence of Mongolian blood and civilization upon the nations cursed with their presence. Hon. Horace Davis, in an able and scholarly speech on the Chinese question, delivered in the House of Representatives of the United States during the last session, presented the following approximate estimate of the number of Chinese in foreign countries:

United States	136,000
Australia and New Zealand	100,000
Singapore and Straits Settlements	105,000
Sumatra and Banca	130,000
Java	186,000
Borneo	250,000
Philippine Islands	50,000
Peru	100,000
Siam	1,500,000
Cochin China, Japan, Hawaiian Islands, Cuba, West Indies, and British India	300,000
Total	2,897,000

Mr. Davis then quotes the following testimony from a work written by Sir John Bowring, for many years British Governor of Hongkong, as to the influence of these various migrations of the Chinese upon the people among whom they have settled:

"The extraordinary diffusion of the Chinese emigrants over all the regions from the most western of the islands of the Indian Archipelago in the Straits settlements, in Siam and Cochin China, and now extending over a considerable portion of Western America, particularly in California, and reaching even Australia and Polynesia, is one of the most remarkable of the events of modern history, and is likely to exercise a great influence on the future condition of man; for the Chinese do not emigrate to mingle with and be absorbed among other tribes and peoples. They preserve their own language, their own nationality, their own costume and religious usages, their own traditions, habits and social organizations. Though they intermarry with races among whom they dwell, the Chinese type becomes prominent, and the children are educated on the father's model, the influence of the mother seeming almost unobliterated. And though the Chinese frequently acquire large fortunes, great influence, and high rank as a consequence of their prosperity, the ties that bind them to their country seem never to be broken, and the tides of population flow Chinward with every southern monsoon, to be replaced by a stronger stream when the monsoon of the northeast sends the junks on their wonted way to the south."

"Twenty-seven years have elapsed," says Mr. Davis, "since this was written and no change has taken place, save to substitute the steamship for the lazy junk." The same complete isolation which has marked the character of the Chinese immigrants in California has been observed in every country to which they have gone. The same internal political and legal organization of the Chinese, which so puzzles our officials, is maintained in every country to which they migrate. It has been abundantly proven that the Chinese in California maintain secret tribunals of their own to enforce their own peculiar obligations, customs, and contracts, and that they even go so far as to inflict the death penalty. "In the British colony of Singapore," says Mr. Davis, "the turbulence of the lower classes has caused serious alarm, and the management of them has puzzled the Colonial Legislature." Mr. Dunlop, the head of the police department of Singapore, says:

"The majority of the Chinese in this colony are members of some secret society, the members of which stand in more dread of it than of the government. They will carry out the orders of the society when they would disregard the orders of the government. I tried employing Chinese detectives but found them perfectly useless. I do not believe it would be possible to suppress these societies by any law which could be passed in a free country."

In the French colony of Saigon in Cochin China the government has found it necessary to make use of these societies to preserve order—forcing every Chinaman to join one, and holding the society responsible for his conduct. It has been found there that "for the sake of returning home to China they in many cases abandon their families which they have raised with native wives." In the kingdom of Siam, and also in the Spanish colony of the Philippine Islands, the same general fact exists. Finally, Mr. Davis cites the extraordinary case of Java, where the Chinese have lived "for hundreds of years," and still they are "no more domesticated than in California or Australia." They are there grouped as elsewhere in societies, and the Dutch government has been compelled to recognize these societies and make use of them to assist in the government of the Chinese inhabitants. The Council of Batavia, as quoted by Sir Stamford Raffles, uses the following remarkable language in reference to them there:

"The Chinese being the most industrious settlers should be the most useful, but, on the contrary, have become a very dangerous people, and are to be considered as a pest to the country, for which evil there appears to be no radical cure but their expulsion from the interior."

I have thus drawn, perhaps too freely, from the evidence so industriously accumulated by our honorable Representative, Mr. Davis, to prove specifically the general truth which so boldly stands out on every page of history, to wit: that the Asiatic races of the Chinese Empire can not and will not assimilate with other races. Such being the case we do not want them in America; for the very existence of our republican form of government depends upon the equality and the intelligence of the people. Chinese immigration means coolie labor. Coolie labor means concentration of wealth. Concentration of wealth means aristocracy, landed estates, tyranny, and oppression of the poor. Republican institutions cannot bear the strain of such a result. The most colossal fortunes of modern times—fortunes which, to hear of them, sound like some Arabian tale—have been founded in California upon Chinese labor; and I hesitate not to say that such fortunes founded upon such a basis are inimical to republican institutions. Next week I shall devote myself to Chinese "Civilization," and the reasons which underlie Chinese isolation and exclusiveness.

HENRY N. CLEMENT.

Is there a necessary and inherent relation between culture and stealing, and is it the relation of cause and effect? There are certain facts which point distinctly to an affirmative answer. For example, the Mercantile Library of this city was compelled to rail-in its literary treasures because those who delighted in them had an unfortunate habit of carrying them off without mentioning the matter. Mr. Pickering makes lordly raids upon the youths' debating societies for his editorials, and Mr. de Young annexes the "treasures of mind," whose circulation in their original form is meanly interdicted by the police. The Boston Courier, published in the city of culture, is mostly made up from the columns of the ARGONAUT. Not an issue of that journal has appeared for more than a year past that did not contain from two to five columns of literary matter deliberately lifted out of our journal by the monumental thief of nineteenth century journalism. To protest that the Boston Courier is not an excellent family paper would be a manifestation of modesty and self-disparagement of which the magnitude would betray the insincerity; our only complaint is that pirates do not divide profits with victims.

Milk saloons are being opened in London. Quaker dairies are popular in New York. Milk diet with farinaceous food is being prescribed by physicians. Once in the old city of Valladolid in Spain we visited the house of Columbus. It was his residence when importuning the Court to reward him for discovering America. Valladolid was then the capital of Spain. The house was a three-story brick mansion. Entering the lower story we found it occupied by cows. It was a milk saloon—each cow in her separate stall, fed from a marble manger. A rivulet of water carried away all the impurities; the place was cleanliness itself, and odorless with the balmy breath of cows. In the corner was a buffet with goblets and silver drinking-tankards, lounges and easy chairs for the customers. We took our drink, fresh milked and warm from a little dun cow over whose stall was affixed the name of "Mariposas." We saw scores of invalids, nurses with their children, gentlemen and ladies, come and get their cup of warm, fresh milk, pay their real and go. We wondered whether a milk saloon would not flourish in San Francisco. It strikes us the thing would pay.

England, like our own country, has her curious party names. A new party has sprung up in Great Britain the members of which are styled "Jingoes." It is the party that acknowledges Beaconsfield for its leader, delights in the higher imperialism that crowns her majesty the Queen of England as Empress of India. It comprises state-and-church people that fear ritualists, non-conformists, and disestablishment; the patriotic mob; the shop-keeper, and the newly rich, who when the war-cloud appears sing the patriotic song:

"We do not want to fight; but, by Jingo, if we do,
We've got the men, we've got the ships, and got the money, too!"

This is the party that wanted to thrash Russia, and dared to chip the chip off the shoulder of Turkey, and that worshiped Premier because he gained for England military prestige at the cost of war.

THE NEW PAUL AND VIRGINIA.

The Practical Working of the "Religion of Humanity."

I.

*The magnificent ocean-steamer, the Australasian, was bound for England, on her homeward voyage from Melbourne. She carried her Majesty's mails and ninety-eight first-class passengers. The skies were cloudless; the sea was smooth as glass. Never did vessel start under happier auspices. No sound of sickness was to be heard anywhere; and when dinner-time came there was not a single appetite wanting.

But the passengers soon discovered that they were lucky in more than weather. Dinner was hardly half over before two of those present had begun to attract general attention; and every one was wondering, in whispers, who they could possibly be.

One of the objects of this delightful curiosity was a large-boned, middle-aged man, with gleaming spectacles, and lank, untidy hair; whose coat fitted him so ill, and who held his head so high, that it was plain at a glance that he was some great celebrity. The other was a beautiful lady of some thirty years of age. No one present had seen her like before. She had the fairest hair and the darkest eyebrows, the largest eyes and the smallest waist conceivable—in fact, art and nature had been struggling as to which should do the most for her; while her bearing was so haughty and distinguished, her glance so tender, and her dress so expensive and so fascinating, that she seemed at the same time to defy and court attention.

Evening fell on the ship with a soft, warm witchery. The air grew purple, and the waves began to glitter in the moonlight. The passengers gathered in knots upon the deck. The distinguished strangers were still the subject of conjecture. At last the secret was discovered by the wife of an old colonial judge; and the news spread like wildfire. In a few minutes all knew that there was on board the Australasian no less personages than Prof. Paul Darnley and the superb Virginia St. John.

II.

Miss St. John had, for at least six years, been the most renowned woman in Europe. In Paris and St. Petersburg, no less than in London, her name was equally familiar both to princes and to pot-boys; the eyes of all the world were upon her. Yet, in spite of this exposed situation, scandal had proved powerless to wrong her, she defied detraction. Her enemies could but echo her friends' praise of her beauty; her friends could but confirm her enemies' description of her character. Though of birth that might be called almost humble, she had been connected with the heads of many distinguished families; and so general was the affection she inspired, and so winning the ways in which she contrived to retain it, that she found herself at the age of thirty mistress of nothing except a large fortune. She was now converted with surprising rapidity by a ritualistic priest, and she became in a few months a model of piety and devotion. She made lace trimmings for the curate's vestments; she bowed at church as often and profoundly as possible; she enjoyed nothing so much as going to confession; she learned to despise the world. Indeed, such utter dross did her riches now seem to her, that, despite all the arguments of her ghostly counselor, she remained convinced that they were too worthless to offer to the Church, and she saw nothing for it but to still keep them for herself. The mingled humility and discretion of this resolve so won the heart of a gifted colonial bishop, then on a visit to England, that, having first assured himself that Miss St. John was sincere in making it, he besought her to share with him his humble mitre, and make him the happiest prelate in the whole Catholic Church. Miss St. John consented. The nuptials were celebrated with the most elaborate ritual, and after a short honeymoon the bishop departed for his South-Pacific diocese of the Chasuble Islands, to prepare a home for his bride, who was to follow on the next steamer.

Prof. Paul Darnley, in his own walk of life, was even more renowned than Virginia had been in hers. He had written three volumes on the origin of life, which he had spent seven years in looking for in infusions of hay and cheese; he had written five volumes on the entozoa of the pig, and two volumes of lectures, as a corollary to these, on the sublimity of human heroism and the whole duty of man. He was renowned all over Europe and America as a complete embodiment of enlightened modern thought. His mind was like a sea, into which the other great minds of the age discharged themselves, and in which all the slight discrepancies of the philosophy of the present century mingled together and formed one harmonious whole. He criticized everything; he took nothing on trust, except the unspeakable sublimity of the human race and its august terrestrial destinies. And, in his double capacity of a seer and a savant, he had destroyed all that the world had believed in the past, and revealed to it all that it is going to feel in the future. Nor was he less successful in his own private life. He married, at the age of forty, an excellent evangelical lady, ten years his senior, who wore a green gown, gray cork-screw curls, and who had a fortune of two hundred thousand pounds. Orthodox though she was, Mrs. Darnley was yet proud beyond measure of her husband's world-wide fame, for she did but imperfectly understand the grounds of it. Indeed, the only thing that marred her happiness was the single tenet of his that she had really mastered. This, unluckily, was that he disbelieved in hell. And so, as Mrs. Darnley conceived that that place was designed mainly to hold those who doubted its existence, she daily talked her utmost, and left no text unturned to convince her darling of his very dangerous error. These assiduous arguments soon began to tell. The professor began to grow moody and brooding, and he at last suggested to his medical man that a voyage round the world, unaccompanied by his wife, was the prescription most needed by his failing patience. Mrs. Darnley at length consented with a fairly good grace. She made her husband pledge himself that he would not be absent for above a twelvemonth, or else, she said, she should immediately come after him. He gave him the tenderest of adieux, and promised to pray for his return for his recovery of a faith in hell.

The professor, who had exceeded his time by but six months, was now on board the Australasian, homeward bound to his wife. Virginia was outward bound to her husband.

III.

The sensation created by the presence of these two celebrities was profound beyond description; and the passengers were never weary of watching the gleaming spectacles and the square-toed boots of the one, and the liquid eyes and the ravishing toilets of the other. There were three curates, who, having been very quick in making Virginia's acquaintance, soon sang at nightfall with her a beautiful vesper hymn. And so lovely did the strains sound, and so devotional did Virginia look, that most of the passengers the night after joined in a repetition of this touching evening office.

The professor, as was natural, held quite aloof, and pondered over a new species of bug, which he had found very plentiful in his berth. But it soon occurred to him that he often heard the name of God being uttered otherwise than in swearing. He listened more attentively to the sounds which he had at first set down as negro melodies; and he soon became convinced that they were something whose very existence he despised himself for remembering—namely, Christian hymns. He then thought of the three curates, whose existence he despised himself for remembering also. And the conviction rapidly dawned on him that, though the passengers seemed fully alive to his fame as a man of science, they could yet know very little of all that science had done for them, and of the death-blow it had given to the foul superstitions of the past. He therefore resolved that the next day he would preach them a lay-sermon.

At the appointed time the passengers gathered eagerly round him—all but Virginia, who retired to her cabin when she saw the preacher wore no surplice; as she thought it would be a mortal sin to listen to a sermon without one.

The professor began amid a profound silence. He first proclaimed to his hearers the great primary axiom in which all modern thought roots itself. He told them that there was but one order of things; it was so much neater than two; and, if we would be certain of anything, we must never doubt it. Thus, since countless things exist that the senses can take account of, it is evident that nothing exists that the senses cannot take account of. The senses can take no account of God; therefore God does not exist. Men of science can only see theology in a ridiculous light; therefore theology has no side that is not ridiculous. He then told them a few of the new names that enlightened thinkers had applied to the Christian Deity; how Prof. Tyndall had called him an "atom-manufacturer," and Prof. Huxley a "pedantic drill-sergeant." The passengers at once saw how demonstrably at variance with fact was all religion, and they laughed with a sense of humor that was quite new to them. The professor's tones then became more solemn; and, having extinguished error, he proceeded to unveil the brilliant light of truth. He showed them how, viewed by modern science, all existence is a chain, with a gas at one end, and no one knows what at the other; and how Humanity is a link somewhere; but—holy and awful thought!—we can none of us tell where. "However," he proceeded, "of one thing we can be quite certain: all that is, is matter; the laws of matter are eternal, and we cannot act or think without conforming to them; and if," he said, "we would be solemn, and high, and happy, and heroic, and saintly, we have but to strive and struggle to do what we can not for an instant avoid doing. Yes," he exclaimed, "as the sublime Tyndall tells us, let us struggle to attain to a deeper knowledge of matter, and a more faithful conformity to its laws!"

The professor would have proceeded, but the weather had been rapidly growing rough, and he here became violently sea-sick.

"Let us," he exclaimed, hurriedly, "conform to the laws of matter and go below."

Nor was the advice premature. A storm arose, exceptional in its suddenness and its fury. It raged for two days without ceasing. The Australasian sprang a leak; her steering-gear was disabled, and it was feared she would go ashore on an island that was seen dimly through the fog to the leeward. The boats were got in readiness. A quantity of provisions and of the passengers' baggage was already stowed in the cutter, when the clouds parted, the sun came out again, and the storm subsided almost as quickly as it arose.

IV.

No sooner were the ship's damages in a fair way to be repaired, than the professor resumed his sermon. He climbed into the cutter, which was still full of the passengers' baggage, and sat down on the largest of Virginia's boxes. This so alarmed Virginia that she followed the professor into the cutter, to keep an eye on her property; but she did not forget to stop her ears with her fingers, that she might not be guilty of listening to an unspeakable minister.

The professor took up the thread of his discourse just where he had broken it off. Every circumstance favored him. The calm sea was sparkling under the gentlest breeze; all Nature seemed suffused with gladness; and at two miles' distance was an enchanting island, green with every kind of foliage, and glowing with the hues of a thousand flowers. The professor, having reminded his hearers of what nonsense they now thought all the Christian teachings, went on to show them the blessed results of this. Since the God that we once called all-holy is a fable, that Humanity is all-holy must be a fact. Since we shall never be sublime, and solemn, and unspeakably happy hereafter, it is evident that we can be sublime, and solemn, and unspeakably happy here. "This," said the professor, "is the new gospel. It is founded on exact thought. It is the gospel of the kingdom of man; and, had I only here a microscope and a few chemicals, I could demonstrate its eternal truth to you. There is no heaven to seek for; there is no hell to shun. We have nothing to strive and live for, except to be unspeakably happy."

This eloquence was received with enthusiasm. The captain in particular, who had a wife in every port he touched at, was overjoyed at hearing that there was no hell; and he sent for all the crew, that they might learn the good news likewise. But soon the general gladness was marred by a sound of weeping. Three-fourths of the passengers, having had time to reflect a little, began exclaiming that, as a matter of fact, they were really completely miserable, and that for various reasons they could never be anything else. "My friends," said the professor, quite undaunted, "that is doubtless completely true. You are not happy now; you probably never will be. But that is of little moment. Only conform faithfully to the laws of matter, and your children's children will be happy in the course of a few centuries; and you will like that far better than being happy yourselves. Only consider the matter in this light, and you yourselves will become happy also; and whatever you say, and whatever you do, think only of the effect it will have five hundred years afterward."

At these solemn words, the anxious faces grew calm. An awful sense of the responsibility of each one of us, and the infinite consequences of every human act, was filling the hearts of all; when, by a faithful conformity to the laws of matter, the boiler blew up, and the Australasian went down. In an instant the air was rent with yells and cries; and all the Humanity that was on board the vessel was busy, as the professor expressed it, uniting itself with the infinite azure of the past. Paul and Virginia, however, floated quietly away in the cutter, together with the baggage and provisions. Virginia was made almost senseless by the suddenness of the catastrophe; and, on seeing five sailors sink within three yards of her, she fainted dead away. The professor begged her not to take it so much to heart, as these were the very men who had got the cutter in readiness; "and they are, therefore," he said, "still really alive in the fact of our happy escape." Virginia, however, being quite insensible, the professor turned to the last human being still to be seen above the waters, and shouted to him not to be afraid of death, as there was certainly no hell, and that his life, no matter how degraded and miserable, had been a glorious mystery, full of infinite significance. The next moment the struggler was snapped up by a shark. The cutter, meanwhile, borne by a current, had been drifting rapidly toward the island. And the professor, spreading to the breeze Virginia's beautiful lace parasol, soon brought it to the shore on a beach of the softest sand.

V.

The scene that met Paul's eyes as he landed was one of extreme loveliness. He had run the boat ashore in a little fairy bay, full of translucent waters, and fringed with silvery sands. On either side it was protected by fantastic rocks, and in the middle it opened inland to an enchanting valley, where tall tropical trees made a grateful shade, and where the ground was carpeted with the softest moss and turf.

Paul's first care was for his fair companion. He spread a costly cashmere shawl on the beach, and placed her, still fainting, on this. In a few moments she opened her eyes; but was on the point of fainting again as the horrors of the last half-hour came back to her, when she caught sight in the cutter of the largest of her own boxes, and she began to recover herself. Paul begged her to remain quiet while he went to reconnoitre.

He had hardly proceeded twenty yards into the valley when, to his infinite astonishment, he came on a charming cottage, built under the shadow of a bread-tree, with a broad veranda, plate-glass windows, and red window blinds. His first thought was, that this could be no desert island at all, but some happy European settlement. But, on approaching the cottage, it proved to be quite untenanted, and, from the cobwebs woven across the doorway, it seemed to have been long abandoned. Inside there was abundance of luxurious furniture; the floors were covered with gorgeous Indian carpets; and there was a pantry well stocked with plate, and glass, and table linen. The professor could not tell what to make of it, till, examining the structure more closely, he found it composed mainly of a ship's timbers. This seemed to tell its own tale; and he at once concluded that he and Virginia were not the first castaways who had been forced to make the island for some time their dwelling-place.

Overjoyed at this discovery, the professor hastened back to Virginia. She was by this time quite recovered, and was kneeling on the cashmere shawl, with a rosary in her hands designed especially for the use of Anglo-Catholics, and was alternately lifting up her eyes in gratitude to Heaven, and casting them down in anguish at her torn and crumpled dress. The poor professor was horrified at the sight of a human being in this degrading attitude of superstition. But, as Virginia quitted it with alacrity as soon as ever he told his news to her, he hoped he might soon convert her into a sublime and holy Utilitarian. The first thing she besought him to do was to carry her biggest box to this charming cottage, that she might change her clothes and appear in something fit to be seen in. The professor most obligingly at once did as she asked him; and, while she was busy at her toilet, he got from the cutter what provisions he could, and proceeded to lay the table. When all was ready, he rang a gong which he found suspended in the lobby; Virginia appeared shortly in a beautiful pink dressing-gown, embroidered with silver flowers; and, just before sunset, the two sat down to a really excellent meal. The bread-tree at the door of the cottage contributed some beautiful French rolls; close at hand, also, they discovered a butter-tree; and the professor had produced from the cutter a variety of salt and potted meats, pâté de foie gras, cakes, preserved fruit, and some bottles of fine champagne. This last helped much to raise their spirits. Virginia found it very dry, and exactly suited to her palate. She had but drunk five glasses of it when her natural smile returned to her, though she was much disappointed because Paul took no notice of her dressing-gown; and, when she had drunk three glasses more, she quietly went to sleep on the sofa.

The moon had by this time risen in dazzling splendor; and the professor went out and lighted a cigar. All during dinner there had been a feeling of dull despair in his heart, which even the champagne did not dissipate. But now, as he surveyed in the moonlight the wondrous paradise in which his strange fate had cast him, his mood changed. The air was full of the scents of a thousand night-smelling flowers; the sea murmured on the beach in soft, voluptuous cadences. The professor's cigar was excellent. He now saw his situation in a truer light. Here was a bountiful island, where earth unbidden brought forth all her choicest fruits; and most of the luxuries of civilization had already been wafted thither. Existence here seemed to be purified from all its evils. Was not this the very condition of things which all the sublimest and exactest thinkers of modern times had been dreaming and lecturing and writing books about for a good half-century? Here was a place where Humanity could do justice to itself, and realize those glorious destinies which all exact thinkers take for granted must be in store for it. True, from the mass of Humanity he was completely cut away; but Virginia was his companion. Holiness, and solemnity, and unspeakably significant happiness, did not, he argued, depend on the multiplication-table. He and Virginia represented Humanity as well as a million couples. They were a complete Humanity in themselves, and Humanity in a perfect shape; and the very next day they would make preparations for fulfilling their holy destiny, and being as solemnly and unspeakably happy as it was their stern duty to be. The professor turned his eyes upward to the starry heavens; and a sense came over him of the eternity and the immensity of Nature, and the demonstrable absence of any intelligence that guided it. These reflections naturally brought home to him with more vividness the stupendous and boundless importance of man. His bosom swelled violently; and he cried aloud, his eyes still fixed on the firmament: "O important All! O important Me!"

When he came back to the cottage, he found Virginia just getting off the sofa, and preparing to go off to bed. She was too sleepy even to say good-night to him; and, with evident want of temper, was tugging at the buttons of her dressing-gown. "Ah," she murmured, as she left the room, "if God, in his infinite mercy, had only spared my maid!"

Virginia's evident discontent gave profound pain to Paul. "How solemn," he exclaimed, "for half humanity to be discontented!" But he was still more disturbed at the appeal to a chimerical manufacturer of atoms; and he exclaimed, in yet more sorrowful tones, "How solemn for half humanity to be sunk lower than the beasts by superstition!"

However, he hoped that these stupendous evils might, under the present favorable conditions, vanish in the course of a few days' progress; and he went to bed, full of august auguries.

VI.

Next morning he was up betimes; and the prospects of Humanity looked more glorious than ever. He gathered some of the finest pats from the butter-tree, and some fresh French rolls from the bread-tree. He discovered a cow close at hand, that allowed him at once to milk it; and a little roast-pig ran up to him out of the underwood, and, fawning on him with its trotters, said, "Come, eat me." The professor vivisected it before Virginia's door, that its automatic noise, which the vulgar call cries of pain, might awaken her; and he then set it in a hot dish on the table.

"It has come! it has come!" he shouted, rapturously, as Virginia entered the room, this time in a blue-silk dressing-gown, embroidered with flowers of gold.

"What has come?" said Virginia, pettishly, for she was suffering from a terrible headache, and the professor's loud voice annoyed her. "You don't mean to say that we are rescued, are we?"

"Yes," answered Paul, solemnly; "we are rescued from all the pains and imperfections of a world that has not learned how to conform to the laws of matter, and is but imperfectly acquainted with the science of sociology. It is therefore inevitable that, the evils of existence being thus removed, we shall both be solemnly, stupendously, and unspeakably happy."

"Nonsense!" said Virginia, snappishly, who thought the professor was joking.

"It is not nonsense," said the professor. "It is deducible from the teachings of John Stuart Mill, of Auguste Comte, of Mr. Frederic Harrison, and of all the exact thinkers who have cast off superstition, and who adore Humanity."

Virginia meanwhile ate pâté de foie gras, of which she was passionately fond; and, growing a little less sullen, she at last admitted that they were lucky in having at least the necessities of life left to them.

"But as for happiness—there is nothing to do here, there is no church to go to, and you don't seem to care a bit for my dressing-gown. What have we got to make us happy?"

"Humanity," replied the professor, eagerly, "Humanity, that divine entity, which is, of course, capable of everything that is fine and invaluable, and is the object of indescribable emotion to all exact thinkers. And what is Humanity?" he went on, more earnestly, "you and I are Humanity—you and I are that august existence. You already are all the world to me; and I very soon shall be all the world to you. Adored being, it will be my mission and my glory to compel you to live for me. And then, as modern philosophy can demonstrate, we shall both of us be significantly and unspeakably happy."

For a few moments Virginia merely stared at Paul. Suddenly she turned quite pale, her lips quivered, and, exclaiming,

"How dare you?—and I, too, the wife of a bishop!" she left the room in hysterics.

The professor could make nothing of this. Though he had dissected many dead women, he knew very little of the hearts of live ones. A sense of shyness overpowered him. He felt embarrassed, he could not tell why, at being thus left alone with Virginia. He lit a cigar, and went out. Here was a to-do indeed, he thought. How would progress be possible if one-half of Humanity misunderstood the other?

He was thus musing, when suddenly a voice startled him; and in another moment a man came rushing up to him, with every demonstration of joy.

"O my dear master! O emancipator of the human intellect! and is it, indeed, you? Thank God!—I beg pardon for my unspeakable blasphemy—I mean, thank circumstances over which I have no control."

It was one of the three curates, whom Paul had supposed drowned, but who now related how he had managed to swim ashore, despite the extreme length of his black clerical coat. "These rags of superstition," he said, "did their best to drown me. But I survive in spite of them, to covet truth and to reject error. Thanks to your glorious teaching," he went on, looking reverentially into the professor's face, "the very notion of an Almighty Father makes me laugh consumedly, it is so absurd and so immoral. Science, through your instrumentality, has opened my eyes. I am now an exact thinker."

"Do you believe," said Paul, "in solemn, significant, and unspeakably happy Humanity?"

"I do," said the curate, fervently. "Whenever I think of Humanity, I groan and moan to myself out of sheer solemnity."

"Then two-thirds of Humanity," said the professor, "are thoroughly enlightened. Progress will now go on smoothly."

At this moment Virginia came out, having rapidly recovered composure at the sound of a new man's voice.

"You here—you too?" exclaimed the curate. "How solemn, how significant! This is truly providential—I mean this has truly happened through conformity to the laws of matter!"

"Well," said Virginia, "since we have a clergyman among us, we shall perhaps be able to get on."

VII.

Things now took a better turn. The professor ceased to feel shy, and proposed, when the curate had finished an enormous breakfast, that they should go down to the cutter, and bring up the things in it to the cottage. "A few hours' steady progress," he said, "and the human race will command all the luxuries of civilization—the glorious fruits of centuries of onward labor."

The three spent a very busy morning in examining and unpacking the luggage. The professor found his favorite collection of modern philosophers; Virginia found a large box of knick-knacks, with which to adorn the cottage; and there was, too, an immense store of wine and of choice provisions.

"It is rather sad," sighed Virginia, as she dived into a box of French chocolate-creams, "to think that all the poor people are drowned that these things belonged to."

"They are not dead," said the professor; "they still live on this holy and stupendous earth. They live in the use we are making of all they had got together. The owner of those chocolate-creams is immortal because you are eating them."

Virginia licked her lips, and said:

"Nonsense!"

"It is not nonsense," said the professor; "it is the religion of Humanity."

All day they were busy, and the time passed pleasantly enough. Wines, provisions, books, and China ornaments, were carried up to the cottage and bestowed in proper places. Virginia filled the glasses in the drawing-room with gorgeous leaves and flowers; and declared by the evening, as she looked around her, that she could almost fancy herself in St. John's Wood.

"See," said the professor, "how rapid is the progress of material civilization! Humanity is now entering on the fruits of ages. Before long it will be in a position to be unspeakably happy."

Virginia retired to bed early. The professor took the curate out with him to look at the stars, and promised to lend him some writings of the modern philosophers, which would make him more perfect in the new view of things. They said good night, murmuring together that there was certainly no God, that Humanity was very important, and that everything was very solemn.

VIII.

Next morning the curate began studying a number of essays that the professor loaned him, all written by exact thinkers, who disbelieved in God, and thought Humanity adorable and most important. Virginia lay on the sofa, and sighed over one of Miss Broughton's novels, and it occurred to the professor that the island was just the place where, if anywhere, the missing link might be found.

"Ah!" he exclaimed, "all is still progress. Material progress came to an end yesterday; mental progress has begun to-day. One third of Humanity is cultivating sentiment; another third is learning to covet truth; I, the remaining and most enlightened third, will go and seek it. Glorious, solemn Humanity! I will go and look about for its aboreal ancestor."

Every step the professor took he found the island more beautiful; but he came back to luncheon, having been unsuccessful in his search. Events had marched quickly in his absence. Virginia was at the beginning of her third volume; and the curate had skimmed over so many essays that he professed himself able to give a thorough account of the want of faith that was in him.

After luncheon the three sat together in easy-chairs in the veranda, sometimes talking, sometimes falling into a doze. They all agreed that they were wonderfully comfortable, and the professor said:

"All Humanity is now at rest, and in utter peace. It is just taking breath before it becomes unspeakably and significantly happy."

He would have said more, but he was here startled by a piteous noise of crying, and the three found themselves confronted by an old woman, dripping with sea-water, and with an expression on her face of the utmost misery. They soon recognized her as one of the passengers on the ship. She told them how she had been floated ashore on a spar, and how she had been sustained by a little roast-pig, that kindly begged her to eat it, having first lain in her bosom to restore her to warmth. She was now looking for her son.

"And if I can not find him," said the old woman, "I shall never smile again. He has half broken my heart," she went on, "by his wicked ways. But if I thought he was dead—dead in the midst of his sins—it would be broken altogether; for in that case he must certainly be in hell."

"Old woman," said the professor, very slowly and solemnly, "be comforted. I announce to you that your son is alive."

"Oh, bless you, sir, for that word!" cried the old woman. "But where is he? Have you seen him? Are you sure that he is living?"

"I am sure of it," said the professor, "because enlightened thought shows me that he can not be anything else. It is true that I saw him sink for the third time in the sea, and that he was then snapped up by a shark. But he is as much alive as ever in his posthumous activities. He has made you wretched after him; and that is his future life. Become an exact thinker, and you will see that this is so. Old woman," added the professor, solemnly, "you are your son in hell."

At this the old woman flew into a terrible rage.

"In hell, sir!" she exclaimed; "me in hell!—a poor, lone woman like me! How dare you?" And she sank back in a chair and fainted.

"Alas!" said the professor, "thus is misery again introduced into the world. A fourth part of Humanity is now miserable."

The curate answered promptly that if no restoratives were given her she would probably die in a few minutes. "And to let her die," he said, "is clearly our solemn duty. It will be for the greatest happiness of the greatest number."

"No," said the professor; "for our sense of pity would then be wounded, and the happiness of all of us would be marred by that."

"Excuse me," said the curate; "but exact thought shows me that pity for others is but the imagining of their misfortune falling on ourselves. Now, we can none of us imagine ourselves exactly in the old woman's case; therefore, it is quite impossible that we can pity her."

"But," said the professor, "such an act would violate our ideas of justice."

"You are wrong again," said the curate; "for exact thought shows me that the love of justice is nothing but the fear of suffering injustice. If we were to kill strong men, we might naturally fear that strong men would kill us. But whatever we do to fainting old women, we can not expect that fainting old women will do anything to us in return."

"Your reasoning can not be sound," said the professor, "for it would lead to most horrible conclusions. I will solve the difficulty better. I will make the old woman happy, and therefore fit to live. Old woman," he exclaimed, "you are yourself by your own unhappiness expiating your son's sins. Do but think of that, and you will become unspeakably happy."

Meanwhile, however, the old woman had died. When the professor discovered this he was somewhat shocked; but at length, with a sudden change of countenance, "We neither of us did it," he exclaimed; "her death is no act of ours. It is part of the eternal not-ourselves that makes for righteousness—righteousness, which is, as we all know, but another name for happiness. Let us adore the event with reverence."

"Yes," said the curate, "we are well rid of her. She was an immoral old woman; for happiness is the test of morality, and she was very unhappy."

"On the contrary," said the professor, "she was a moral old woman, for she has made us happy by dying so very opportunely. Let us speak well of the dead. Her death has been a holy and a blessed one. She has conformed to the laws of matter. Thus is unhappiness destined to fade out of the world. Quick! let us tie a bag of shot to all the sorrow and evil of Humanity, which, after all, is only a fourth part of it; and let us sink her in the bay close at hand, that she may catch lobsters for us."

IX.

"At last," said the professor, as they began dinner that evening, "the fullness of time has come. All the evils of Humanity are removed, and progress has come to end because it can go no further. We have nothing now to do but to be unspeakably and significantly happy."

The champagne flowed freely. Our friends ate and drank of the best, their spirits rose, and Virginia admitted that this was really "jolly." The sense of the word pleased the professor, but its sound seemed below the gravity of the occasion; so he begged her to say "sublime" instead. "We can make it mean," he said, "just the same, but we prefer it for the sake of its associations."

It soon, however, occurred to him that eating and drinking were hardly delights sufficient to justify the highest state of human emotion, and he began to fear he had been feeling sublime prematurely; but in another moment he recollected he was an altruist, and that the secret of their happiness was not that any one of them was happy, but that they each knew the others were.

"Yes, my dear curate," said the professor, "what I am enjoying is the champagne that you drink, and what you are enjoying is the champagne that I drink. This is altruism; this is benevolence; this is the sublime outcome of enlightened modern thought. The pleasures of the table, in themselves, are low and beastly ones; but if we each of us are only glad because the others are enjoying them, they become holy and glorious beyond description."

"They do," cried the curate, rapturously, "indeed they do! I will drink another bottle for your sake. It is sublime!" he said, as he tossed off three glasses. "It is significant!" he said, as he finished three more. "Tell me, my dear, do I look significant?" he added, as he turned to Virginia, and suddenly tried to crown the general bliss by kissing her.

Virginia started back, looking fire and fury at him. The professor was completely astounded by an occurrence so unnatural, and exclaimed in a voice of thunder: "Morality, sir—remember morality! How dare you upset that which Professor Huxley tells us must be forever strong enough to hold its own?"

But the last glass of champagne had put the curate beyond the reach of exact thought. He tumbled under the table, and the professor carried him off to bed.

[CONCLUDED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

A lady who edits a paper in the West frankly expresses her opinion on the subject of kissing: "Kisses are an acknowledged institution. It is as natural for folks to like them as it is for water to run down hill, except when it is so cold that it freezes and can't run at all. Some are hot as coal-fire, some sweet as honey, some mild as milk, some tasteless as long-drawn soda. Stolen kisses are said to have more nutmeg and cream than other sorts. As to proposed kisses, they are not liked at all. We have made it our business to inquire among our friends, and they agree with us that a stolen kiss is the most agreeable—that is, if the theft is made by the right person. Talk of shyness and struggling—no wonder. When some bipeds approach, it is miraculous that ladies do not go into convulsions. We do not speak from experience, but from what we have heard others say. We have been kissed a few times, and, as we are not very old, we hope to receive many more."

A ball of pop-corn lies in the British Museum in London, with a label on it reading as follows: "An article of food in America, greatly liked by the negroes in the southern United States."

At two o'clock Dr. Carver stepped into the rain, and began firing at the drops, and a few minutes had shot a dry space of half an acre around him.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 22, 1878.

MY DEAR MADGE:—Jack and I betook ourselves to see Fanchon one night. I can not say that we were attracted by the novelty of the play. I do not believe there is on the stage to-day a small woman with dark glancing eyes who has not at some time in her career played "Fanchon." Indeed, I once saw a very large, very square, very bony woman play it, and she was not at all a bad "Cricket." It is better, however, to confine the part to the little folks, for it is very absurd to see a pair of number five shoes agitating at the extremities of a pair of limbs of appropriate length in the mazes of the shadow-dance. In point of fact, if I remember well, the shadow in the case I mention was so long that, after meandering across the width of a small stage, it was prematurely cut off at the flies, and the volatile "Fanchon" was obliged to converse with a half length. But with Maggie Mitchell it is quite different; she is just the right size for it, and what there is of her is a perfect bundle of emotion. I have not seen anything more perfect in its way than the first three acts of Fanchon, taking it from her own standpoint. She has thoroughly Americanized it. There is no trace of the little French imp of the original story. She is rather a wild Yankee girl buried in the woods, while she and all around her are masquerading in French costumes. But the soul is there, and souls have no nationalities. What an odd mixture of the natural and the affected Maggie Mitchell is! One moment she is a perfect child of nature, the next a model specimen of the training school. Her peculiar voice has so many intonations, and she changes it so suddenly, that one sometimes looks to see who else has spoken. With her long dress she puts on company manners, and makes the most dignified courtesies you ever saw. Altogether, she is a wonderful contradiction. She has flashes of genius and flashes of commonplace. Next week she brings out a new play. What odd sensations she must have when she plays a new character! The oldest inhabitant remembers her so very long ago as "Fanchon" that she must have grown into the parts. How delightful it must be to grow old like Dejazet, or Charles Matthews, or Maggie Mitchell, who is certainly no longer young! How pleasant even in mimicry to go back into youth or childhood every night for two or three hours and really be young again, for the kindly footlights are gentle to time-traces when art assists them! I thought how strange it was the other night, when Maggie Mitchell, in the abandon of "Fanchon's" grief, fell at Marie Prescott's feet, crying, "Grandma, grandma!" There's an Americanism for a French play! Maggie Mitchell played "Fanchon," perhaps, before Marie Prescott was born, and yet how the art of make-up reverses them. Madge, I have come to the conclusion that there is something more in Miss Marie Prescott than appeared at first. She was inconsiderate enough to play "Felina" badly and carelessly because it was an ungrateful part. Foolish girl! That little act was most indisputably the mark of the amateur. It will take her some time to dissipate the bad impression she made, and yet I wish you could have seen her as "Ann Fadet." It was really a remarkable personation in one so young and so new to the stage. She is really a very pretty girl, but she remorselessly sacrificed every atom of her beauty and made of herself a hideous, scrawny old hag. She spared nothing. Her hands and arms had a witch-like thinness, her face was seamed and attenuated beyond recognition, and her teeth were a horror; even her voice was well controlled. Some day she will play it quite differently, for she makes "Ann Fadet" simply a weak, tremulous old woman, and gives her none of the witch-like malignity common to this charming species of ancient female. She gives one little dramatic burst, which would be almost Cushman-line were it not for the remnant of amateur uncertainty which underlies it. They used to call the old California a school for acting, but that was in the old days of long ago. They can't learn much from each other as it stands nowadays, for they are all new in the art. There is not a veteran in the crowd, unless it may be John Wilson or Mrs. Saunders. Alas! we all wanted something new, but we did not want it so brand new. There was a débutante on Monday night, a Miss Lottie Cobb. She was remarkably self-possessed, and actually committed no gaucherie. I observe that they have promoted from the ranks to speaking parts a little girl, who has had such various noms de théâtre that I hesitate to write one of them because I am not sure which is her last choice. She spoke her lines nicely enough, but I especially noted that she looked as clean as a pink. My dear Madge, you who have gazed so often upon the glaring stripes and variegated brilliances of those terrible peasants' costumes, will understand what a charm there is in a spink-spunk clean dress to catch the attention. If the coryphæes could once be induced to appreciate the beauties of the laundry how many more charms might the minor scenes contain. Another member of the company so completely enchained me by the liquid peculiarities of his accent, that I momentarily expected to hear him break into that touching refrain of Harry Kernell's, "Take me back, take me back to the sweet sunny South." It is not a disagreeable accent to my ear by any means, but, taken in conjunction with the other varieties of English and some of the extraordinary French employed on the occasion, it was a little queer. If this theatre ever goes into bankruptcy again the salary list can not be held responsible. The unemployed local talent—what a stationary institution it is!—is having one more chance. The Grand Opera House opens with a spectacle, a very magnificent affair they tell me. Excuse this sudden termination of a brief letter, my dear Madge, for Jack insists upon my going to hear a lecture.

Yours,

BETSY B.

At Fulda, in Germany, there are several schools for teaching bullfinches to sing. The young birds are divided into classes of from six to ten each, and kept in the dark. As they are fed a small organ is played. The birds finally begin to associate the music with the feeding, and when hungry they begin to sing a few notes of the tune they hear daily. They are then placed in a room where light is admitted. This seems to render them more lively. They are then taught additional music, and enjoy singing. The most difficult task in training the birds. Some are kept for a long time in the dark and on starvation rations before their stupidity or obtuseness can be overcome.

CARICATURE.

The art of pictorial caricature, by which the forms and faces of eminent statesmen and distinguished public men are ridiculously exaggerated, has, under the pencils of Nast, the cartoonist of the London Punch, and the artists of Paris and Berlin, been carried almost to perfection. We have been made so familiar with the faces of the Premiers of England in the cartoons of Punch that should we meet the living representatives we should have no trouble in identifying them. Dizzy, with his little curl and big nose, would be recognized in the streets of San Francisco as a familiar face. The late Napoleon III., with his prominent proboscis, his waxed and elongated moustache, was known throughout the civilized world by his successful caricaturing. General Grant with his cigar, Butler with his curious eye, Tweed with his exaggerated nose and stomach, are all familiar faces to us; and, by the way, how is it that nearly all great men have nice large noses? Who ever found brains behind a shriveled-up, puggy organ of smell. It is said that the first Napoleon chose the Marshals of his empire from the prominence of their olfactory development. But to come back to caricaturing; little obscure nobodies of men are never the subject of pictorial exaggeration. If by accident some insignificant and redundant creature has the luck to be placed in a position to which his genius or his talent does not entitle him he may be pictured once or twice for the purpose of illustrating his diminutive character. But the man who is constantly caricatured, or constantly misrepresented, either by pen or pencil, can congratulate himself that he is at least rescued from that oblivion that overwhelms smaller men and meaner minds. Of the late Senators of the United States, who do we seem to know best? Who have been most eminent, most honored? Not an intelligent American does not know the faces of Webster, Clay, Van Buren, Benton, Sumner, and Morton, and all by reason of the caricaturing of their political enemies. The Honorable Roscoe Conkling is pictured in the minds of hundreds of thousands of citizens as a handsome, proud, intellectual man by the vicious pencil of a hired caricaturist. It is a singular fact, too, that only the best heads and best faces make the best caricatures. There must be something to exaggerate; and the likeness and general form must be preserved or the artist fails in the object and purpose of his delineation. We always envy the man who is successfully and persistently caricatured.

A Sublime Glutton.

As a "bit of word-painting" the following description of the performance of a glutton at an English cricket match is, we believe, unequalled in excellence, except by the performance itself: "The hero of this scene has made a table of the box seat, and built himself a throne of cushions on the foot board. So artistically arranged is the whole thing that the mouth almost touches the plate. He is a dull, heavy-eyed, sleepy sensualist. In intellect he is on a level with a sheep, and his over-fed expression reminds me of the fat boy in 'Pickwick.' He is a slow, solemn, dreamy, and methodical eater. He never hurries himself about anything, but crams his unfortunate stomach with the regularity of a machine. Provided also with a servant to minister to his exclusive wants, he gives slow signs to the slave, his mouth being too full to talk. He attends to no one, looks at no one, gazes nowhere except upon the steadily-disappearing mass of food. Ladies are on the carriage, but they turn their backs upon him in disgust, and put up their parasols. A silver flagon is before the gormandizer, and he sighs with delight as the cool liquid trickles down his heated throat. After eating for over an hour he starts up and looks vacantly round. The sweet cake is so long coming that he crams his mouth with bread meanwhile. Cheese, salad, mint sauce, pie, cake, and fruit disappear down his marvelous throat. When the end is nearly at hand he lingers affectionately over the last bit. He is sorrowful at the thought of losing a crumb. Slower and slower the hand goes up to the mouth and then the glutton appears to be in a dreamy trance. I went up to look at him and he gazed vacantly at me with his sleepy eyes. He was drunk with eating."

There are obstacles in the way of aspirants for dramatic fame in Paris, as is evidenced by a recent story of an ambitious youth, who, some years ago, visited M. Regnier, of the Théâtre Français, and was told at the end of an audience to study for a year, as his present delivery was unintelligible. Disconcerted, but not wholly dashed, the young man set to work, labored energetically for a year, and then again visited M. Regnier, to favor him with the result of his study. M. Regnier listened to him for some little time, and then informed him that he had evidently worked hard, but must set to work again. "But have I not improved?" inquired the young man. "Yes, yes," replied Regnier. "Last year I could not understand you at all; now I understand that you speak badly."

The New York Dramatic News has an admirable portrait of Jo. Murphy, which it prefers that we should accept as a counterfeit presentment of that great and good actor, Mr. William Mestayer. But we miss the fire of genius in the eye, the lordly pose of the head, and the forehead "like a tower looking toward Damascus," as Solomon daintily described the nose of his sweetheart. No, it is not Mestayer; we cannot, really we cannot, take it at all; but shall forward to our illustrated contemporary a butcher's block, or a section of one of the big trees of Calaveras, from which a little study will evolve a more satisfactory William. Californians may not know very much about art, but we know Bill Mestayer from the ground up.

Most of us know men of the later middle age, or of considerable age, who, voluntarily or involuntarily, have ceased from work, and suffer from their afternoons as other men do from neuralgia or mental pain. On the other hand, men who by nature or habit incessantly observe, who cannot avoid noticing, and noticing keenly, the people and events and movements around them; who are never unaware if the cat jumps, and never insensible to the changed place of a piece of furniture; who on entering the room see everybody in it, and can tell when they have been out everything that occurred or that was seen, are never seriously attacked by tedium.

LITTLE JOHNNY ON THE MECHANICS' FAIR.

Jack Brily the sailor he said: "Johnny, ben to the Fair?" and I said was there any clown, and a ephalant, and some fellers wich can jump high upper than a horseback, and turn thei'selfs in side out, and a wooman with shiny things on her legs, and a pony wich can wock on its hed.

Then Jack he said: "Lay to there, ship mate, the thing wich you are spinnin yarns about aint a fair, but a circus pformance," and I said: "Thats the feller for me, but the Forth of July is mity nice too."

One time there was a circus pformance come thru the town were we was livin, and me and Billy was a follerin it for to see the ephalant wich had a weel house on its back, and the pilot was a natif nigger without no close, only jest a table napkin. And wile the circus was a stoppin for to block up the street the natif nigger he slid down and was a goin in a sloon to git some wisky. But the sloon man met him at the door, and he said, the sloon man did:

"Aint you one of them heathens in their blindness, wich bows down to wood an stone?"

The natif nigger he looked a wile, like he wanted to say some thing, but mebbey cudent speak our langwedge. Then the sloon man he said a other time:

"Yes, I see how it is, you come from Injys corral strand, were Affrics sunny fountains role down their golden sand."

Wen he had sed that the natif nigger man he be gun to dance a round, and hitch up his britch clout, and hold up his hand and twiddle his thumb and fingers like he was wirlin a stick in em, but he dident say nothin.

Then the sloon man he said:

"You have come here for to call us to de liver yure land from erers chane."

But fore he cude say any more that natif nigger had knocked him down an was a stompin on to the stummeck of his belly, and a yellin:

"Ye dhirty blaggaird, fwot do ye mane wid yer mlshnary gammon to a son of the howly mither church? Take that, ye thafe o the world, and the nixt toime ye want to convart a grand quintoople combination hippydhrome ye better start in on that divile of a royal roarin goriller, wich is an unbelaver!"

My Uncle Ned, wich has been in Injy and evry were, once he see a natif lady in a swimmin, and he sed to hisself: "Now lle jest go and hide myself long side her close, and when she comes out for to put em on lle catch her and kisser."

So Uncle Ned he looked evry were for her close, but he dident find em, and he sed:

"Never mind, lle foller her to were they be, and kisser wile she is tangle up in em."

So he hid hisself close by, and when she come out he folered her, and wen she had went a mile she come bime by to a dessert, but not the dessert wich is after dinner, nothin but jest sand, hot as fire in the sun, and reachin clear out of sight, and she started rite out toard the hoe rizen. Then Uncle Ned he stopt and turned back, a shakin his hed and sayin:

"I never see sech a girl like thatn in ol my life for to leav her close so fur from the woter! I shude that she wude ben a frade sum lolife blagard wude cetch her and kisser."

My sister's yung man he says one day wen Noey was in the Ark, bout a week after the shower, he seen a feller swimmin long side, and he said, Noey did:

"Hello!"

And the feller he said:

"Hello, yure ownself."

Then Noey he looked up to the sky, and ol round, and then he leaned over, and wisperd to the feller:

"Gimme yure hand and lle pul you in if you wont say nothin."

But the feller he said:

"Thanks, but its gittin late, and I ges I better paddle back, cos I left my close on the bank, and mebbey sum mizzable galoot wil hook my watch."

And thats all I know a bout the Fair. Ask Billy.

We trust that our liberty-loving fellow-citizens from Germany and Ireland will pardon us for reproducing from the reports of our American Consuls, in their native lands, the following figures, and that those of them who meet and agitate upon our sand-lots will not consider us inhospitable if, in view of their very hard condition in this country, we suggest that they go home, and the sooner the better—for us. In his report upon wages in England, Ireland, and Scotland, Consul-General Badeau says that during the past five years wages have increased gradually about 10 per cent., while the cost of living has increased about 25 per cent. Clothing is about 30 per cent. higher, while fuel has not risen in price. Agricultural laborers get from $2 to $3 per week, including beer; building laborers and gardeners from $4.40 to $5.10 per week; bricklayers, carpenters, masons, and engineers from $6.80 to $11 per week; cabinet makers, printers, and jewelers from $8 to $12.30 per week, although the best marble masons and jewelers receive $14.75. Bootmakers and tailors get from $4.86 to $7.65 per week, and bakers from $4.65 to $7.25, with partial board. Women servants are paid from $70 to $240 per annum. Railway porters and laborers on public works get from $4.45 to $12 per week. Rents have risen some 30 per cent., and are, for artisans in London, from $1.20 to $2.40 per week for one or two rooms. The Consul at Barmen, Germany, reports that for agricultural labor the pay varies greatly, according to the proximity to and remoteness from manufacturing centres; and ranges from fifty-six cents a day in the neighborhood of Barmen to thirty-one cents a day in the lower Rhine valley, and as low as eighteen cents in parts of Silesia. At Barmen, Crefeld, and Düsseldorf, carpenters, coppersmiths, plumbers, machinists and wagonsmiths earn fifty-one to seventy-five cents daily; saddlers and shoemakers forty-seven to fifty-two cents daily; bakers and brewers, with board and lodging, from $1.42 to $2.14 weekly, and without board from sixty cents a day to $4.28 a week; farm hands are paid from $107 to $215 yearly, with maintenance; railroad laborers from fifty-six to eighty cents daily."

The "leading issue" in the next Presidential canvass can be pretty accurately forecast. It will be this: "Is a man fit for the chief magistracy of this country who wears a clean shirt and eats peas with his fork?"

CALIFORNIA IN 1816.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—In looking through my library the other day, I came across a work entitled, "A Geographical Description of the United States with the contiguous British and Spanish Possessions, intended as an Accompaniment to Melish's Map of those Countries; by John Melish;" published in Philadelphia, 1816. Speaking of the western boundary of the United States, the author says:

"Toward the Pacific Ocean we have no very correct data for forming an opinion as to the boundaries. The following view of the subject is the result of the best information that has been obtained. The Missouri and its waters are unquestionably part of the United States territory, in virtue of the purchase of Louisiana; and it is presumed that the title is equally unquestionable as to the Columbia and its waters, to a line drawn due west from the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods. This includes the Multnomah on the south, but leaves the question undetermined in the unexplored country between that river and the bay of St. Francisco. From the latest accounts it appears that the Spaniards have no settlements above the bay, and probably will have none; so that the country may be considered virtually a part of the United States territory, provided they should consider it of importance to take possession and settle it. A settlement on the west coast would unquestionably be a matter of vast importance to the United States; and that question being intimately connected with the boundaries in this quarter, it is considered a matter of some importance to introduce a view of the most recent information regarding that country, procured in an authentic form from the account of the Russian voyage of Krutzenstern, by G. H. von Langsdorff, which has already been referred to. It is well known that the Spanish Government is extremely jealous of its foreign possessions, in consequence of which it was under peculiar circumstances that the Russian vessel was admitted. They had the good fortune, however, not only to be admitted into the harbor of St. Francisco, but to obtain a great deal of very minute and interesting information, the result of which will be best communicated by a few extracts. The entrance to the harbor is thus described:

"We now steered directly towards the harbor, and had the pleasure of finding Vancouver's charts and views so accurate that they left us nothing to be wished for."

"They anchored abreast of the fort, and afterwards discovered another fort, of which they gave the following account:

"A fort concealed by a point of land, so as not to be visible from the anchoring place; an enemy's ship attempting to run into the harbor, deeming itself quite safe by steering out of the reach of the fort at the entrance, might be very much surprised by being saluted with a discharge of artillery at a moment when least expected. On the contrary, a vessel keeping to the northern shore and northeast part of this spacious bay is secure from all danger."

"He again remarks on this point:

"In the neighborhood, and north of the island of Los Angeles and Punta de San Antonio, an enemy's ship may be perfectly secure against all attacks by the Spaniards. Directly east of San Joseph, about seven leagues, is an arm of a great river, which first winds towards the north, and then taking a westerly direction, empties itself into the northeast part of the bay of St. Francisco. To the north and northeast, another bay extends for several miles, over which are scattered a number of islands. Into this flow four or five large rivers that come from the east. They are probably several months belonging to one large river. The Spaniards have many times followed the southern or left bank of the river, on horseback, but for want of boats have never been able to examine the right bank. Between eighty and ninety leagues inland, the stream has from four to five fathoms of water, and is so broad that a ball from a musket would scarcely reach the opposite shore! From want of vessels and boats in the harbor, the Spaniards are separated entirely from the opposite shore of the bay, distant an Italian mile [nearly one and one-fifth English]. This precludes their having any intercourse with the more northerly tribes of Indians."

"From hence it appears that the Spaniards have no intention to extend their settlements beyond the bay and river of San Francisco, and the whole country between that and the outlet of the Columbia probably lies open to the citizens of the United States. The river St. Francisco presents itself as a convenient boundary line between the United States and Spanish settlements, and it will probably afford a fine passage from the interior of the country to the Pacific Ocean. St. Francisco bay and river were noticed in discussing the article of the boundary lines, but it may be mentioned in this place, that when this part of the map was constructed, the supposition that there was a large river flowing to the westward, through the interior of the country into the bay of St. Francisco, arose from inference only. The account of the Russian voyage, quoted in regard to it, proves incontestably the existence of such a river, and that it is a very large stream, two hundred and seventy miles in the interior of the country. There is little doubt, therefore, but that the Rio Buenaventura and its waters, which interlock with the waters of the Rio del Norte and La Platte, form a part of it. Should this be the case, it may in process of time form an admirable communication with the settlements on the west coast of America."

In giving an account of the British and Spanish possessions in America, the author uses the following language, which, excepting the statement of the extent of the country, is substantially true of California to-day:

"This intendency extends from near north latitude 32 deg. to the Bay of St. Francisco, in latitude 38 deg., and from the mountains, as exhibited on the map, to the sea, being about 430 miles long, and an average breadth of 110. Its area is about 50,000 square miles, and the population about 16,000. The soil of the New California is much superior to that of the Peninsula, and the country is well watered. The climate is much more mild than in the same parallel of latitude on the eastern coast of the continent, but the sky is often overcast and cloudy. Good wines are made all along the coast to beyond 37 deg. north latitude, and olives grow plentifully in the south. The face of the country is agreeably diversified, and prairies of considerable extent are situated between the coast and the mountains. The principal settlements are St. Francisco, Monterey, St. Michael, St. Fernando, and St. Diego. St. Carlos de Monterey, the capital, was founded in 1770. The large country lying between the California mountains and New Mexico has been partially explored. Future researches will, no doubt, make important discoveries in this quarter, and at some future day the Gulf of California and the Rio Colorado of the west will probably be the seats of large and important settlements."

WHAT TO TAX AND WHY.

The Landowners Must Go.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—You ask me whether there would not be just a little hardship and wrong in putting all our taxes on land, and thus virtually confiscating what we have permitted certain individuals to think of as their own property? I reply, yes; there might be a little, just as in the abolition of slavery there might be hardship to those who had bought slaves. But I ask you whether infinitely greater suffering and wrong are not involved in continuing the present state of things? In another article in the same issue you protest against gentlemen who are working fourteen and a half hours a day, seven days in the week, for $60 per month—gentlemen, as you say, with families to support—being compelled to wear gilt braid and brass buttons as a badge of their slavery. And in still another article you ask contributions to provide with employment at a dollar a day men who otherwise must beg, steal or starve. Now, what is the injustice of making a few rich men somewhat less rich as compared with the injustice involved in a state of things which compels gentlemen to submit to every caprice of an employer in order to retain the privilege of earning $60 per month by fourteen and a half hours' work every day, and makes one dollar a day for breaking stones or digging sand a dole from the giver and a boon to the receiver?

This chronic injustice, which you so clearly see and feel, is the result of the wrong which would be obviated by putting all taxes on land, and thus confiscating rent; it is the result of the wrong involved in permitting a few to hold the land on which and from which all must live. It is not, as you think, the Chinese who are the cause of our hard times, our labor difficulties, our pauperism, and our crime. There are no Chinamen in New York, yet you may see there far more suffering than in San Francisco; there are no Chinamen in Boston, yet white girls are working there for two cents per hour; there are no Chinamen in England, yet there 1,000,000 people are supported as paupers, and official reports recite horrors which can not be paralleled by any system of slavery in either ancient or modern times. And if we had no Chinamen, the monopolization of land would, with increase of population, bring hard times, labor difficulties, pauperism, and crime. For just as rents go up, wages and interest must fall; just as the value of land increases, so must the laborer become a slave or a pauper; and these is no possible way of preventing these effects except by treating land as common property.

You ask, who would want to hold land if it were taxed to its full value? Nobody. And so much the better. For the mere holder of land is but the dog in the manger, who will not let others use what he can not use himself. To make land-holding unprofitable is to shake off these dogs in the manger who are now keeping so many lots in San Francisco vacant, so many broad acres around it untitled—to open opportunities where labor can employ itself instead of begging for work at a dollar a day. To make land-holding unprofitable is to make land-using profitable; for whatever, in purchase money or rent, the user is obliged to pay for land is so much taken from his earnings. Now, who would be hurt if we were thus to make land-holding unprofitable by taking in taxes the full value of land? Not the laborer; not the capitalist; but only the mere land-holder, who, economically considered, is but a blackmailer of labor and capital, the reaper where he has not sown, the sharer in the proceeds of production to which he has contributed nothing. And as all land-holders are to some extent laborers or capitalists, there would be no loser to whom the change would not bring something in compensation. And as the great majority of land-owners are more dependent for their incomes upon their labor or their capital than upon the mere value of their land, the great majority even of land-holders would gain more than they would lose. What wealth is produced would not only be more fairly divided, but much more would be produced; for whether he plants a tree or builds a railroad the producer is fined by our present system of taxation just in proportion as he adds to the wealth of the community, while thousands of would-be producers are compelled to idleness because denied access to the land, without which nothing can be produced.

The general interests of society demand that no one who wishes to work should be denied the opportunity, and that every one who does work should receive his full earnings; and the selfish interests of a class should not be suffered to stand in the way of these general interests. A wrong is no less a wrong because it has got itself legalized.

HENRY GEORGE.

In Harper's Weekly Nast and Curtis, by cartoons and editorials, have waged a relentless and bitter war against Senator Conkling of New York. Regarding Mr. Conkling as one of the ablest of the statesmen of the nation, and one of the most honorable and useful in his position, we sincerely hope that the personal malignity of the picture-maker and the unappreciated and disappointed political writer may not succeed in so dividing the Republican party of the Empire State as to make Senator Conkling's defeat possible.

Our story of "Paul and Virginia" is original in the Contemporary Review in England, was reprinted in the Popular Science Monthly, and is reproduced by us because we think it not only a most charmingly written one, but because of the keen satire and caustic wit with which it deals with "Positivism."

Mr. James C. Ward is not responsible for the wood cut of last week that gave to the prosperous pueblo of San Jose in the year 1847 only two or three houses. The drawing was made to represent an incident. The engraver left the incident out.

A scientist remarks that grazing animals eat great quantities of dirt. This is rather a slur on Nebuchadnezzar, and seems also to hint that if George Gorham wishes to retain his position as Secretary of the United States Senate his ambition will affect the price of hay.

Bachelors' wives and maids' children are always well taught.

THOSE WOMEN.

Things that Men Say of the Opposing Sex.

An English lady has learned in Egypt to make roses yield a preserve as delicious to the palate as their perfume is to that superior organ, the nose. This admirable flower is henceforth relegated to the kitchen-vegetable garden, and nine-tenths of our poetical literature is become ridiculous; though nothing is likely to overcome our romantic respect for the roses on a lady's cheek—which cannot, by any process of the confectioner's art, be made to taste any better than they do—raw.

A thoughtful and observant male remarks that the most delicate parcel he knows about is a young woman wrapped up in herself. The trouble is she won't bear handling.

Mrs. James T. Fields says that, next to the late Charles Dickens, Mr. Sothorn is the most charming of men. We can not vouch for the general accuracy of this lady's judgment; it is unnecessary to explain that she and the writer of this paragraph have never met.

A German princess is expected to live on fifty thousand dollars a year, and it is not thought nice of her to let her young man pay for the ice cream.

When Major Nepeau came home to England from Madras and was about to smoke in Mrs. Nepeau's boudoir, his wife objected. "Ma," said her little son, "you used to let Mr. Woolley smoke here." Then the unreasonable great bear of a man went and got a divorce. As if the kitchen garden wasn't big enough for him to smoke in!

We do not very often get a glimpse of Mrs. Edwin Booth, and it is only a brief one that a writer at an Eastern seaside resort gives us, but quite charming while it lasts: "There is a little flutter among those congregated on the shore as Mrs. Booth runs swiftly through the ranks and takes a 'header' into the waves. Her maroon-colored bathing dress and straw hat are by no means unbecoming—she might almost go on for Rosalind in them—but she loses no time in disappearing in the water."

And this is the way an audacious newspaper man dares to describe Miss Alice Harrison: "She is a little creature, with dazzling white teeth, black eyes, and a face full of expression—a divine monkey!"

Woman, heaven bless her, is the light of our homes, but when she tries to make a man's vest the angels weep.

Two ladies made an emotion (we prefer that expression to the hackneyed "created a sensation") at a cricket match in London by walking about in white satin costumes covered with white lace, the short petticoats revealing intensely black silk stockings. A whole clothes-line full of the ordinary white ones would hardly have so affected the spectator.

Mr. Don Piatt is our authority for the not very credible statement that when Dr. Mary Walker was in prison one night she was terribly frightened by her pantaloons, which she had hung on a peg. These famous garments, by the way, seem to be filling with considerable dignity that position in journalism formerly occupied by Horace Greeley's old white hat.

Rosa Bonheur, while going the rounds of the Paris Exhibition, noticed a fine specimen of the shaggy and picturesque Highland breed of cattle, and inquired if it was for sale. She received answer that the animal was to be sold on no account. On obtaining the address of the owner, she telegraphed to London to ask if it could be hired for a certain period, so that she might have an opportunity of painting it. The owner naively replied that the animal's natural color was the one that suited him best.

During the recent civil war the Princess Salm-Salm (who is now incorrectly reported dead) always accompanied her husband, who was generally employed on staff duty. A certain major-general, who was rather sweet on the princess, once remonstrated with a brigadier for banishing the prince from his staff. "What the mischief, General," cried the indignant brigadier, "can I do with a fellow who tumbles into the water whenever his horse puts his head down to drink?" "Carry him about in an ambulance, then," retorted the love-sick commander; "only keep him away from me!"

"Gath"—writing from Long Branch, we believe—tells the following preposterous fib: "Great attention has been paid to the little toe on the female foot. A rumor has grown around that no female could wink her little toe, and that to wink it was a surer sign of aristocratic lineage than to have a rainbow instep. How to give him (or her) a separate action, a pronounced character, and, in short, to make him rise up like a piano finger and drop on the keys—this was the absorbing question. The small toe in woman seldom leaves a mark upon the sand. This year various have been the devices to bring the timid creature out. Miss Van Pizen wears a seal ring on the little fellow, with the seal down, and leaves us her monogram as she goes down the beach. Miss De Vilin has practiced on hers with a patent spring clothes pin, so that it is off by itself, a wandering toe, a banished knuckle. As for Miss Smith, she lets her young man exercise it for an hour at the bathing time. Finally, the two Misses Jones inherited the gout from their papa, and have beautifully isolated little toes, but of an inflamed color."

How could we better finish this gossip than with the following lines by "Clarice"? They are original, and we think them pretty—if you want to know—and so crowd them in, although they are entitled

CROWDED OUT.

There was no place for her, she knew,
And in her face a rough wind blew.
She saw them walking side by side
As yesterday they walked, and tried
To think that it was very sweet
To hear the falling of their feet;
To see the happy sunlight play
Upon the lupin-bordered way;
To hear the careless linnets sing,
Or the blue-jay's heartless twittering.
O yes, the world was very fair,
For spring was smiling everywhere;
She had no right to him, she knew,
And in her face a rough wind blew.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

MY DEAR EM:—I am told that about fifty of the handsomest dresses worn at the recent Snaron party were made at Samuels', where I saw, this morning, a very handsome dress, just imported for Madame Ramirez. It is of the color known as Russian blue, which is a compromise between violet and lead color. The train is perfectly plain and of brocade, the trimming up the sides being of plain silk the same color, a flat fold, widening towards the top and piped on both edges by a double cord of very light silk. Half way up a large bow, lined with the same, the sides held by three plaits, supports the large pockets, the latter being finished at the bottom by a broad row of mixed seaweed fringe. The pockets, in this instance, are nothing more than concave openings in the side fold, with a simple piping at the top. The front of the skirt is crossed by a graceful drapery of the brocade, and the open vest, with brocade revers and four large bows, is completed by similar cordings. The sleeves are of silk with brocade cuffs, bows, and a graduated plaiting at the back of the hand opening. In front, the undershirt has two double box plaits lined with lighter silk around the bottom. The indications are that we are slowly but surely returning to the rotundity of some years ago. The latest rumors from over the water are to the effect that the pannier is to be revived, or rather the plural of it, for there will be two, one on each hip; in other words, we can choose between the extreme of the Marie Antoinette mode, or no mode at all, for the next year. The Rubens corsage, very similar, but with various modifications, is beginning to find favor abroad. As they are exceedingly trying to certain styles of figure, they will hardly become very common, though there are many who will wear it whether or not. The pannier jacket is a sort of compromise with the long dress houffant. It is a long basque, puffed on each hip, and for house toilette, open to the belt and filled in with plastrons of white lace, or a vest similarly trimmed. Pretty, perhaps, in moderation for slender people, but fancy any one who tips the scales at a hundred and seventy-five wearing them. With these basques will be worn for warm weather, fichus of lace or cripe de chine. Colder seasons demand shawls, although paletots and even the much worn dolman will probably survive for another six months, at least, so they tell me at the White House, which is excellent authority. If you are going to the seaside before you return to town, here is an odd, and I should think, an effective costume that you can make yourself. The material is only common unbleached sheeting, but it is to be embroidered in crewels, in a single color, and with the same stitch as that used on the Russian table linens I have already told you of. The tunic is turned up after the style known as "Sarouse," and the waistband is embroidered to match. A foulard necktie is considered the proper thing, and stockings of the color of the embroidery. Mrs. Lewis, of Thurlow Block, showed me yesterday, two very handsome dresses that you will like to hear about. One was of camel's hair and satin, all in black, a Princess overdress of the woolen goods, trimmed on the bottom with long, square tabs, bound with the satin and the plaited satin kilt underneath showing through with charming effect. The neck, cut square, is finished in satin bound points and filled in with a very fine plaited plastron of the satin. The paletot sacque, for it is a short-waisted walking-suit, is edged with the same kind of painted trimming. The design is Mrs. Lewis' own and is decidedly unique. The other is a combination of silk and velvet, a dinner costume. The whole train is a mass of narrow ruffles of silk, the overdress a most artistic arrangement of silk and velvet plaitings. A velvet collar and sleeves of the same material complete a most stylish toilette. Both of these go to Oregon. The handsomest suit I have seen this week, however, was made for Mrs. Horace Hawes, Jr., who is spending the summer at Santa Cruz. Mr. Samuels, who is as great an enthusiast on laces as I am, tells me that the "Pompadour," a very fine quality of Torchon, alias Miricourt lace, will be very largely used in trimming dresses for children, as well as for suits of various light goods for grown folks. Its peculiarity consists in the coloring, which comes in the delicate shades of pink, blue, green and lilac. The edge is a very fine scallop. Spanish laces, while less desirable as trimmings, comes in scarfs of extra length, that are exceedingly rich and suitable to wear with almost anything. This is the improved kind of Spanish lace that I told you of some time ago. The Russian laces are destined to be great favorites too. Donatelle de Flandre, which the Paris Exposition is bringing into notice just now, is very beautiful, while not so expensive by any means as the Point, a finger in depth being from nine to eleven dollars a yard. The only novelty in underwear now is the Austrian military glove, made of the finest shawl, in white and cream tints, which fits like kid, is soft, elastic, and durable. Easily cleaned, too, which makes them popular for morning use or traveling. All you have to do is to wash your hands in the usual manner, with your gloves on, hang them (the gloves) up till they are nearly dry, when they must be put on smoothly and kept there until entirely so. You will find them as soft and fresh looking as when perfectly new. At Stroszynsky's, on Ellis Street, under the "Baldwin," there is a particularly enticing window, full of the latest devices from Paris for ornamenting the head feminine. The most elaborate coiffure there consists of puffs laid diagonally across the top of the head, on a mass of softly crimped locks, and two long curls at the back. His "Saratoga waves" are simply perfect, and, therefore, quite impossible of detection from the natural hair. I see it stated that we are to return to embroidered muslin collars once more; cuffs, of course, to match. Embroidered muslin handkerchiefs, too, will supercede lace ones. What pretty ones we used to make in the imitation guipure patterns. I think it likely I shall find some very handsome ones in Doane & Henshelwood's new stock that is expected in now every day. The Irish Point sets in very wide collars and cuffs, Mr. Henshelwood tells me, are almost as popular as the Duchesse lace; and they are only twelve dollars, while the latter are twenty-five. An idea which I got from Siering's is the "Rosette" pattern for shawls and headcoverings for the evening, made from the pretty shaded Mohair wool, that is as fine as thread and glistens like silk. The shawl is begun in the center, and the preliminary work consists of five chain stitches, one double crochet; this is repeated and reversed till you get to the short colored part of the thread, when the rosette is made as follows: After a double crochet stitch—the thread being in front of the needle, instead of throwing it over the needle as usual—do it the reverse way from back to front, draw it through the stitch, and repeat from the double stitch until the colored part intended for the rosette is used up—about four or five times—when the thread must be drawn through all the stitches on the needle, and the little curls flattened down to give the rosette shape; turn it to the left, thread forward, and put the hook into the first loop-stitch as well as into the stitch out of which the rosette is worked; draw the thread through the second stitch first, and then through the third last stitches. The mohair comes in good sized balls, and costs seventy cents each. Another pretty fancy, pour passer le temps, is decorating mussel shells with appropriate designs in water colors. The painting is done on the inner lip of the shell, which makes a pretty ring-receiver for the bureau, and is easy material for practice in that line besides. I saw them at Morris & Schwab's. You may know I did not get away from Siering's very easily. There are such hosts of pretty things to look at there. Among any number of lovely vases, I selected two or three to tell you of. A pair of globe-shaped glass ones, with covers and ear-shaped handles, are ornamented with stalks of grass and leaves, interspersed with the tender blossoms of the forget-me-not. Another, of greenish yellow glass, covered with stalks of the ribbon-grass and pale pink blossoms here and there; and still a third pair, particularly chaste in color and design, are lily-shaped, of pure crystal, with arabesques of gold and white enameling. A charming bijou for the writing table is an inkstand in the form of a wheelbarrow of gold, the top of which is a load of silver hay, whereon is perched a youngster in the position of perpetual pitch-off whenever the cover is lifted. A barefooted peasant woman wheels the whole on a gilded tray. A new notion for the decoration of fans is a wealth of autumn leaves around the edge in the place of feathers; sometimes a second row across nearer the handle. What a wonderfully prolific genius is Prang, the chromo man; but excellent as these reproductions are, he is now surpassing himself in the most beautiful and original designs in menu and other fancy cards that have ever been in the market. Bancroft has just received samples of hundreds of new ones, some humorous, some sentimental. The "telephone" cards will be sure to take the popular fancy, for in addition to their excellence of workmanship, they are exceedingly comical, being ridiculous situations wherein the telephone and its various ludicrous possibilities are made the subject, as, for instance, two lovers, one at each end of the string, vainly sending tender messages, while an irate parent stands in the middle of the picture holding the two ends of the broken cord in his hand. The figures are done in black lines on cream-tinted ground. Artists cards are exquisitely gotten up with pictures of studios, representing the arts, sculpture, painting, music, literature, and figures in each at their appropriate work. In the book department I notice there is now a regular art counter, where all publications relating to such matters are kept together for the better convenience of buyers. Possibly you may have seen lately the mysterious word "Camelline" in the daily papers. The secret is out at last. It is a new cosmetic from Wakelee's ever busy laboratory, and I hear it highly praised everywhere, as not only a genuine beautifier, but absolutely free from any poisonous substances whatever. Clare, who you know is always well up in everything of the kind, declares there is nothing to equal it. Have you heard any whispers of a secret maritime expedition? There is a perfect little brass cannon some two feet and a half long, lately presented to Mr. Spreckles, for his yacht Conestoga, by Greenberg & Co., the makers of it, now on exhibition in Anderson & Randolph's window. I hope this does not forecast any serious diplomatic difficulties between us and our island neighbors, Angel or Alcatraz Island, for instance. There, that's enough nonsense for once. Love to John.

Yours affectionately,
LILIAS DUBOIS.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

XLIV.—Cousin Amy's Views.

SCENE.—*The neighborhood of Locksley Hall. Enter LADY AMY HARD-CASH (about forty), with a book of poems and several children.*LADY AMY loquutar.

Children, leave me here a little; don't disturb me, I request; For mamma is very tired, and fain would take a little rest.

'Tis the place, the same old place, though looking somewhat pinched and small.

Ah, 'tis many and many a day since last I looked on Locksley Hall!

Then 'twas in the spring of life and love—ah, Love, the great Has Been!

Love which, like the year's own Spring, is very nice—and very green!

In the Spring the new French fashions come the female heart to bless; In the Spring the very housemaid gets herself another dress;

In the Spring we're apt to feel like children just let loose from school; In the Spring a young girl's fancy's very apt to play the fool.

On the moorland, by the waters, he was really very nice;

There was no one else at hand, and I—forgot mamma's advice.

He indulged in rosy raptures, heaved the most suggestive sighs, Said the very prettiest things about my lips and hazel eyes.

All his talk was most poetic, all his sentiments were grand, Though his meaning, I confess, I did not always understand.

So that, when he popped the question, I did blush and hang my head, And—well, I dare say the rest was pretty much as he has said.

But I think that his abuse is really quite too awfully warm, And to make the matter public was, I must maintain, bad form.

"Puppet!" not a pretty word, and how he runs Sir Rufus down! Yet a man who's not a poet need not be a tipsy clown.

Poet! That's the point precisely. Locksley could not comprehend That a bard may be a bore e'en to his mistress in the end.

Geniuses are awful worries, full of fancies, fads, and fits, And a genius as a lover drives a girl out of her wits.

Rhapsodies and raptures always form a too exciting diet; There are moments when a maiden, though in love, would fain be quiet.Too high strung and too ecstatic was poor Locksley's normal mood, For a woman does not always want to moan and gush and brood.

Solid fare and wholesome fun, if poets only would believe, Are essentials in the life of e'en the softest slips of Eve.

Yes, he called me shallow-hearted, servile, false, and all the rest, But if he had not so plagued me—well, no doubt 'twas for the best.

True, Sir Rufus is not lively, but he lets me take my way, And I do not feel at present drawn to "sympathize with clay."

Drag me down, indeed! We move in quite the most exclusive set In the County. What is there that I should specially regret?

Locksley's famous—yes, and married, notwithstanding his fierce curse, To a dame with lots of gold and very little taste for verse.

Nice to be a Lion's Lady in Society, no doubt!

Not so nice to smooth his mane at home when Leo is put out.

Talk of tantrums! Read these lines he published after—well, the jilt, Pitching into poor mamma and charging me with nameless guilt!

Dear mamma! I thought her hard—but I'm a mother now myself, And I know what utter nonsense is the poet's scorn of pelf.

"Old and formal"—that's the way he pictures me. Extremely kind! Coz, if you could see me now, you might a little change your mind.

"False" and "cold" are bad enough, but "dowdy," that is downright rude;

Bards, for all their lofty talk, are not a gentlemanly brood.

They're extremely touchy tempers, and are very apt to say Very nasty things indeed, if they're not allowed their way.

"I have hit an angry fancy." There I really think he's right. But you see that sort of thing is not a woman's fancy, quite.

'Twas his "fancies" bothered me; and all the stuff that follows here May be splendidly poetic—I should call it simply queer.

"Airy navies, purple pilots, savage women," and the rest!

Why did he not wed a negress, if he thought he'd like it best?

Or if, as he says, he knows her words were nonsense, I would ask, Wherefore utter, pen, and print them? 'Twas a most superfluous task.

"Woman is the lesser man!" I hold that false as it is hard. The most womanish of creatures surely is an angry bard.

Yet sometimes when, as at present, Spring is brightening all the land, Comes a longing for the fields Sir Rufus can not understand;Comes a ghostly sort of doubt if e'en Society can give All, quite all, for which a well loved woman might desire to live;

Comes a memory of his voice, a recollection of his glance,

Thoughts of things which then had power to make my maiden pulses dance;

Comes—but I'm extremely stupid. Well, I know if our dear Fan Took a fancy for a poet, I should soon dismiss the man.

Here she comes! She'll wed, I hope, rich Viscount Vivian ere the fall. She ne'er had had that chance, had I espoused the Lord of Locksley Hall.

XLV.—The Ministry of Nature.

The world is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers;
Little we see in Nature that is ours;
We have given our hearts away—a sordid boon.This sea that bares her bosom to the moon,
The winds that will be howling at all hours,
And are upgathered low like sleeping flowers—
For this, for everything, we are out of tune;
It moves us not. Great God! I'd rather be
A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn,
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn—
Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea,
Or hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn.

THE DYSPEPTIC CLUB.

Interlocutors—URUS, BOTTOM, AGRICOLA, GORGEOUS, POLLIWIG, ACETES.

[The ARGONAUT gets many compliments; the approval of intelligent persons pleases and encourages us, but we have made a rule not to print in our own paper the pleasant things that are said of us. We hesitated on receipt of the following manuscript to send it to the printer, and only because the criticism is a genuine one, and about evenly balanced as to praise and censure, do we give our readers and ourselves the benefit of seeing in print what is said concerning us. If, upon reading it, our friends think no worse, and our enemies no better of us, we shall be content.]

Agricola.—Who among us takes the ARGONAUT?

All.—All of us, of course.

Bottom.—I take ten copies a week—that is just one dollar—and send them eastward to friends. I do this instead of giving anything to foreign missions.

Polliwig.—I did take the ARGONAUT, but I have stopped it on principle. It is in some respects an admirable journal. It is dignified in its mode of handling popular subjects. Some of its writings are brilliant. It is all of it respectable. It never descends to scurrilous personalities. It never turns to bite the black-and-tan terriers of the press that bark at its heels. Its stories are original; its poetry, both original and selected, is of more than average quality; its social gossip is kindly, and only of good society; its theatrical criticisms are impartial and discriminating. The ARGONAUT is seldom guilty of personal abuse, and never gushes.

Urus.—It seems to me, Polliwig, that you have made of it so good a paper that you will find it difficult to furnish a good excuse for stopping it.

Polliwig.—Not at all. My objection to the paper is that it is irreverent. I do not mean of Divine things, for except as it tears the disguises off the face of hypocrisy and unmasks the pretensions of those who "steal the livery of heaven to serve the devil in," its teachings are unobjectionable—are, in fact, elevating.

Acetes.—The London World, a journal edited, I believe, by Mr. Edmund Yates, bears at its head this declaration: "A journal for men and women." The ARGONAUT is not written for girls, nor Sunday-school children, but for those who know how to think, and who have so far emancipated themselves from prejudice as to dare to think for themselves.

Gorgeous.—In this direction it has not advanced beyond the best magazines of Europe, nor has it more than kept pace with the progress of the higher and better minds. The English reviews, and indeed the leading journals of Germany, France, and England, are all of them handling, not only religious, but all other topics, with freedom and intelligent boldness.

Polliwig.—It is not in this direction that I complain. By the word "irreverent," I mean to charge that the journal in question is inconstant. It destroys—I might better say it makes a vain and feeble effort to destroy—everything that man holds sacred in a republican government. Let me enumerate. When you come to analyze its writings, the tone of the journal is against universal elective franchise. It opposes the right of trial by jury. It is arrayed against an elective judiciary. It favors a strong government, and makes no disguise of its desire to so change the Constitution of the State as to provide for a military organization to suppress riots and disorder. It strikes a blow at the very foundation of free government in its attack upon our system of free common schools. It would abolish all laws of naturalization, and deny to foreigners the right to have their children educated in their native tongues. It is illiberal, inasmuch as it would banish all foreign flags from processions. It would drive Saint Patrick's day within the church walls.

Acetes.—And what is there in all this that every intelligent native-born and foreign citizen does not approve?

Polliwig.—Do not interrupt me; I have not concluded my indictment. The ARGONAUT is written in the interest of property. It would have a property qualification at the ballot-box, and it would have only property holders exercise any power in municipal governments over questions relating to public improvements and the collection of revenue therefor.

Acetes.—And is this all?

Polliwig.—It is a journal not for the masses, not in the interest of the masses, not in sympathy with them. It is aristocratic; favors the wealthy, the intellectual, the fashionable. It would be exclusive, and every week breathes, if not contempt, at least indifference to popular opinion.

Bottom.—Then, by heaven, I'll take fifty copies every week! I am so sick, so tired, so utterly disgusted with the time-serving, mob-slaving, cowardly, mercenary press, that an independent journal, and one, as you say, dignified in tone and not condescending to personal retort and personal abuse, must be refreshing. I have never taken the ARGONAUT, but I will do so from the next issue.

Acetes.—Let us take up Polliwig's indictment, and see whether the journal is wrong. First, is universal suffrage right? I declare that in my judgment it is a mistake, and one that is likely to be fatal to our republican form of government. Macaulay says it will destroy a republic, and will be a source of trouble to any government. All men are not equal, not born equal, not educated equally, nor endowed with equal powers. They are not upon an equal moral or social plane. Freedom of the elective franchise to the ignorant, the vicious, the alien, the African, as he is now, is a palpable wrong. I am American-born, and I hope intelligent, honest, honorable, and patriotic. I am compelled to go to the ballot-box beside some stupid and ignorant ass who can neither read nor write—a criminal and adventurer, a tramp, an alien, a man without family, property, intelligence, or ambition. His vote is as good as mine. I desire a legislator who shall make just laws, a judge who shall intelligently interpret them, an executive who shall honestly enforce them. I desire a mayor and board of supervisors who shall be judicious and honest in public expenditures, because I pay the taxes. He—this social Arab, this political Bedouin—desires no law that he may not violate, no judge that will not acquit him of offense, no executive that will not pardon, no municipal officer that will not squander the taxes he does not pay. The right of trial by jury was a sacred one in an age of oppression, of tyranny and misrule, when monarchs invoked a Divine right to trample upon the people, when barons and feudal lords wore armors of steel and gauntlets of iron; but the age is changed, and the tyrant class is now the idle, impecunious, propertyless mob, who menace with the torch and proclaim the right to destroy order as a means to the division of property. A mob is guilty of a breach of the law; one of the number is arrested for the crime; the jury is selected by lot from the men who compose the mob; the law demands the concurrence of twelve minds to find the accused guilty; the judge who presides is elected by the votes of the mob, and holding only for a term will soon again be a candidate for reelection. Can justice be administered under such conditions? The whole thing is absurd. It is a farce and it will in time become a bloody tragedy. Then a strong government will become necessary. It will be a choice then between a strong government and anarchy.

Polliwig.—As a provision against all these evils we look to our common schools. Education of the masses means their elevation. Let us give to all our children, foreign and native-born, white and colored, a good education, and we have given them intelligence to understand the advantages of good government. The ARGONAUT was against the common schools.

Agricola.—Pardon me for one word in dissent. I do not understand that it opposes the common free schools, but that it claims that they have been diverted from the original design. It complains that they are extravagant, and are being run in the interests of politicians, place-hunters, and contractors. It is over-education, the teaching of ornamental and useless branches, of which the paper complains.

Acetes.—And justly, too. The whole thing is an extravagant, overrated, sentimental humbug. Religion was a good thing until priestcraft made of it an industry out of which an idle priesthood might live. Education was a good thing, is a good thing, is indispensable. Common schools are the very foundation of republican government. They are the corner-stone, the key of the arch, the bulwark, the everything that man ought to guard, encourage, and protect. But education, like religion, may be perverted, misdirected, and abused. Schoolmasters may, like priests, be selfish and idle. Boards of education may be corrupt and extravagant; and in San Francisco the common school system has run crazy. More than a million of dollars a year! To illustrate its extravagance, let us cite one instance: A German teacher, intelligent doubtless and educated, but who speaks the English language as though his mouth were filled with hot sauerkraut, gets $223 a month, works five days in the week, has six weeks' vacation in the year, and all the legal holidays, and only works five hours in the day. He gets three dollars per hour for labor that a thousand intelligent, well-born American girls would be glad to do for one-third of the money, and would do better educational work than any German that ever lived and immigrated to America could do.

Bottom.—By Jove, Acetes, you are right! I was educated at a country school-house, by a woman teacher. She got twenty dollars a month and "boarded round." I was taught to read, write, and cipher—Webster's Spelling-book, the old English Reader, Olney's Geography, Kirkham's Grammar, and Daboll's Arithmetic. For mental arithmetic, I argued with the old gentleman for an extra allowance on holiday or a chance to go to the circus. For calisthenics we played ball in summer and snow-balled in winter. In moral philosophy I was strong in finding excuses to my own conscience for robbing orchards, cornfields, and melon patches. We took practical lessons in natural history from bee-hives and hen-roosts, and in hunting the coon, woodchuck, and gray squirrel. We botanized for strawberries and wild flowers for the girls; we developed our muscle with the bat and oar, and practised the military art by thrashing the boys of the next school district.

Agricola.—That is about my experience, and was in substance the education of the generation to which we belonged. If a boy had it in him, somehow he clambered up. I know Acetes is the graduate of a learned university; I know in summer he worked in the harvest-field, in the winter he went to school and did chores for his board. In college vacation he taught school, and in college he cooked for himself. As for me, I was a farmer's boy; had to work, and received no education beyond the common school and a few winters in the village academy.

Polliwig.—It is the sign of old age when one begins to argue the decadence of the present one. Old men are always contrasting the new generation with the past to the prejudice of the present. Old times were better; men more honest; women more virtuous; everybody more industrious, less luxurious, less extravagant.

Gorgeous.—This conversation ends where it began. Like all arguments of the kind, it determines nothing—not even whether the ARGONAUT is right or wrong, simply because it is partly right and partly wrong. There is one thing, however, to say in favor of the journal: It thinks, and that is rare; it has the boldness to express its opinions, and that is rare; it has the manliness and independence to express its convictions upon all questions, without reference to popular opinion, and that is rare. Such a journal may make mistakes, but its influence in making men think for themselves is a healthful one. It will anger classes, and that does them good. It is refreshing to have Germans, Irish, all foreigners; Catholics, Jews, all religions; Yankees, Southerners, and all Americans; Republicans, Democrats, and sand-lot loafers; lawyers, priests, and politicians, all discussed, called by their right names; to have the masks torn away from all prejudices, and the disguises removed from all hypocrisies for a free and open discussion. Narrow-minded men will get angry and, like Polliwig, stop the paper. Bigots will think their religion assailed; ignorant foreigners will chafe, while demagogues and newspaper hirelings will lie about the motives that prompt the journal's course.

Urus.—Yes, I have already observed that it is charged with being bought by the corporations; with being run in the interest of rich men; with being the organ of the moneyed aristocracy. This is natural. It is popular just now to toady to the riff-raff, to compliment the slums, to gush over the masses. Newspapers do it for fear the unwashed will stop the paper; for fear that servant girls won't advertise in it for places. Politicians and the party ground-hogs are rooting in this popular mud for the roots, and snails, and worms of office. Party leaders are afraid lest their ships shall drag their anchors by reason of the ground-swell and they be washed overboard from their decks by the combing waves of popular opinion.

Polliwig.—I see I am in the minority, but I am still unconvinced that a journal is useful to a community in which it exists, or should be sustained, simply because it has the ability and the audacity to assail all the time-honored institutions of free government, and has a financial independence that makes it indifferent to public opinion. I shall still cling to my belief in free institutions; to an unlimited elective franchise; to the right of trial by jury; to an elective judiciary; to a civil government not overawed by a standing army; to a free common school system that educates in higher branches, and to the conviction that education is the best and surest guarantee of free government, freedom of conscience and perpetuity of republican institutions.

Acetes.—Well, my dear Polliwig, to illustrate how generous a majority ought to be, we give you the last word and thus recognize your right to hold and express your own opinions, hoping you, as the representative of the unbathed masses, will accord to the ARGONAUT the same privilege.

Les Français ne se piquent guère de constance. Ils croient qu'il est aussi ridicule de jurer à une femme qu'on l'aimera toujours que de soutenir qu'on se portera toujours bien et qu'on sera toujours heureux. SATURDAY, AUGUST 24, 1878.

There will be a contest in the coming Convention over the question of taxing solvent debts. The country will be arraigned upon one side, the town upon the other—the borrowing against the lending class. The moral argument in favor of compelling him who holds an incumbrance upon lands to pay his just proportion of the tax is unanswerable. The legal question whether evidences of debt can be taxed, whether taxes can be laid upon those intangible properties that rest in promises, in privileges, in good will, is a complicated one. The courts as a rule have decided adversely to such taxation; and, so far, the lenders have triumphed over the borrowers. Should such a provision be engrafted upon the organic law (and this, by a union of the granger and the sand-lot delegates, is possible) it would imperil the new constitution before the people. Hence we suggest a compromise; one that will attain the same result and compel the wealthy, the corporate, the money-lending class, to pay their just quota of taxation. There is and ever has been an attempt upon the owners of personal property to evade taxation; not only an attempt, but a successful effort to avoid their duties, leaving the burdens of supporting government to devolve upon the owners of real property. Nearly all the corporate wealth, nearly all the money, and more than seven-tenths of the personal property of California pay no revenue to the treasury. This property is legislated for; is guarded by authority; is protected from fire; has courts established for adjudicating its contests, and pays comparatively nothing. Our suggestion is the collection of an income tax. The idea is neither new nor original. In England, which we regard as the best governed country in the world, the taxing of incomes is an established regulation of law. During war times our country tried the experiment, and though the machinery for its collection was vexatious, complicated, and inquisitorial, a large revenue was obtained. In England no especial difficulty is experienced in the working of this part of her revenue system. It has always seemed to us that an income tax was the most just and equitable of all taxes, and the one easiest to ascertain and collect. It is assuredly right that incomes above some fixed and limited amounts should be taxed. This would reach the rich, and would reach them in proportion to their ability to support the government. If the writer of this article has an income of one thousand dollars a month, and another citizen has a hundred thousand a month, then as a matter of right and justice the wealthier citizen should pay the larger tax. Incomes should be taxed, no matter whence they come. Government bonds are not taxable; but that is no reason why the holder should not pay a percentage when he cuts his coupons. Mines are not assessable because of their uncertain and fluctuating value; yet when dividends are made it is clearly right that a small percentage should find its way to the treasury. "Good-will" is not taxable, but the profits that come from the established business of mill or merchandise ought to contribute their quota to maintain government. Brains, genius, and chance are not taxable, but we know of no good reason why the income of the successful lawyer, the eloquent divine, the prosperous journal, or the successful dealer in stocks should not aid in maintaining law and social order. In a word, it seems clearly right that the money-making banker, trader, manufacturer, professional man, broker, retired gentleman, successful speculator, farmer or artisan should pay an income tax. Those who live at ease in fine houses, who indulge in luxuries, ought to pay, and pay cheerfully, for the government that protects and guards them. It is no argument against an income tax that it is unpopular. It is only unpopular to those who must pay it. It is only inquisitorial to those who criminally endeavor to evade its honest payment. It is, perhaps, unwise to devolve the assessment upon one man, and leave to his caprice the fixing of an amount. Estimates of income must vary, questions difficult of interpretation may arise, and when they do there should be a tribunal of ultimate appeal authorized in a summary way to take evidence and determine questions at issue. We contend that the principle of taxing incomes is a just one, and our wealthy men ought to recognize its justice, and aid in the passage of laws and the creation of a bureau for its enforcement.

The Protestant clergymen have met and considered and determined the duty of the coming Constitutional Convention with reference to the Christian Sabbath. They would have its observance enforced by law. The religious community is now agitating itself over the question of opening the Mechanics' Fair on Sunday. These kindred topics of discussion may be treated in one argument. Similar questions are now being considered in England. In the first place, we should say that the opinions of the religious people ought to be respected; and at the same time we must be permitted to observe that they in turn must respect the opinions of those who differ from them. We think we notice a tendency upon the part of clergymen to assume that they are governed by higher considerations of duty, by more disinterested motives, and by better impulses than those who do not profess religious beliefs. Upon no other basis than the assumption that we are as good, as intelligent, as disinterested as the class to which the clergy belong, can we enter upon this discussion of Sabbath observance. Nor will we assume that the Christian is more right or more sincere than the Jew; nor that either is any better than the man who believes in no religious dogma. We will not forget that ours is a cosmopolitan population, and that in San Francisco are citizens whose religious teachings have made them hold sacred each day in the week. We may dispose of the question of enforcing religious observance upon the Sabbath by saying that such a provision in our organic law is impossible. It is at variance with the whole spirit of our republican institutions. Any direction or enforcement by law of the Christian's Sabbath is an interference with the Jewish; any specific direction as to what the citizen shall do or abstain from doing on Sunday is utterly repugnant to the spirit of personal liberty and freedom of conscience, which ideas, more than any other, underlie our form of government. The question of opening our Mechanics' Fair on Sunday is a practical one. If harm will result, the doors of its pavilion should remain closed. If instruction, innocent recreation, harmless pleasure will follow, then the prejudices of the religious community must give way. Those who delight in the indulgence of prayer, Christian sermons, music of choir and organ on the Sabbath day, should have their legal rights and their Christian feelings respected. The non-professing citizen who delights in sight-seeing, country excursions, picnics in groves, listening to music and the playing of fountains, or promenading the public places, is equally entitled to indulgence. London is following the example of the European continent in throwing open its picture galleries, its parks and palaces of art, to the public on Sunday. It is the result of the long and deliberate consideration of the most highly cultivated and liberal minds of England. The leading clergymen of the established church have given their sanction. The Queen and royal family have not withheld their countenance from the indulgence of innocent Sabbath amusements. The intelligence of the age is drifting in the direction of extreme liberality, and the strict, iron-clad sabbatarian observances are giving way to a more generous and sensible interpretation. Religion can no longer rest on law, superstition, or tradition. It must step forth into the arena of public debate; into the full, clear light of reason. It must meet science, philosophy, history, upon equal terms. If its armor is tempered by the Divine hand, if its blade is of keener metal than that wrought by human intelligence, it will hold the advantage of an unequal conflict. If it is but an institution of man, a human industry, it must take its place among other institutions, and, standing upon the same plane, be entitled to the equal protection of the same laws.

Our views upon the common schools are misunderstood by some and misrepresented by others. This is our position: We are in favor of providing schools, books, and teachers for all poor children at the public expense—educating them in the rudimentary branches of the English language, and none other. It is stealing to educate the children of the rich at the expense of tax-payers. It is a mistake to educate children beyond their position in life. It is unpatriotic to teach any other language in an American free school than the English. To read, write, spell, and cipher up to the "rule of three," is a good foundation for any boy or girl that expects to work for a living, and we do not recognize any obligation of organized society to so educate its youth that they will not work. If rich people desire to give their children great learning, let them pay for it by sending them to private schools. The free common schools that we would have should graduate all their pupils at fourteen years of age. Teachers should be women. The boy or girl who, by his or her own exertion, could prepare for a higher education we would aid through the State University. We would thus in San Francisco make a practical saving to the tax-payer of nearly a million of dollars, and, what is better, we would thus turn thousands of half-educated, over-stuffed dunces into honest working men and women. Our whole common free school system has departed from its original scope and purpose—or, rather, it has been diverted by demagogues, politicians, jobbers, and place-hunters from its original design, which was, as we have defined it, to educate poor children in the elementary branches of an English education, to teach them their letters, to spell, to read, to write, a little geography, and a little history. The whole system of free common school education as now conducted is a sham and a fraud. An able article in the Scientific American, considering the question of education in the common schools, says: "There is an effort being made to establish compulsory education; but what is the child to be taught? As if in league with the false theories of the rights of labor, these efforts take the apprentices from the shops, force them away from where they would learn something, and confine them inside a school-house to learn—what? Certainly nothing of the materials, or tools, or pursuits by which they are to obtain their livelihood. The child knows nothing of when or by whom the compass was discovered, the printing press, the use of powder, electricity, or steam, or of any one of the thousand mechanical operations now controlling every department of life. Does any school-boy know how many kingdoms there are in the natural world, or whether an animal, a vegetable, and a mineral all belong to the same or to different ones? Will he know that from instinct the young of animals seeks its food and expands its lungs, as by the same instinct the root of a seed sucks up its nourishment from the soil and sends its leaves up to breathe the air? Will he know anything of the nature of the soils or the plants that grow in them? Will our present system teach the boy anything of the iron furnace, the foundry, or rolling-mill, or the uses or handling of any of their products? Will it teach him anything of woods and their value, or for what and how they are useful to man? Will this knowledge, for which the powers of the State are to be required to force him to know it—will it teach him anything of the nature or uses of metals, of metal working, or the business depending upon them? Will it teach him anything of gold or silver, copper or brass? Anything of pottery, of bone, ivory, celluloid, etc.? Will he learn anything of hides, leather, or the production of these necessary articles? Will he know whether the word textile applies to anything but a spider's web or the wing of a butterfly? Whether the United States make, import, or grow cotton, wool, silk, flax and hemp? Will he know anything of commerce, railroads, telegraphs, printing, and the great number of clerk labors in the larger towns? Will he have learned a single thing which will assist him in his work of life?" If it were the duty of government—at the expense of tax-payers—to manufacture lawyers, preachers, doctors, editors, politicians, bankers, merchants, and stock gamblers, and if society could not exist without these classes, and if mechanics, artisans, sailors, miners, farmers, and working men were dangerous classes, then we should say that our free school system was a success. In all the under-ground mines of California and Nevada, there are not one hundred boys learning the trade of mining. There are not five boys born in California who have gone to sea before the mast for a livelihood. The number of apprentices to all the heavier trades is diminishing year by year, and it is an alarming fact that our boys are growing up in comparative idleness and uselessness. If it were not that a foreign immigration was providing us with both skilled and unskilled labor, our American industries would come to a dead halt.

The position taken by the Archbishop in reference to the attendance by Catholic children of our unsectarian free schools seems to us to be entirely appropriate. If a religious education is of higher importance than a secular one, if the salvation of the soul is to be imperiled by a neglect of Christian teaching, then clearly it is the duty of the Christian pastor to warn those under his religious care not to imperil the future of their children by exposing them to the influence of a system of education conspicuous for its absence of religious and moral training. To punish the contumacious parent by withholding from him the church sacrament as a penalty for his disregard of the counsels of the church seems to us also to be highly logical and proper. We sincerely hope the Catholic population will at once give heed to the advice of the Archbishop and withdraw their children from the public schools. We are not advised whether, as a logical sequence, it will become necessary for all the Catholic members of the Board of Education, the Catholic school teachers, janitors, and other employes of the department, to hand in their resignations and withdraw themselves from the public service or not, but we presume they will do so as a matter of conscience and good taste. This we shall regret, as the school department will feel the loss of some most efficient and excellent teachers; but surely if it is wicked to be taught in an unsectarian school it is also wicked to teach. There is some slight compensation in this matter. We almost hesitate to mention it, lest it should seem trivial and worldly. This withdrawal of Catholic pupils would save to our tax-payers about four hundred thousand dollars annually, would break up the cosmopolitan schools, and give some of our boys and girls an opportunity to escape the over-cramming of a false educational system.

AFTERMATH.

When Mr. Troy Dye and his deputy public administrators shall stand upon the gallows for their crime of murder, we wonder what particular priest or parson of Sacramento will stand by their side with assurances that they are forgiven of their sins; that their souls, crimson with the blood of their fellow-man, are made white as snow by the mummeries of sanctimonious clerical administrations. We wonder how long this farce of snatching the souls of murderers from their well-earned perdition is to be played in our new jail-yards, and around the scaffold that society has erected for the expiation of the crime of murder. There has been no instance in California, except where the murderer has gone defiantly to his death, that some saintly man of God has not stood by his side and given the world assurance that he drops from the scaffold directly into the arms of a loving Saviour, who purifies his sins and bears him up on angel wings to join the redeemed and glorified throng who are for all eternity to chant beatific songs before the great white throne of God.

Once in San Francisco a wife sat eating her dinner in a restaurant. Her husband came behind her, and seizing a knife, cut her throat. She died. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death, and on the scaffold, with his "spiritual adviser" by his side, proclaimed his ineffable happiness, that he was about to join the angel choir. His only regret was that there among the blessed he would not meet his poor wife, who, having been cut off in her sins, had no time for repentance. And the preacher stood by, and did not even offer to kick him as the Sheriff sprung the trap. In fact it was the preacher that stuffed him with this insolence of affected contrition, and sent him into eternity with this vile sentiment of hypocrisy in his heart and on his lips. We sincerely hope that there will be no serious effort made to enable these Sacramento murderers to attain the heaven which all good editors are so earnestly striving to reach.

In the event of a war between Austria and the United States of America what side would that company of Jaegers take, who, by the bounty of the Austrian Emperor, are clad in the uniform of Austria, and march under the flag of the double-headed eagle? If it fought against the Emperor, whose allegiance its members have sworn, would it not be liable to assault by mistake from the rear if, in its patriotic ardor, it got too far advanced on the battle field?

We have lost confidence in Jim McCue as a warrior altogether. His campaign against the Mongolians of Marin was a disastrous fiasco. We have studied the lives of Marlborough, Napoleon, Wellington, Von Moltke, and General Grant, and we fail to note any instance where they proclaimed and printed in advance their determination to attack the enemy. This kind of strategy is a new development in the art of war. It looks as if the train bands of the sand-lots had developed prudence at the sacrifice of valor.

In the village of San Rafael there is a bar at the Tamalpais Hotel elegantly carved from walnut. It is an exquisite work of art, and cost $8,000. There is not a church or school house in the county of Marin worth half the money.

In the long list of eminent Massachusetts defaulters—Pond, Chace, Hathaway, Winslow, Sibley, Wright, Jackson, Tappan—the Boston Herald fails to discover the name of any "unnaturalized foreigner," or "ignorant Irish Catholic." Of course, the "foreign element" has not an ascension power equal to that of Jonah's gourd; it can not step to the top of the profession in a day. Look lower down—in politics.

We boast a good deal of our temperate climate, but probably no created thing has so keen a sense of the meaning of "love's labor lost" as the Sacramento Valley sitting hen that has stopped shading her eggs long enough to catch an overdone worm.

We are always talking about the sanitary advantages of a rain to "flush the sewers." According to Dr. Meares, the Health Officer, "a single rain-storm would make a water-trap of the sewer catch-basins, and force the foul gases into the houses, and the death rate would be greatly increased." Dr. Meares is an iconoclast; he destroys our touching faith in "flushing the sewers," and gives us no other touching faith to take its place. He tears down, but he does not rebuild better. What better is he than an infidel?

When Troy Dye canvassed the county of Sacramento for the office of Public Administrator he promised to kill all the wealthy bachelors with a view to increase the emoluments of his office. Kearney demands, under the penalty of hemp, that every candidate shall faithfully adhere to his promises—faithfully keep his pledges. Dye kept his promise, and now after killing only one or two men the community threatens to hang him for his fidelity to principle. What an inconsistent and fickle thing is public opinion at Sacramento!

Jones, coming down Ellis Street, meets Brown, who says: "Mornin'—been to see Sullivan? How is he?" "At his last gasp, poor fellow! Says he has something on his mind, too, and is anxious to confess and be absolved." "So you are going for the priest?" "Priest be banged!" ejaculates the worldling, "I am going for the reporter of a daily newspaper." "Ah! it has come to that; but, I say, Jones, the reporter is well enough, may be, for the confession; but how about the absolution?" "True; I shall have to send the editor, too."

Sadrake, a member of the Stock Exchange, has a wife of great personal attractions, and the report is current that he finds these advantages not unprofitable in the way of obtaining, through her, "points" from the great operators. A friend finally feels constrained to mention the current slander to him, in order that he may resent it. He is furious. "What! Do the rascals believe I would subject my wife to such an indignity, and place her in so humiliating a position? Why, what the devil do they think I'm supporting Clara Dash for?"

A very touching bit of obituary verse in the Bulletin concludes thus:

"All who have shared his friendship,
Or been cheered by him from despair,
Know that Heaven will guide them on this earth
While John McCaffery is there."

Should there be any more attempts in Heaven to withdraw the divine guidance from John McCaffery's friends, there will evidently be trouble.

According to the last official reports, the almshouse has four hundred and sixty-five inmates, of whom one hundred and twenty-seven are enjoying medical treatment. There is nothing like poverty to make a fellow "just sick."

Five or six years ago a dear friend of ours made a straight steal of ten thousand dollars from the Government, and at once invested it in land. Having recently "experienced religion," he is now anxious to make restitution. There are legal difficulties in the way of conveying the land to the Government, and it could not now be sold for more than the half of what he gave for it. He has no other property. Shall he sell the land for, say, five thousand dollars, restore that amount to the Government, and probably never be able to pay the balance; or shall he wait a few years—meanwhile unprepared to die—until there shall have been a healthy expansion in real estate values that will enable him to discharge his conscience of the entire debt, and, perhaps, have something for himself? We shall be happy to have the sense of the clergy on this matter, and will engage to urge it upon our friend for his guidance in what seems a rather trying position.

We observe that the Probate Court of Sacramento has decided not to grant the petition of Mr. Troy Dye for letters of administration on the Tullis estate. If the questionable official methods with which that gentleman stands charged shall be proved against him, this action of the court will, no doubt, receive the sanction of public opinion. In the meantime the withholding of the letters must be regarded as the exercise of a wise discretion. It may turn out that in murdering Mr. Tullis the Public Administrator had another and a better motive than the desire to increase his own official emoluments; in that case it will be easy enough for him to make a new application to the court for the authority now denied him. If, however, it should appear that such was his motive, it is to be hoped that he will not only not be permitted to reap the advantages of his sordid action in the matter, but that the sovereign people of Sacramento may retire him permanently to private life.

Mr. Dye has now resigned the office of Public Administrator, pending the examination of the charges affecting his fitness to hold the office. This is commendable; it evinces a decent and proper respect to public opinion, and a willing spirit to abide by its decision, whatever that may eventually be. But the public has duties as well as rights, and in case it appears—as above intimated—that Mr. Dye's action in murdering Mr. Tullis was taken without reference to the fees of office (was, for example, based upon grounds of private animosity, or the fatigue of seeing Mr. Tullis constantly about) it is not unreasonable to expect that the next local nominating convention of Mr. Dye's party will put his name again upon the ticket for a better office than that in the conduct of which he has been subjected to so much annoyance. There are, also, several considerations pointing to the wisdom of somewhat increasing the remuneration of Sacramento officials, and making them less dependent on personal energies that are likely to take a direction unpleasant to their constituents and not altogether conducive to the public good.

Gentlemen of the press indulging in articles of personal abuse against the ARGONAUT or its editors will oblige us by sending their respective journals marked "personal." It not unfrequently happens that we fail to see some of the most scurrilous and indecent of them. This we regret, as we are making a scrap-book for our own amusement and for recreation when we retire from our connection with the newspaper business.

It is a curious fact that seven-tenths of the people of San Francisco do not know that there is such a county as Marin. Illustrating the truth of this statement, we give the following incident: On Saturday afternoon of last week James G. Fair, Governor Pacheco, and Messrs. Coleman and Wells left San Francisco in the afternoon for a hunt upon the slopes of Mount Tamalpais. In two hours from leaving the wharf they were in a most wild region, the haunt of bear and deer. They hunted Saturday evening, Sunday, and Monday morning, camping at night, and all the time within sight of San Francisco. At ten o'clock on Monday morning they came to the Tamalpais Hotel, in the village of San Rafael, with three cinnamon bears and two splendid bucks, having seen a score of does and fawns which they did not fire upon.

It looks as though General Grant would be the next candidate of the Republican party for the presidential office. It looks as though the great Democratic party had been murdered by the foreign snakes it has nurtured in its bosom. It looks as though Ben Butler might be the candidate of a very formidable labor organization—strong enough to contest the presidential office. It looks as though the National Greenback party might sweep the republic in opposition to national banks and corporations and in favor of paper money. It looks as though the third election of General Grant might be the beginning of a new departure, and that there might follow a strong military government under which the people would become familiar with the idea of a standing army.

Once when the plague was raging in Paris, when death was sending its shafts on every side, when the people in horror and despair knew not what to do, and the grave stood yawning for all, some profound philosopher or some desperate wag suggested the inauguration of a carnival—a procession of masks and jugglers, Columbine and Pantaloon—a dance of death. All Paris turned out in its gayest colors, in its most festive mood. The grim monster with his skeleton form, pale face, and long arm, was satirized, laughed at, and derided. Gay Parisians scoffed and jeered at him, and made mouths and jokes, sang ribald songs and danced. The result was the plague abated, and death shrank away abashed and hid himself like the coward that he always is. Our hard times in San Francisco are only an epidemic of the imagination, and will not abate so long as our business men go about the streets as mourners. Such coward faces, such despondent tones, such lugubrious, melancholy, dolorous airs as our business men put on are something marvelous. If our owners of real estate, our merchants, mechanics, and business men would stop gambling in stocks, look jolly, get up a carnival, swear that everything looked encouraging, and put on a stiff upper lip, we could restore affairs to a more prosperous condition. There is a great deal of philosophy in whistling through a grave yard.

A correspondent suggests that having visited and inspected the Chinese quarter in company with the Board of Health, the Workingmen's Committee visit, also, the "poor Irish quarter." There is no such distinct division of the city; and if there were, the Committee would be at home in it.

If "The Only Jones" does not send for some of the many polite invitations received for him at this office, we shall pretty soon begin to bestow them upon the ugliest dunces of our acquaintance (and we have many exceedingly ill-favored ones) who will, of course, "present them at the door" for the purpose of enjoying a brief and fitful notoriety at his expense. We observe that the cards sent for him are all conspicuously marked "not transferable," but we don't seem to be afraid, somehow. Who is to know?

Speaking of obituary poetry, it is no less than astonishing what a lot of it has been run off on the subject of the death of Montague, the actor; our exchanges are horrible with it. Of it all there have been but four good lines, and those we published ourselves. Next in order of merit are those of Puck:

"Died in the very blossoming of life,
When all must praise the flower that might have been;
He will never know how poor a thing to win
Is the success that crowns—with rue—our strife."

The worst are those sent to the theatrical reporter of a local morning journal by "a friend." He may be a friend, but it was not a friendly act, for the reporter absently printed them, and the public perversely insists on thinking them his own.

The Nevada Bank has something more than $20,000,000 of money invested in government bonds; the Hibernia Bank of Savings has $2,000,000. How many other California millions are thus rolled up in the napkin of the federal debt we do not know. We wish it were otherwise, and that the twenty-five or thirty millions of Pacific Coast accumulations could be distributed among our various industries and enterprises. The current rate of interest upon commercial paper at our banks is twelve per cent. per annum. Time loans upon mortgage average eight per cent. per annum. Thirty millions of money invested here at five per cent. would give a new impulse to all our industries. The effect of the other kind of investment is the same as that of Ireland.

MY SECRET.

In the deep red heart of a queenly rose
I breathed my secret with many a sigh;
The velvet petals with dewdrops shone,
But they only nodded royally.

Then I whispered low to a zephyr light:
"I love my love, but she loves not me."
But the balmy breeze with odors sweet
Swept softly onward to reach the sea.

I cried to a bird on a waving bough:
"Know you my love?" In a trilling tone
He chirped and chattered: "I seek my mate,"
And left me once more sadly alone.

Then I caught the strain of a glorious song,
And I gave my secret to music's sway;
But the strain grew sad and the measure wild,
And died in the twilight dim away.

It rose on the wings of my evening prayer,
As I lowly knelt in the sunset's glow;
Did the angels whisper the answer back,
"O fearful heart, go tell her so?"

Then I kissed it down on her ripe red lips,
I looked in the depth of her smiling eyes,
And I clasped her close with a strong true arm,
While my glad heart laughed in its sweet surprise.

O rose and bird! O breeze and song!
I care no more that ye scornful be;
My soul is full of all calm content—
I love my love and my love loves me.

The Country School-ma'am.

Where the ferns bend low in the closes,
Where the pines nod slow on the hill,
Where the wild bee lazily dozes,
Where even the birds are still,

She saunters alone—say I truly?—
Through dreamy Sevastopol;
Behind are the pupils unruly,
Afar is the village school.

One wonders if day-dreams flutter
The depths of her shy disdain;
One wonders if black doubts mutter
Their threats of impending pain.

Perhaps as she brushes the beauty
Thrilling earth, air, and sky,
Her thoughts are at war with duty—
Are weaving for life a lie.

Perhaps she is envying others
Their red-lettered hours of play—
Luxury's sisters and brothers,
Mid Vanity's holiday.

Vet why this folly of guessing?
And why should one even care?
We see the sunlight caressing
A woman that's passing fair;

And we know that we and our wonder,
No matter how real it seem,
Shall be less than unechoed thunder
In the labyrinth of a dream

To the woman who walks in the far light
Home from the village school,
While the daylight waits for the starlight
In dreamy Sevastopol.

In an Album.

You ask a song, your pleasant leaves
With simple faith and patience bring;
You think the world is full of singing;
You think the poet somehow weaves
Blue sky from cloud, and sun from rain;
You half believe his fields of grain
Are always full of golden sheaves.
Would it were so! Yet much is ours:
All depths of woodland, wealth of flowers,
All songs the elder ones have sung,
All passion down the ages flung,
All love, all hate of wrong, all scorn,
Were gifts of ours when earth was born.
But yet we may not choose the hour
In which to flush with song's sweet flower.
We are as chalcids of light
Upheld by blossoms in the night
To gather in the blessed dew;
But if the clouds fold overhead
Our little cups must go unfed
And wait till shy stars twinkle through.

Insufficiency.

O that some poet, with awed lips on fire
Of far, ineffable altars, would arise,
And with his consecrated songs baptize
Our souls in harmony, that we might acquire Insight into the essential heart of life,
Beating with rhythmic pulses. There is lost,
In the gross echoes of our brawling strife,
Music more rare than that which did accost
Shakespeare's imagination when it swept Nearest the infinite. Our spirits are
All out of tune. Our discords intercept
The strains which, like the singing of a star,
Stream downward from the holies to attest
Beyond our jarring restlessness, rest.

A Lost Love.

She sleepeth there, forever there,
Within that field of graves,
Nor may she know of tears that flow,
Of grief that idly raves.

The long ago, the long ago,
Wakes in his heart and brain,
But wasted time and love's lost rhyme
No grief restores again.

The yesterdays that seem so near
Are distant as the sky;
Who casts away love's treasure dear,
Who fails his own heart's voice to hear,
In vain for them must sigh.

EXTRACTS FROM MY DIARY.--IV.

By an Early Californian.

May, 1848.—Gold is sold for $9 the ounce; for silver dollars, and very few of these in circulation. It is found so easily, and in such quantities that the miners seem anxious to exchange it for all kinds of commodities, and many are fearful of its depreciation. I heard of a man in camp who, being out of tobacco, and seeing a Californian prepare a cigarrito asked him what he would take for it. "Una onza!" He deliberately paid out the gold, and soon turned into smoke what would have brought him $16 in Mexico. Talk of the luxury of Rome! Does not this equal the drinking of dissolved pearls? At Benicia is a country store much patronized by launch hands and from Sacramento, principally for drinks. The gold scales are rounded playing cards, attached with cotton cords to a wooden beam. The wooden beam is held up by another cotton cord somewhere near the centre. And the weights are little junks of lead cut to suit—no one objects. The dust is scattered carelessly, and the earth under the shanty will become a small mine at no distant day. I have seen sailors take pinches of gold dust from their waistcoat pockets, and when in stress turn them inside out, and shake them upon the counter. The experiences of the B.'s, my Russian acquaintances of Santa Cruz, have been remarkable. B., his wife, son, and an Indian servant started for the mines in an ox-wagon, the solid wheels of which had become oval from long use and abuse. Many stores, clothes, etc., for camping and trading went with them. They traveled very slowly, and after many accidents reached a small river near the diggings they were in search of. And for a long time there they stuck—they were in the water, and the old wheels seemed to "have the brakes on," and would turn neither forward nor backward. The Indian was sent for help, and fortunately fell in with a tribe whose village was close at hand. The chief and his working men soon landed the ox-team and its cargo safe and sound on the other bank of the river, and received for his services one of B.'s calico shirts; of value inestimable as it proved. For the next morning bright and early the appreciative savage put into the astonished Russian's hand a bag which contained twenty ounces of dust. This was too much for the Señora, who rummaged her trunk, and took from it a cherry satin dress which had seen its best days, but was still good for many a fandango and siesta, and presented it to the chief for his royal consort. He made tracks for home, but was not very long in reappearing with another and much larger present of the precious dust. In a word their old traps brought them in nearly $900. Was not this doing a very large business on a very small capital? But there is no end to the stories that are told as to the acquisition and profuse expenditure of gold. At present we seem cut off from the rest of the world, having a superabundance of the precious metal, but being unable with it to pay wages or buy food, or even to pay duties to the custom house authorities (military). However, they receive it at $12 per ounce, to be sold at auction a few months hence. There are very few scales in the country, and you would be amused to see what kind of crockery is used for gold jars. I don't know how better to describe the state of feeling among the workmen about us, than to say that I remonstrated with one of them for squandering his store. "Why sir," he answered, "what difference does it make? I know a spot where I can go and get just as much as I want." They seem to think it inexhaustible, the quantity indeed so enormous that it must fall in price, and that they should enjoy it while they may.

June 1, 1848.—The gold discovery has been serious in its effects. Farmers have left their ranches, mechanics their benches, seamen their vessels, and even traders their stores, to dig gold. The average amount collected per man is said to be from $15 to $20; some have collected $50 and $100 a day. Men are offered from $8 to $25 a day to work, cook, etc., for the miners. The old towns will hereafter be occupied only by wholesale merchants, and new ones will rise in the Sacramento country. Over fifty volunteers have deserted from their command, and our town from being the noisiest and busiest of places has become the quietest and laziest. I will give you an account of a delightful trip of a fortnight's duration from which I have lately returned. I left San Francisco on one of our summer afternoons—that means a northwester blowing a perfect hurricane—and reached Saucelito before dark. I found Captain and Mrs. — at home; also Doña, whom Commander Wilkes, I understand, called the belle of California. She is good-looking, quite reserved, and much esteemed for her uprightness, I hear. Her sweetheart was shot in a brutal manner by the bear party under Fremont, which accounts for the proud, sad manner with which she receives Americans. As she is engaged again to be married she is not altogether disconsolate. As Señora — is a M—, and a sister of S—'s intended, they were all very polite to me. As the Señora's family are blue blooded gente de razon, reading and writing and accomplished as the world goes here, I had an evidence of her aristocratic feeling when I remarked that I believed both her brother and her sister were to be married at the same time. "No," said she, "not on the same day, for the N—'s, one of whom my brother marries, are strangers to us; we do not know them." The Captain owns nine leagues on this important point, and they are most mountainous ones. Large herds of cattle appear to be feeding over them, but he seemed to have few horses. There are beautiful large trees near his house, and a stream or brook runs by it. His garden is well supplied with vegetables and fruit, and wild strawberries abound outside of it. I left the —'s next morning quite early, and after a two hours ride dismounted again at Don Timoteo's, in the Mission of San Rafael. After breakfasting with him I told him that I came to borrow or hire a horse and a vaquero for Bodega, which place, fifty miles distant, I was anxious to reach that night. He seemed distressed at his inability to accommodate me, as his horses were away, but he said he would ride with me to the Gallinas rancho, where, he thought, a Mr. Miller would help me. As it was on the road, I followed his advice, and succeeded in obtaining horses and a vaquero, valuable to me because he was most willing to speak the King's English, which I still prefer to the Academy's Spanish. The country through which we now passed varied a great deal, part of it was very fertile and part almost a desert, reminding me of the moor where Hobbie Elliot first met the Black Dwarf. The old witch and her geese are plainly discernable near the Three Rocks—a half way mark on the road. We passed but three hours before we drew up in front of Captain Smith's at Bodega. Although it was ten o'clock, they had not all retired. I was welcomed by his brother-in-law—whom I knew—and his mother-in-law, who very kindly insisted upon having a good supper prepared for me, even at that late hour. It was eight o'clock before I was up the next morning. On entering the breakfast-room I found the good lady who would not let me go supperless to bed the night before, her graceful blue-eyed daughter, some children, and my old friend Captain Smith, who welcomed me heartily to Bodega. He introduced me to the fair lady with blue eyes as his wife. I heard afterward that he had been three times married; that the present wife was from near Payta, and that she is only twenty years of age. Her manners were refined and agreeable. Captain Smith is from Baltimore, and has for years sailed for and been connected with the house of Alsop. He purchased the buildings at Bodega from the Russians, and has added to them a grist and saw mill which he runs by steam. He calls the place New Baltimore. My business here was partly to see Mr. —, supercargo and indeed owner of the brig Sabine, consigned to us and now loading with lumber for the leeward ports. He came in shortly after breakfast, and was much surprised to meet me here. In the afternoon I rode down to the port of Bodega, where the Sabine was lying, and also to see a horse which Señor Castro was anxious to sell me, Don Manuel, who by the way is —'s intended, accompanying me. I understood that the horse was perfectly black, a rara avis in this land; I found him to be a very dark brown. Another horse, belonging to my companion, so took my eye that he ordered him to be saddled. I was about mounting, when he advised me to let the vaquero exercise him for a few moments, as he had not been under the saddle for a long time. It was well I did so, for the Indian was barely seated before he, the saddle, blankets, and all were flying in the air. After looking at the seals a while, as they basked contentedly in the sun, and in very great numbers, we returned to Captain Smith's, concluding that it was too late to visit the brig, which we saw half a mile off in the distance. A party of other hunters, commanded by a very intelligent man named Sparks, who has accumulated a fortune in the business, arrived at Bodega next morning. One of them, McCoy by name, came up to the house to pay Mrs. — a visit, as he owed his life to her two years ago. One day while hunting he came upon a grizzly bear, and shot at without killing her; she limped up to him before he was able to reload, and struck at his head; he dodged her paw, which fell upon his chest, tearing much of the flesh from it; and, bracing himself, gave her the butt end of his rifle with all his strength. She caught it in her mouth, breaking it as she would a reed, and with her claws took off the calf of his left leg. He fell upon the ground, when she seized his stomach with her teeth and carried him a short distance; when, probably supposing he was dead, she dropped him and walked away, turning every few steps to see if he moved. He remained all night where she left him; but was found the next morning by some Indians, who made a litter with the branches of trees and carried him to Captain Smith's, where every one supposed he would die in a few hours. Mrs. —, however, knowing the healing qualities of certain herbs, had them collected, and treated her patient with so much skill that in six months he could walk about again. McCoy is a tall, fine-looking man; no one to look at him could imagine the injuries he received. The old lady was delighted to see him, and nothing can exceed the strength of his attachment for her. After partaking of a delicious milk punch I was forced to leave my new friends, who supplied me with a vaquero and horses for the journey to Sonoma, forty-five miles distant. Since my arrival I have seen nothing which so much reminded me of my native land as Bodega with its fences, its white-washed buildings, its comforts, and its agreeable and intelligent possessors. Our road was mountainous. When we had wound our way to the summit of what seemed the highest hill, the beautiful Valley of Santa Rosa was suddenly spread out before us. I was much tempted to pass through it on our way, but the road was longer, and I should have been forced to trespass on the hospitality of Señora Carillo who, it is said, affections not our countrymen. One of her daughters is married to General Vallejo I know. Two beautiful ones are still at home with her. After losing sight of the Valley of Santa Rosa we descended into that of Petaluma, where is the casa grande, still unfinished, of the General, which, it is said, he intends to occupy at no late day, although it appears to be going to ruin already. It was evening when we crossed the Plaza of Sonoma. As I intended to leave it by daybreak I preferred to put up at a tavern lately opened by a former French cook of ours rather than accept hospitality of friends. Monsieur Tout de Suite, as we call him, accommodated me but poorly, although both himself and his fleas paid me particular attention. I found that Sonoma was almost deserted, many families having already left for the mines, and the balance (of the Americans) intending to be on their march during the week. As I could not leave as early as I anticipated I rode out to visit my Russian friends, and on the way met an acquaintance named —, who, hearing that I was intending to go to Sacramento, offered me the use of his horses as he had enough for both. I had thought of going to Benicia, a little out of the way, for our own cavalcade and vaquero, but gladly accepted his offer and company for the journey. Don — had gone to the mines, leaving his wife alone, and so sad that she was wishing her husband would sell the place and take her back to Sitka. Here are two of the most entertaining people in the world burying themselves in an out-of-the-way place where all is contrary to their tastes, and living without associates and almost without acquaintance. He is one of the most agreeable performers on the piano I have ever met, and they are both so entertaining and so amiable that no party in San Francisco is now complete without them. I have thought that he might be a Pole. His wife, I suppose, was born in Sitka. On my return to town I called at Mr. Lié's and at General Vallejo's, whose eldest daughter came into the room while I was there; she is very handsome and will create a sensation in Washington, where he intends to take his family before long. He treated me to some very good whisky from a distillery he has erected in the neighborhood. He has great enterprise, besides his twenty-two leagues of land and 20,000 head of cattle.

INTAGLIOS.

A Dream.

I dreamed I had a plot of ground,
Once when I chanced to sleep to drop,
And that a green hedge fenced it round,
Cloudy with roses at the top.

I saw a hundred mornings rise—
So far a little dream may reach—
And spring with summer in her eyes
Making the chiefest charm of each.

A thousand vines were climbing o'er
The hedge, I thought, but as I tried
To pull them down forevermore
The flowers dropt off the other side!

Waking, I said these things are signs
Sent to instruct us that 'tis ours
Duly to keep and dress our vines,
Waiting in patience for the flowers.

And when the angel feared of all
Across my hearth its shadow spread,
The rose that climbed my garden wall
Has bloomed the other side I said.

The Mystery of Life.

Life! I know not what thou art,
But know that thou and I must part;
And when, or how, or where we meet,
I own to me's a secret yet.

Life! we've been long together
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather:
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear—
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not good night—but in some brighter clime
Bid me good morning.

BARBAULD.

A Remonstrance.

Oh, how canst thou renounce the boundless store
Of charms that nature to her votaries yields,
The echoing woodland, the resounding shore,
All the wild harmonies of woods and fields,
All that the genial ray of morning yields,
And all that eddies to the breath of even,
All that the mountain's sheltering bosom shields,
And all the dread magnificence of heaven—
Ob, how canst thou renounce, and hope to be forgiven?

BEATTIE.

In the Church-Yard at Tarrytown.

Here lies the gentle humorist, who died
In the bright Indian summer of his fame!
A simple stone, with but a date and name,
Marks his secluded resting-place beside
The river that he loved and gloried in,
Here in the autumn of his days he came,
But the dry leaves of life were all aflame
With tints that brightened and were multiplied.
How sweet a life was his; how sweet a death!
Living, to wing with mirth the weary hours,
Or with romantic tales the heart to cheer;
Dying, to leave a memory like the breath
Of summers full of sunshine and of showers,
A grief and gladness in the atmosphere.

LONGFELLOW.

Heart's Content.

There is an isle far over troublous seas,
Above whose valleys bluest skies are bent,
Where sweetest flowers perfume the pleasant leas,
Men call it Heart's Content.

And every word that rides the sea of life
Toward that dear, distant isle is turned for aye,
Through treacherous calms and stormy shoals of strife
Holding its doubtful way.

Oft in the midmost ocean bark meets bark
And, as they pass, from each the challenge sent Carries back the same across the waters dark:
"We steer for Heart's Content."

For many an isle there is so like, so like
The mystic goal of all that travail seek,
That oft the wave-worn keels on strange sands strike,
And find an alien shore.

But ever as the anchor drops, and sails
From off the storm-strained yards are all unbent,
From the tall mast-yard still the watcher hails:
"Lo! yonder!—Heart's Content!"

And so once more the prow is seaward set,
Hearts still hope on, though waves roll dark around,
And on the stern men write the name "Regret,"
And fare forth, outward bound.

BARTON GREY.

In the Wood.

In the wood where shadows are deepest
From the branches overhead,
Where the wild wood-strawberries cluster,
And the softest moss is spread,
I met to-day with a fairy,
And I followed where she led.

Some magical words she uttered,
I alone could understand,
For the sky grew bluer and brighter;
While there rose on either hand
The cloudy walls of a palace
That was built in fairy land.

And I stood in a strange enchantment;
I had known it all before:
In my heart of hearts was the magic
Of days that will come no more,
The magic of joy departed
That Time can never restore.

That never, ah, never, never,
Never again can be,
Shall I tell you what powerful fairy
Built up this palace for me?
It was only a little white Violet
I found at the root of a tree.

ADELAIDE ANNE PROCTOR.

Two Moods.

All yesterday you were so near to me,
It seemed as if I hardly moved or spoke
But your heart moved with mine. I woke
To a new life that found me everywhere,
As if your love was as some wide-spread sea
Or as the sunlit air, and so encompassed me,
Whether I thought or not, it could not but be there.

To-day your words approve me, and your heart
Is mine as ever; yet that heavenly sense
Of oneness, that made every hour intense
With love's full perfectness, is gone from thence;
And though our hands are clasped our souls are two,
And in my thoughts I say, "This is myself—this you."

There is a tradition in the East that one of the tests by which the Queen of Sheba tried to prove the wisdom of Solomon was by placing on a table before him two bouquets, one of natural, the other of artificial flowers, and requiring that he should distinguish the one from the other; whereupon the wisest man ordered the windows to be thrown open, and in came the bees.

Whenever young ladies learn so to stick a pin in their apron-string that it won't scratch a fellow's wrist, there will be more marriages.

STELLA BONHEUR.

The brilliant seasons of Italian opera at Maguire's Academy of Music, on Pine Street, in May, and in July and August, 1867, will be remembered by many of our readers. Stella Bonheur, the contralto of the season, was almost a debutante, having had, we believe, no operatic experience in New York, and having sung but little in concerts. Her success in San Francisco was immediate and great, from her debut, May 10, 1867, until her departure for New York, January 30, 1868. During this period she personated "Maffio Orsini," "Azucena," "Adalgisa," "Ulrica," and "Oscar" (Un Ballo), "Leonora" (La Favorita), "Nidia" (in Ione, then first produced here), "Siebel," "Inez" (in L'Africaine, then first produced here), "La Comare" (Crispino), "Maria" (La Figlia del Reggimento), and "Il Contino" (in Scaramuccia, then first produced here). All but the last two of these personations were during the regular season, with Brambilla, Limberti, Mancusi, and Milleri. After returning to New York, Mme. Bonheur fulfilled an engagement under Strakosch, with Lagrange, Brignoli, and others, in concert and opera; and she sailed October 31, 1868, for Paris, where, after hard study, she made a successful debut at the Théâtre Lyrique in the Charles VI. of Halevy. She was in Paris during the siege and the Commune. In July, 1871, she went to Milan, which has since that time been her home; although she has sung at Naples, Rome, Florence, Trieste, Venice, Turin, and other Italian cities, and at Berlin, Copenhagen, Warsaw, Moscow, and St. Petersburg, besides visiting (in 1875) Buenos Ayres and England. Besides the roles of "Leonora di Guzman" and "Azucena," she has lately sung throughout Italy in Il Profeta as "Fides," in Aida as "Amneris," and in Mignon. In a letter from Rome, dated February 1, 1878, she says:

"Last November I sang at La Scala with Patti and Nicolini in Il Trovatore, and made a great hit. Here I have been singing the part of 'Preziosilla' in La Forza del Destino, which is one of my best rôles. Every night I am obliged to encore the 'Viva la guerra' and the 'Rataplan.' Among the artists who sing with me here is a young baritone from Dalmatia, who made a great hit. He has one of the most beautiful voices I have ever heard, sings splendidly, and is a great actor. Our scene in the second act makes a revolution in the theatre every night. His name is Kaschman. Remember it—it will become celebrated."

"My third opera will be Lohengrin—new for Rome. A very difficult part, that of 'Ortruda,' musically and artistically; still I like it, and have studied it con amore." "Do you know, my dear friend, that they say that Stella Bonheur is one of the finest actresses now on the lyric stage. The Ristori, the other day, sent me her compliments, saying that if ever I lose my beautiful voice, I will still be a great actress!" "You have no idea how I should like to go back to California. I'd be proud to have the Californian public's appreciation, and to show them that their little contralto worked hard to attain celebrity. Dear Californians! They were the first to tell me, 'go ahead—study, you can do, you will do, if you persevere.' They applauded and encouraged the little beginner. Now, oh, now, I'd like to make them judge the artist!" "What became of Noah Brooks, and Mr. and Mrs. Melville, and Colonel Barnes, and Judge Lyons, Judge McKee, General and Mrs. McDowell, General Kirkham, and so many others that were good friends to Stella? Please give my kindest regards to all those who remember me, and tell them how very, very happy I would be to see them again. My voice has a great range, and is called a wonderful voice for the facility I have to sing contralto, mezzo-soprano, and high soprano, which facility I never abused, and for that reason kept my voice as fresh as when I began to sing." "The idea of going to San Francisco becomes un idee fixe, but still it requires an impresario. I would never try a speculation, not being fit for business, you know. I send you a picture of 'Azucena,' taken when I was singing at La Scala. How do you like it?" "Yours sincerely, STELLA BONHEUR."

Last week, when the black clouds gathered in the north and betokened the coming of a thunder-storm, a citizen who was coming down on a street car remarked to an elderly man beside him:

"A storm is portending."
"Hey?" inquired the other.
"I say there are tokens of a storm," continued the first.

"Hey?" was the brisk inquiry again.
"Appearances indicate a storm!" exclaimed the citizen, a trifle embarrassed.

"Hey! What did you say about indelicate?" queried the other.

"There's going to be a thunder-storm!" shouted the citizen, dropping his big words all of a sudden.
"Ah! Now I understand," said the old man; "going to be a thunder-storm. Well, what do you want me to do about it?"

A tramp stepped into a saloon. He was lean and gaunt, and he was as dry as a hot day. He asked the bar-tender to lend him his ear, but he had only two, and refused. Grasping the banger-up by the coat-collar, the tramp led him to the back room, and said: "See here, my dear fellow, you, at the time of writing, stand on the edge of a fearful catastrophe. This free lunch business is ruining the morals of our great and glorious country. It should be stopped. It entices hard-working, honorable men to forage around the city, to take up a living, when, if the luxurious viands were withheld, they would be at home with their families. My friend, be the first to set a healthy example. Charge for the lunch, and give the beer away. Now, you just bring me a glass of—"

The tramp was not certain whether the billiard-table had jumped over him or the floor had caved in.

"A gentleman at Santa Cruz, after waving his handkerchief for half an hour or more at an unknown lady whom he discovered at a distant point on the shore, was encouraged by a warm response to his signal to approach his charmer. Imagine his feelings when on drawing nearer he found that it was his own dear wife, whom he had left at the hotel but a short time before. 'Why, how remarkable that we should have recognized each other at such a distance?' exclaimed both in the same breath, and then they changed the subject."

"Tobacco smoke irritates mosquitoes." To be sure it does. It brought us down from two hundred pounds to nearly a hundred in weight, and weed have kept on sinking until our low-neck shoes would have swallowed us in if we hadn't given it up. Drop it, mosquitoes. If you must really indulge in the weed in any form, chew. A word to the wise is snuff.

MAY LAWRENCE.

All That I Know About Her.

I had returned to Paris from an early trip to St. Germaine with a couple of French students, who lodged on the same floor with myself, and as we parted on one of the quays that border the Seine I lingered a moment to gaze down the river at the bridges and the little steamers, which always formed to me a very pleasant busy scene. I was about to start off, when in a different direction from that which I intended to take I saw close by the water's edge a group of idlers gathered together. I turned about, and, walking down, found the body of a young woman had been taken from the water. This is no unusual sight in Paris, but it filled me with unusual feelings of interest. The face of this girl must certainly have been very attractive, and the fair and Saxon hair proved at once that her nationality was not French. The body was removed from the scene, and I turned away. I had been hungry for my breakfast, but when it was brought to me that morning I could not eat, but sat thinking and wondering who she was, and why had she done it. I went around by the Morgue and saw the face again. It bore resemblance to no one I had known, but it seemed to me so desolate and pitiful, this fair, girlish face, so young, yet so thin and worn. Was it starvation, or suffering, or possibly both? All day I tried to bring back my usual careless thoughts, but I failed entirely, and toward evening found myself again gazing with feelings of wondering pity, and as I looked another stood beside me, who did not, like the rest, stop and then turn away, but stood mutely gazing at the dead girl. He was an Englishman, and a stranger to me, but he seemed so strangely moved that I ventured to ask:

"Do you know her?"
"Yes, I know her."
I wanted so much to learn more, and still his grief seemed so quiet, so deep, I did not dare. He looked a moment longer and then, covering his face with his hands, his form shook with emotion and he turned away. I followed him into the street which had been lighted, and he took my offered arm. We walked some blocks in silence till we came to a hotel on the Rue de Rivoli, before which he stopped.

"Can you—would you come to my apartments, and tell me what you know?"
I assented gladly, and followed him up. He desired me to be seated, and then opening a book showed me a photograph, without further explanation. I recognized the face immediately; it was some years younger, and the expression was sweet and tender, and full of happiness; while the long, fair hair fell over the shoulders even as it did when she lay in death; beneath was written, "May Lawrence," and the date was three years back. A heavy sob aroused me. My unknown companion had given way to his deep sorrow, and was weeping like a child. The tears of women had always touched me, but this was the first time I had seen one of my own sex give way to grief like this. My own eyes were filling, and I rose and placed my hand on his shoulder. At first he did not notice, but as he became calmer it seemed to comfort him, and he took both my hands in his, and grasped them warmly.

"Thank you for your sympathy, my friend; I hope your heart may never feel the wretchedness of mine."

He took the photograph and looked long at the lovely face. It was so timid and trustful, so happy then; and now—The church near by chimed out the half hour to midnight, and the sound aroused him. He asked forgiveness for having given a stranger so much trouble, and then said, hurriedly:

"It was all my fault. I married a sweet wife, who loved me with a love that women—pure women—can feel, but men like me are too selfish to know or appreciate. I loved her, too, but it was not such love as hers—deep, and true, and lasting. I was tempted by a siren, and I— I shall never, never forget the wretched look in May's eyes when she understood my faithlessness; but I was infatuated." He stopped. "I cannot tell you more, my friend. Try and forget these past few hours; and perhaps some day, if you are not already married you may be. Be true to your wife in thought and deed; and if she loves you as May loved me, you will be blessed more than men deserve."

That was all; nothing to tell of her life and death; perhaps he did not know, and I was fain to be content and respect what confidence he had seen fit to give. I arose to go; he held my hand in his.

"I can never forget your sympathy, but try and forget my sorrow."

I never met the man again. A year after I was about returning to America, when I visited with some friends the Cemetery Montmartre, and just by accident came upon a grave, well kept and green, and on the headstone I read in English: "May Lawrence, aged 22."

L. B. BERTRAND.

"Now, my son, never interrupt an old man. No, my son, never fool with the old-timers—there are mighty few left; they are getting old and feeble; their shadows are falling far to the eastward; in a few years there will be none left, and then you and the rest of the hoodlums can come to the front and say as how you were personally acquainted with old Col. Baker, Senator Broderick, Lola Montez, Ralston, J. P. Jones, Sharon, Jim Fair, Mackay, Flood and O'Brien, a great deal better than I am with you, and slept with them, and ate with them, and loaned them a twenty when they were so poor they did not have a dollar in the world, and not a decent shirt to their backs; and tell about men who are not near as liberal nowadays. No, my son, do not pester the old boys. Let them indulge in their little sports of whisky drinking, pedro and swapping lies, and pattern after them so that when you are old, baldheaded, and carry a big bass drum under your vest, you will be a shining, profitable light to the coming generation. See here! If I ever catch you playing any more tricks on the old man I will break you in two—git!"

The boys were arranging for a circus, at La Barm, and most of the preparations had been made, when some one discovered that no clown had been engaged. The leader looked the crowd over, and making a selection, he said: "Here, Willie, you must be the clown. Now then, Tom takes the tickets, Jimmy leads the band, I am the giant, and little Willie stands in the centre and talks bad and acts like an idiot!" There is no reason why the boys' circus should not be a success.

The grave of General Custer at West Point is not marked even by a stone; yet, on Decoration Day, it was covered with beautiful flowers by the hand of one who loved him—his wife.

A FLY MANUFACTORY.

The Wonderful Things Done in Paterson, N. J.

Flies are artificially propagated in New Jersey, near Paterson, where an association of men have invested capital, and are running the works to their full capacity. Flies are incultured from eggs by an artificial hatching arrangement, and the young flies are taught all the deviltry they know right in the factory. Some will look upon this statement as false, and wonder why any association of men should engage in the artificial propagation of the fly. We will explain. It is well known flies die at the end of the season, and if it were not for artificial propagation, there would be none the second season. The parties that are engaged in this industry are also sole manufacturers of fly-paper and fly-traps. We trust that the object is no plain. In order to sell their paper and traps, it is necessary to have game to catch. The gentlemen have engaged largely in the manufacture of fly-paper and fly-traps before they knew that flies only lasted one season, and after a year of success they found bankruptcy staring them in the face, as it was probable they would not sell a sheet of paper the next year. So they organized the "Great American Artificial Fly Incubating Association of New Jersey," and issued a million dollars' worth of stock. We have not room to describe the hatching of flies, but it is like hatching chickens by steam. Some of the best old flies are kept to lay eggs, and the eggs are placed on cards and put into an oven. They hatch out in twenty minutes, and are ready in half an hour to learn the business. First they are taught to wade in butter, to swim in cream, and to get into things around the kitchen. Then the young flies are taken to the dormitory, where men and women, engaged for the purpose, are pretending to sleep. An old fly and a hundred young ones are placed in each room, and the old fly, after lighting on shirt bosoms or female white goods, in order to teach the young flies the noble art of punctuation, begins to get in its work on the sleeper. The old fly, after seating the young flies on cuffs and collars, calls "Attention!" and after buzzing around a little, lights on the sleeper's nose. The sleeper pretends to be mad, and slaps at the fly—this is a mere matter of form, however, for if a sleeper engaged by the association kills an old stool fly, it is deducted from his or her salary. As the old fly gets away the young flies laugh and want to try it themselves. Then the old fly lights upon the lady sleeper's big toe and proceeds deliberately to walk up her foot, ankle, and calf, occasionally stopping to bite. This is very trying to the alleged sleepers, causing nervousness, and a twitching of the muscles, but they must not injure the fly. The little flies notice everything, and after the old fly has cruised around, and tickled and buzzed, then the young flies are allowed to practice on them. The persons practised on get $5 a day and board, as it is a very particular and trying situation. Then comes the expensive business of distributing flies throughout the country. Formerly it was done through book agents and lightning-rod peddlers, but that was found too expensive; so the association originated the idea of sending out regular agents, called tramps, to introduce the flies. The first year only about 10,000 tramps were sent out, but the business has grown to such huge proportions that it is estimated that this year the association has sent out 500,000 tramps, leaving flies around. They go from house to house begging, and before they leave they manage to drop a few flies. Each tramp has a card with a million young flies on. After he has partaken of his meal, and the woman of the house is out for a shotgun or a dog to drive him away, he slips his hand up his sleeve and tears off a piece of card containing, perhaps, 10,000 young flies, and drops it in the woodbox or in some convenient place. That is enough to start on, as the flies breed rapidly. The next day the woman will wonder "where on airly all them flies come from." The company has distributing points all over the country—Chicago, St. Louis, and St. Paul being among them—where the tramps go once a month after a new supply. A card will last a tramp thirty days. The introduction of the fly paper and the fly traps is easier, as the articles are sent directly to druggists, who sell them to consumers. Stock in the association is worth an immense amount, paying a quarterly dividend of twenty per cent. The only way that the fly nuisance can be abated is to kill the tramps as fast as they enter a community, or destroy the manufactory at New Jersey. We have exposed the nefarious business; now let the people rise up and crush it out of existence.

The soft rich color in which these mantels are finished renders them a much more agreeable article of furniture to a room than the cold, repulsive-looking marble slab, and colors may be selected to harmonize with the furniture. In ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY OF FINISH, AND DURABILITY OF POLISH, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

"THE CHINESE MUST GO!"--II.

A Reply to Kwang Chang Ling, the Chinese Literate.

Having gleaned from the pages of history the proof that the Caucasian and Mongolian races are non-assimilative, I propose this week to present some ethnological reasons which seem equally potent in establishing the same general truth. I need not espouse the cause of either of the three great schools of naturalists regarding the origin of man. I need not combat the theory which Mr. Huxley denominates "the cosmogony of the semi-barbarous Hebrews," that the human race sprang from a single pair and constitutes but one stock subject to various modifications; nor follow the less orthodox school of Agassiz, that there were several independent creations constituting a diversity of species adapted to their geographical distribution; nor, finally, need I espouse the evolution theory of Darwin, that all existing species are developments of some pre-existing form, which in like manner descended from a form still lower. Neither of these respective theories of the origin of man stands in the way of the position I take, that the distinctive races of mankind are immiscible. Nor need I adopt either one of the numerous tests applied by ethnologists for distinguishing races. Whether the skin, the skull, the facial angle, the hair, or the language, is the true test of race, I need not discuss. It is sufficient to know that there are certain strongly-marked distinctive races among men. Hubert Bancroft, in his "Native Races of the Pacific Coast," truly says that "notwithstanding all these failures to establish rules by which mankind may be divided into classes, yet there remains the stubborn fact that differences do exist, as palpable as the difference between daylight and darkness." If I am asked how these differences were brought about, I may answer in the language of a noted scientist, that "the races of mankind came through the same factors as the race, and that race-making is simply a later stage of mao-makiog; that there is a convergence of these races toward a common point of unity, but the lines do not meet within the horizon of history." Man-making preceded race-making. Race-making preceded history-writing. History-writing commenced with the dawning of civilization. Race-making was a part of the process of fitting mankind for inhabiting the various portions of the earth. Whether the races originally sprang from one pair, or from various acts of creation, or from evolution, it is equally certain that the race distinctions enter into the blood, the bone, and the marrow, reach far back toward the period of creation, and are found imbedded in the very foundations of humanity. It becomes important, therefore, to inquire why it is that these great races of mankind are kept separate, distinctive, and immiscible. Why is it that the Caucasian and Mongolian races do not assimilate? I answer:—

- (1.) Because of a natural and incurable antipathy existing between the races.
- (2.) Because the offspring of the miscegenation of the races are mongrels—weak and short-lived.
- (3.) Because there is a total lack of affinity between the languages of the distinctive races.

The first two of the foregoing reasons have, from the earliest periods of history, tended to keep the blood of the distinctive races pure; while the last, like an impassable gulf, yawns between their respective civilizations.

(1.) As to the antipathy existing between the races.—We sometimes go a long way to find a reason when we have a good and sufficient one close at hand. Perhaps the best reason why these races do not assimilate is "because they do not." The vague, unreasoning, instinctive antipathy existing between the races of mankind, like the senses of taste and smell, which are placed as sentinels at the gateway of the stomach to keep out everything vile and unclean, is implanted within each one of us, and set at the gateway of our affections to keep pure and unadulterated the best breeds of men. Nor is it any answer to say that miscegenation is frequent between the races when thrown together. The stormy passions of men overlap the boundaries set by race as the wild waves of the sea overlap the rocks and glide far up the beach. One hundred and fifty years have elapsed since the African race was forcibly brought to this country; they have multiplied with such rapidity that they are everywhere among us, and yet we shrink with horror at the thought of intermarrying with them. The instinct of antipathy tells us that the blood of the races was intended to be kept pure—that the cross-breeding of the races is unnatural and revolting. The interbreeding of widely divergent branches of the same race, as between the Celts, the Teutons, and the Slavs results in an assimilation so complete that the first or second generation carries no distinctive mark of nationality; but the cross-breeding of distinctive races creates an offspring of mongrels, strange alike to the father and to the mother, and for whom there is but little parental affection, as instanced in the cases of the Southern planters selling their mulatto children, the pioneer settlers of the Pacific Coast deserting their Indian wives and progeny, and the Chinese of the Southern Islands leaving their families to return to China to die. The offspring of these revolting alliances belong to no race. They are mongrels. Like bastards they are fili nullius—the children of nobody. They invariably go with the lower race. The "half-breed" is an Indian; the Creole is a South American; the mulatto—even the octoroon—is a negro. They do not constitute in any sense a distinctive race. Thus the interbreeding of superior with inferior races which is caused by lawless passion results in deterioration and misery. History will never excuse the Spanish for brutality and mercilessly driving out the Moors who had dwelt among them for six hundred years; but the infallible sign of a distinct race had been set upon their features and they were forced to bow to a law higher than justice or mercy—the law of fate. If the races had amalgamated and imperceptibly melted into each other, that cruel page of Spanish history never would have been written. The Chinese of California have been with us twenty-five years, and still they are aliens and strangers. No tender chord of sympathy or friendship binds any Chinaman to any American, for friendship implies equality, and there is no equality between the Chinese and Americans. The Chinese are despised as an inferior race. Not because they are clean or because they are filthy; not because they are industrious or because they are idle; not because they are peaceable or because they are quarrelsome; not because they are patient and long-suffering and meek, but because they are Chinamen. No inferior race can dwell among a superior upon terms of equality. The condition of the African race on this continent is anomalous and the solution is not yet clear. Judge John A. Boalt, in a learned address before the Berkeley Club, which was incorporated in the report to the State Senate of the Special Committee on Chinese Immigration, made the startling statement that "two non-assimilating races never yet lived together harmoniously on the same soil unless one of the races was in a state of servitude to the other." But we have all solemnly sworn that slavery or involuntary servitude shall never exist in this republic. Shall we introduce a system of serfdom?—a race of helots?—a class of burden-bearers? Never, unless we are tired of democracy. If we want to be true to the memory of our forefathers we shall build up a republic in which manhood is respected alike in the bod-carrier as in the Senator.

(2.) The offspring of distinctive races are weak and short-lived.—This fact is one of the many conclusive evidences of the truth that the distinctive races were never intended to amalgamate. The intermarriage of different branches of the same race infuses fresh life and vigor into the new stock, and has been found exceedingly favorable to strength and longevity; but when the races are distinctive and the offspring are mongrels, weakness, lack of vitality, and early death is the invariable result. It is on account of this fact that the lives of mulattoes, even of the first generation, can not be insured. The second generation of mulattoes enjoy still less longevity, and the third are hybrids—"afflicted like mules with sterility." Such is the evidence of Louis Figuier, in his work on the "Human Race." The well known, yet shameful, fact that the African race in America scarcely exists at all in its purity may account for the following most startling statistics of the comparative longevity of the two races in the city of Washington, as given by Dr. D. W. Bliss, the registrar of the district:

DEATH RATE FOR 1875.

Whites per 1,000.....	19.22
Colored per 1,000.....	47.6

FOR 1876.

Whites per 1,000.....	26.537
Colored per 1,000.....	49.294

The population of Washington City is: Whites, 115,000; colored, 43,000; and yet in one or two months of the year 1877 the deaths among the blacks were nearly equal to those among the whites.

In the city of Chattanooga the white population is 7,500; colored, 4,500; and the death rate for five years, as tabulated from the records kept by J. H. Van Deman, registrar, was as follows:

	Whites.	Colored.
July 31, 1873.....	22.1	36
July 31, 1874.....	21	41.3
July 31, 1875.....	17.8	31.8
July 31, 1876.....	20.1	39
July 31, 1877.....	18.6	37

Average.....

19.9

37

In Knoxville, Tennessee, the death rate for 1876 was as follows:

Whites per 1,000.....	18
Colored per 1,000.....	31.2

A writer, in commenting on the above statistics, says: "It is certain that in the cities of the South the colored race tends toward extinction; and unless there is a gain somewhere, philanthropists had better stop talking about the black man's vote, and take measures to save his life."

But this is no isolated fact. The same weakness and mortality has been observed in all mongrels. Mr. George Gibbs, in a paper printed in the Smithsonian Institute Reports of 1864, gives the result of extended observations on the Pacific Coast, from Oregon to Mexico, that the miscegenation of the European with the native races was disastrous to the health and longevity of the offspring. The offspring of the cross-breeding of the white and yellow races are as strictly mongrels as those of the white and black races, only less strongly marked. They are subject to the same general law of weakness and early death. The degradation involved in and resulting from these revolting alliances, the deterioration of physical power, mental strength and moral tone, could not but result in disaster to our race, and to our civilization, as has been abundantly proven in our intercourse with the black race. Whether, therefore, the Chinese come by millions to remain permanently, or whether they come among us simply as laborers, intending to return, they are equally a curse.

(3.) The Chinese language and its effect on Chinese civilization.—The mental characteristics of all nations and all races are influenced in a marked degree by their language. The German language is metaphysical; so are the German people. The French language is bright, sparkling, and delicate; so are the French people. The Italian language is musical and languid; so are the Italian people. The Spanish language is florid and passionate; so are the Spanish people. The English language, which seems to have been drawn from all the Indo-European nations, is characterized as terse, matter-of-fact, and lacking in fancy; the English people are a matter-of-fact, common-sense people. Whether a race is more influenced by its language than the language by the race I need not discuss; but there can be no doubt that the barrenness and utter insufficiency of the Chinese language to express the finer shades of thought have exercised a tremendous influence on Chinese civilization. I state but the exact truth when I say that the Chinese language, like the Chinese race, is in a state of "arrested development." Mr. Brace, in his "Races of the Old World," says:

"If our readers will call to mind the first utterances of children, where each word or each syllable is a sentence, where the tone and gesture indicate whether the single sound emitted is a noun, adjective, or verb, or all three together; and if he will suppose this through some unexplainable cause petrified and transmitted as an enduring mode of speech, he will have an appreciation of the nature of the Chinese language. Its distinction is not that it is monosyllabic, but each syllable is a sentence in itself, as if the minds who used it never grew to the idea of a sentence."

We can begin to appreciate the above statement when we learn that there are on an average eight meanings to every word in the Chinese language, and that to interpret the meaning in any given case requires some gesture or peculiar intonation of the voice so observable in the conversation of the Chinese among us; that there are 212 characters pronounced che, 113 pronounced ching, 138 pronounced foo, and 1165 pronounced ci; that there are 12,674 characters in the Chinese language with forms and meanings distinct from each other. "From this it will be seen," says Brace, "what a fearful barrier to advancement in learning, science, and general knowledge such a language must be." "It is this," he says, "which has most of all checked the progress of the Chinese people." Let it be further understood that the Chinese language contains no alphabet, but that each word has its own representation or character, so that there are as many characters—or letters, as we would call them—as there are words. It is this fact that makes it the work of a lifetime to become familiar with the written language of China. Rev. John L. Nevius, a missionary who resided ten years in China and who has published a book entitled "China and the Chinese," says:

"Learning to read Chinese is very different from learning to read English. We have an alphabetical system by which we read our own spoken language; but the Chinese must learn a new and different language from their spoken language, and also learn to read every word separately and independently. The consequence is, that not more than three per cent. of the whole population can read."

Louis Figuier, in his learned work on the "Human Race," adds his testimony to the utter poverty of the Chinese language as a vehicle for the expression of the higher forms of thought. He says:

"One marvels to hear that the Chinese language comprehends such a number of words that the life of a single man of letters is not sufficiently long to allow of his learning it. Thus this apparent wealth is the utmost poverty. To its imperfection must be attributed the smallness of the progress the people of Asia have made in intelligence and commerce. Their language is not only monosyllabic, but their writing is hieroglyphic, which accounts for the scant progress made in their civilization. It is the language of a barbarous nation, and must be exceedingly awkward for a civilized people desiring to express abstract ideas. While the Chinese have modified their language to satisfy the wants of their higher civilization, yet it has always stood in the way of their attaining a high state of civilization."

An American printer, with a case of type containing the twenty-six letters of our alphabet, can put into permanent form any thought or fancy that the human mind in its highest development can conceive. It would require 40,000 type to print a Chinese book; hence Chinese printing is but writing reproduced by carving on wooden or metal blocks. Thus it will be seen that this great, rude, childish, monosyllabic language of the Chinese, which but three out of every hundred can ever hope to read, and but the fewest number of even those who devote their lives to it can hope to master—a language which of necessity must be their only vehicle of thought—stands like the Great Wall between the Chinese people and any high degree of civilization. Can any good come out of such a Nazareth? Can a rude palanquin be made to carry the freight of a modern railroad? Can the light junk be made to plow the ocean with the rapidity of a great steamship? No more can the Chinese language carry modern civilization. It is as incapable of receiving and assimilating it as the mind of a child is incapable of understanding the depths of Emerson or Carlyle. Is it surprising, then, that the thinking world has been so sadly disappointed in the barren results to literature and science in the opening of the Chinese ports? No adequate compensation is found in the so-called Chinese classics for the life task of any European scholar mastering the language. It is true the Chinese boast of an ancient civilization; but what are the accompaniments of civilization? Science, art, commerce, and literature. Where are their achievements in science? Where are their works of art? What is their literature? Where is their commerce? Did they possess the art of printing? Wherein has it enlightened and educated the Chinese people? Did they possess the mariners' compass? Where were their ships and commerce? Did they discover gunpowder? Where were their artillery and their courage to use it? Did they possess the art of making silk? The sober old Romans deprecated it as a corrupt method of "exhibiting naked matrons through thin draperies." Did they excel in the manufacture of crockery? The best crockery in the world is now made in Europe. Were they rich? The luxury, wealth, superstition and weakness of the Chinese people have ever been at once the temptation and the opportunity of conquering nations. Were they learned, wise, and superior? Their learning was pedantic, their wisdom was foolishness, and their superiority the subject of contempt. Were they religious? There is no idealism in a Chinaman. Did they reverence an<sup>d</sup> worship God? Over a million vile, loathsome, and vicious priests minister in their temples to wooden idols. Whom do they worship? Their dead ancestors. Thus everything they have attempted to do, everything they have ever succeeded in doing is in a state of petrification—of "arrested development." Assyria, Babylon, Egypt, Greece, and Rome, the five great ancient monarchies, each rose and flourished in their magnificence, leaving something to speak to future ages of their greatness; something in art, something in literature or in science; but China has spanned the ages and cycles of time a dead level of mediocrity, leaving nothing except the Great Wall as a monument to her cowardice and her ex-

Next week I will conclude by replying to some of the suggestions of Kwang Chang Ling.

THE NEW PAUL AND VIRGINIA.

The Practical Working of the "Religion of Humanity."

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

The professor, like most serious thinkers, knew but little of that trifle commonly called "the world." He had never kissed any one except his wife; even that he did as seldom as possible; and the curate lying dead drunk was the first glimpse he had of what, par excellence, is called "life." But though the scene just described was thus a terrible shock to him, in one way it gave him an unlooked-for comfort. He now saw the reason. "Of course," he said, "existence can not be perfect so long as one-third of Humanity makes a beast of itself. A little more progress is still necessary."

He hastened to explain this next morning to Virginia, and begged her not to be alarmed at the curate's scandalous conduct. "Immortality," he said, "is but a want of success in attaining our own happiness. It is evidently most immoral for the curate to be kissing you; and therefore kissing you would not really conduce to his happiness. I will convince him of this solemn truth in a very few moments. Then the essential dignity of human nature will become at once apparent, and we shall all of us at last begin to be unspeakably happy."

The curate, however, altogether declined to be convinced. He maintained stoutly that to kiss Virginia would be the greatest pleasure that Humanity could offer him. "And if it is immoral as well as pleasant," he added, "I should like it all the better."

At this the professor gave a terrible groan; he dropped almost fainting into a chair; he hid his face in his hands, and murmured, half articulately, "Then I can't tell what to do!" In another instant, however, he recovered himself; he fixed a dreadful look on the curate, and said: "That last statement of yours can not be true, for, if it were, it would upset all my theories. It is a fact that can be proved and verified, that if you kissed Virginia it would make you miserable."

"Pardon me," said the curate, rapidly moving toward her; "your notion is a remnant of superstition; I will explode it by a practical experiment."

The professor caught hold of the curate's coat-tails, and forcibly pulled him back into his seat.

"If you dare attempt it," he said, "I will kick you soundly, and, shocking, immoral man! you will feel miserable enough then."

The curate was a terrible coward, and very weak as well. "You are a great, hulking fellow," he said, eyeing the professor; "and I am of a singularly delicate build. I must, therefore, conform to the laws of matter, and give in." He said this in a very sulky voice; and, going out of the room, slammed the door after him.

A radiant expression suffused the face of the professor. "See," he said to Virginia, "the curate's conversion is already half accomplished. In a few hours more he will be rational, he will be moral, he will be solemnly and significantly happy."

The professor talked like this to Virginia the whole morning; but, in spite of all his arguments, she declined to be comforted.

"It is all very well," she said, "while you are in the way. But, as soon as your back is turned, I know he will be at me again."

"Will you never," said Paul, by this time a little irritated, "will you never listen to exact thought? The curate is now reflecting; and a little reflection must inevitably convince him that he does not really care to kiss you, and that it would give him very little real pleasure to do so."

"Stuff!" exclaimed Virginia, with a sudden vigor, at which the professor was thunderstruck. "I can tell you," she went on, "that better men than he have borne kicks for my sake; and to kiss me is the only thing that that little man cares about. What shall I do!" she exclaimed, bursting into tears. "Here is one of you insulting me by trying to kiss me; and the other insulting me by saying that I am not worth being kissed!"

"Ah, me!" groaned the poor professor, in an agony. "here is one-third of Humanity plunged in sorrow; and another third has not yet freed itself from vice. When, when will sublimity begin?"

XI.

At dinner, however, things wore a more promising aspect. The curate had been so terrified by the professor's threats that he hardly dared to so much as look at Virginia; and, to make up for it, he drank an unusual quantity of champagne, which soon set him laughing and chatting at a rate that was quite extraordinary. Virginia, seeing herself thus neglected by the curate, began to fear that, as Paul said, he really did not so much care to kiss her after all. She, therefore, put on all her most enticing ways; she talked, flirted, and smiled her best, and made her most effective eyes, that the curate might see what a prize was forever beyond his reach.

Paul thought this state of affairs full of glorious promise. Virginia's tears were dried, she had never looked so radiant and exquisite before. The curate had foregone every attempt to kiss Virginia, and yet he seemed happiness itself. The professor took the latter aside, as soon as the meal was over, to congratulate him on the holy state to which exact thought had conducted him.

"You see," he said, "what a natural growth the loftiest morality is. Virginia doesn't want to be kissed by you. I should be shocked at your doing so shocking a thing as kissing her. If you kissed her, you would make both of us miserable; and, as a necessary consequence, you would be in an agony likewise; in addition to which, I should inevitably kick you."

"But," said the curate, "suppose I kissed Virginia on the sly—I merely put this as an hypothesis, remember—and that in a little while she liked it, what then? She and I would both be happy; and you ought to be happy, too, because we were."

"Idiot!" said the professor. "Virginia is another man's wife; nor do wives ever like kissing any one except their husbands. What they really like is what Professor Huxley calls the undefined but bright ideal of the highest good, which, as he says, exact thought shows us is the true end of existence. But, pooh! what is the use of all this talking? You know which way your higher nature calls you; and, of course, unless men believe in God, they cannot help obeying their higher nature."

"I," said the curate, "think the belief in God a degrading superstition; I think every one an imbecile who believes a miracle possible. And yet I do not care two straws about the highest good. What you call my lower nature is far the strongest; I mean to follow it to the best of my ability; and I prefer calling it my higher, for the sake of the associations."

This plunged the professor in deeper grief than ever. He knew not what to do. He paced up and down the veranda, or about the rooms, and moaned and groaned as if he had a violent toothache. Virginia and the curate asked what was amiss with him. "I am agonizing," he said, "for the sake of holy, solemn, unspeakably dignified Humanity."

The curate, seeing the professor thus dejected, by degrees took heart again; and, as Virginia still continued her fascinating behavior to him, he resolved to try and prove to her that, the test of morality being happiness, the most moral thing she could do would be to allow him to kiss her. No sooner had he begun to propound these views, than the professor gave over his groaning, seized the curate by the collar, and dragged him out of the room with a roughness that nearly throttled him.

"I was but propounding a theory—an opinion," gasped the curate. "Surely thought is free. You will not persecute me for my opinions?"

"It is not for your opinions," said the professor, "but for the horrible effect they might have. We can only tolerate opinions that have no possible consequence. You may promulgate any of those as much as you like; because to do that would be a self-regarding action."

XII.

"Well," said the curate, "if I may not kiss Virginia, I will drink brandy instead. That will make me happy enough; and then we shall all be radiant."

He soon put his resolve into practice. He got a bottle of brandy, he sat himself down under a palm-tree, and told the professor he was going to make an afternoon of it.

"Foolish man!" said the professor; "I was never drunk myself, it is true; but I know that to get drunk makes one's head ache horribly. To get drunk is, therefore, horribly immoral, and therefore I cannot permit it."

"Excuse me," said the curate; "it is a self-regarding action. Nobody's head will ache but mine; so that is my own lookout. I have been expelled from school, from college, and from my first curacy, for drinking. So I know well enough the balance of pains and pleasures."

Here he pulled out his brandy-bottle, and applied his lips to it.

"O Humanity!" he exclaimed, "how solemn this brandy tastes!"

Matters went on like this for several days. The curate was too much frightened to again approach Virginia. Virginia at last became convinced that he did not care about kissing her. Her vanity was wounded, and she became sullen; and this made the professor sullen also. In fact, two-thirds of Humanity were overcast with gloom. The only happy section of it was the curate, who alternately smoked and drank all day long.

"The nasty little beast!" said Virginia to the professor; "he is nearly always drunk. I am beginning quite to like you, Paul, by comparison with him. Let us turn him out, and not let him live in the cottage."

"No," said the professor; "for he is one-third of Humanity. You do not properly appreciate the solidarity of mankind. His existence, however, I admit is a great difficulty."

One day at dinner, however, Paul came in radiant.

"O holy, O happy event!" he exclaimed; "all will go right at last."

Virginia inquired anxiously what had happened, and Paul informed her that the curate, who had got more drunk than usual that afternoon, had fallen over a cliff, and been dashed to pieces.

"What event," he asked, "could be more charming—more unspeakably holy? It bears about it every mark of sanctity. It is for the greatest happiness of the greatest number. Come," he continued, "let us begin our love-feast. Let us each seek the happiness of the other. Let us instantly be sublime and happy."

XIII.

"Let us prepare ourselves," said Paul, solemnly, as they sat down to dinner, "for realizing to the full the essential dignity of Humanity—that grand être, which has come, in the course of progress, to consist of you and me. Every condition of happiness that modern thinkers have dreamed of is now fulfilled. We have but to seek each the happiness of the other, and we shall both be in a solemn, a significant, and unspeakable state of rapture. See, here is an exquisite leg of mutton. I," said Paul, who liked the fat best, "will give up all the fat to you."

"And I," said Virginia, resignedly, "will give up all the lean to you."

A few mouthfuls made Virginia feel sick. "I confess," said she, "I can't get on with this fat."

"I confess," the professor answered, "I don't exactly like this lean."

"Then let us," said Virginia, "be like Jack Sprat and his wife."

"No," said the professor, meditatively, "that is quite inadmissible. For in that case we should be egoistic hedonists. However, for to-day it shall be as you say. I will think of something better to-morrow."

Next day he and Virginia had a chicken apiece; only Virginia's was put before Paul, and Paul's was put before Virginia; and they each walked round the table to supply each other with the slightest necessities.

"Ah!" cried Paul, "this is altruism indeed. I think already I feel the sublimity beginning."

Virginia liked this rather better. But soon she committed the sin of taking for herself the liver of Paul's chicken. As soon as she had eaten the whole of it her conscience began to smite her. She confessed her sin to Paul, and inquired, with some anxiety, if he thought she would go to hell for it. "Metaphorically," said Paul, "you have already done so. You are punished by the loss of the pleasure you would have had in giving that liver to me, and also by your knowledge of my knowledge of your folly in foregoing the pleasure."

The professor having by some accident lost his razors, his moustaches began to grow profusely, and Virginia had watched them with a deep but half-conscious admiration. At last, in a happy moment, she exclaimed, "O Paul! do let me wax the ends for you?" Paul at first giggled, blushed, and protested, but, as Virginia assured him it would make her happy, he consented. "Then," she said, "you will know that I am happy, and that in return will make you happy also. Ah!" she exclaimed, when the operation was over, "do go and examine yourself in the glass. I declare you look exactly like Jack Barley—Barley Sugar, as we used to call him—of the Blues."

Virginia smiled; suddenly she blushed; the professor blushed also. To cover the blushes, she begged to be allowed to do his hair. "It will make me so much happier, Paul," she said. The professor again assented, that he might make Virginia happy, and that she might be happy in knowing that he was happy in promoting her happiness. At last the professor, shy and awkward as he was, was emboldened to offer to do Virginia's hair in return. She allowed him to arrange her fringe, and, as she found he did no great harm, she let him repeat the operation as often as he liked.

A week thus passed, full, as the professor said, of infinite solemnity. "I admit, Paul," sighed Virginia, "that this altruism, as you call it, is very touching. I like it very much. But," she added, sinking her voice to a whisper, "are you quite sure it is perfectly moral?"

"Moral!" echoed the professor, "moral! Why, exact thought shows us that it is the very essence of morality!"

XIV.

Matters now went on charmingly. All existence seemed to take a richer coloring, and there was something, Paul said, which, in Professor Tyndall's words, "gave fullness and tone to it, but which he could neither analyze nor comprehend." But at last a change came. One morning, while Virginia was arranging Paul's moustaches, she was frightened almost into a fit by a sudden apparition at the window. It was a hideous hairy figure, perfectly naked but for a band of silver which it wore round its neck. For a moment it did nothing but grin and stare; then it flung into Virginia's lap a filthy piece of carrion, and in an instant it bounded away with an almost miraculous agility.

Virginia screamed with disgust and terror, and clung to Paul's knees for protection. He seemed unmoved and pre-occupied. All at once, to her intense surprise, she saw his face light up with an expression of triumphant eagerness. "The missing link!" he exclaimed, "the missing link at last! Thank God—I beg pardon for my unspeakable blasphemy—I mean, thank circumstances over which I have no control. I must this instant go out and hunt for it. Give me some provisions in a knapsack, for I will not come back till I have caught it."

This was a fearful blow to Virginia. She fell at Paul's feet weeping, and besought him in piteous accents that he would not thus abandon her.

"I must," said the professor, solemnly; "for I am going in pursuit of Truth. To arrive at Truth is man's perfect and most rapturous happiness. You must surely know that, even if I have forgotten to tell it to you. To pursue truth—holy truth for holy truth's sake—is a more solemn pleasure than even frizzling your hair."

"Oh," cried Virginia, hysterically, "I don't care two straws for truth. What on earth is the good of it?"

"It is its own end," said the professor. "It is its own exceeding great reward. I must be off at once in search of it. Good-bye for the present. Seek truth on your own account, and be unspeakably happy also, because you know that I am seeking it."

The professor remained away for three days. For the first two of them Virginia was inconsolable. She wandered about mournfully, with her head dejected. She very often sighed; she very often uttered the name of Paul. At last she surprised herself by exclaiming aloud to the irresponsible solitude, "O Paul, until you were gone I never knew how passionately I loved you!" No sooner were these words out of her mouth than she stood still, horror-stricken. "Alas!" she cried, "and have I really come to this? I am in a state of deadly sin, and there is no priest here to confess to! I must conquer my forbidden love as best as I may. But, ah me, what a guilty thing I am!"

As she uttered these words, her eye fell on a tin box of the professor's, marked "Private," which he always kept carefully locked, and which had before now excited her curiosity. Suddenly she became conscious of a new impulse. "I will pursue truth!" she exclaimed. "I will break that box open, and I will see what is inside it. Ah!" she added, as, with the aid of a poker, she at last wrenched off the padlock, "Paul may be right, after all. There is more interest in the pursuit of truth than I thought there was."

The box was full of papers, letters, and diaries, the greater part of which were marked "Strictly private." Seeing this, Virginia's appetite for truth became keener than ever. She instantly began her researches. The more she read, the more eager she became; and the more private appeared the nature of the documents, the more insatiable did her thirst for truth grow. To her extreme surprise, she gathered that the professor had begun life as a clergyman. There were several photographs of him in his surplice, and a number of devout prayers, apparently composed by himself for his own personal use. This discovery was the result of her labors.

"Certainly," she said, "it is one of extreme significance. If Paul was a priest once, he must be a priest now. Orders are indelible—at least, in the Church of England I know they are."

XV.

Paul came back, to Virginia's extreme relief, without the missing link. But he was still radiant, in spite of his failure; for he had discovered, he said, a place where the creature had apparently slept, and he had collected in a card-paper box a large number of its parasites.

"I am glad," said Virginia, "that you have not found the missing link; though, as to thinking that we really came from monkeys, of course, that is too absurd. Now, if you could have brought me a nice monkey, I should really have liked that. The bishop has promised that I shall have a darling one, if ever I reach him—ah, me!—if, Paul," continued Virginia, in a very solemn voice, after a long pause, "do you know that, while you have been away, I have been pursuing truth? I rather liked it, and found it very, very significant."

"O joy!" exclaimed the professor; "O unspeakable radiance! O holy, O essentially dignified Humanity; it will soon be perfect! Tell me, Virginia, what truths have you been discovering?"

"One truth about you, Paul," said Virginia, very gravely, "and one truth about me. I burn—oh, I burn to tell them to you!"

The professor was enraptured to hear that one-half of Humanity had been studying human nature; and he began asking Virginia if her discoveries belonged to the domain of historical or biological science. Meanwhile, Virginia, had flung herself on her knees before him, and was exclaiming in piteous accents:

"By my fault, by my own fault, by my very grievous fault, holy father, I confess to you—"

"Is the woman mad?" cried the professor, starting from his seat.

"You are a priest, Paul," said Virginia; "that is one of the things I have discovered. I am in a state of deadly sin, that is the other; and I must and will confess to you. Once a priest, always a priest. You cannot get rid of your orders; you must and shall hear me."

"I was once in orders, it is true," said Paul, reluctantly; "but how did you find out my miserable secret?"

"In my zeal for truth," said Virginia, "I broke open your tin box; I read all your letters; I looked at your early photographs; I saw all your beautiful prayers."

"You broke open my box!" cried the professor. "You read my letters and my private papers! Oh, horrible! oh, immoral! What shall we do if half Humanity has no feeling of honor?"

"Oh," said Virginia, "it was all from the love of truth—of solemn and holy truth. I sacrificed every other feeling to that. But I have not told you my truth, yet; and I am determined you shall hear it, or I must still remain in my sins. Paul, I am a married woman; and I discover, in spite of that, that I have fallen in love with you. My husband, it is true, is far away; and, whatever we do, he could never possibly be the wiser. But I am in a state of mortal sin, nevertheless; and I would give anything in the world if you would kiss me."

"Woman!" exclaimed Paul, aghast with fright and horror, "do you dare to abuse truth by turning it to such base purposes?"

"Oh, you are so clever," Virginia went on, "and, when the ends of your mustache are waxed, you look positively handsome; and I love you so deeply and so tenderly, that I shall certainly go to hell if you do not give me absolution."

At this the professor jumped up, and, staring very hard at Virginia, asked her if, after all that he had said on the ship, she really believed in such exploded fallacies as hell, God, and priesthood.

She reminded him that he had preached there without a surplice, and that she had, therefore, not thought it right to listen to a word he said.

"Ah," cried the professor, with a sigh of intense relief, "I see it all now. How can Humanity ever be unspeakably holy so long as one-half of it grovels in dreams of an unspeakably holy God? As Mr. Frederic Harrison truly says, a want of faith in 'the essential dignity of man, is one of the surest marks of the enervating influence of this dream of a celestial glory.' The professor accordingly redelivered to Virginia the entire substance of his lectures in the ship. He fully impressed on her that the intellect of the world was on the side of Humanity, and that God's existence could be disproved with a box of chemicals. He was agreeably surprised at finding her not at all unwilling to be convinced, and extremely unexact in her demands for proof. In a few days she had not a remnant of superstition left. "At last!" exclaimed the professor; "it has come at last! Unspeakable happiness will surely begin now."

XVI

No one could possibly be more emancipated than Virginia. She tittered all day long, and, whenever the professor asked her why, she always told him she was thinking of "an intelligent First Cause, a conception of which," she said, "was really quite killing." But when her first burst of intellectual excitement was over, she became more serious. "All thought, Paul," she said, "is valuable because it leads to action. Come, my love, my dove, my beauty, and let us kiss each other all day long. Let us enjoy the charming license which exact thought shows us we shall never be punished for."

This was a result of freedom that the professor had never bargained for. He could not understand it, "because," he argued, "if people were to reason in that way, morality would at once cease to be possible." But he had seen so much of the world lately that he soon recovered himself; and, recollecting that immorality was only ignorance, he began to show Virginia where her error lay—her one remaining error. "I perceive," he said, "that you are ignorant of one of the greatest triumphs of exact thought—the distinction it has established between the lower and the higher pleasures. Philosophers, who have thought the whole thing over in their studies, have become sure that as soon as the latter are presented to men they will at once leave all and follow them."

"They must be very nice pleasures," said Virginia, "if they would make me leave kissing you for the sake of them."

"They are nice," said the professor. "They are the pleasures of the imagination, the intellect, and the glorious apprehension of truth. Compared with these, kissing me would be quite insipid. No truths are so pure and necessary as those of mathematics; you shall at once begin the glorious apprehension of them."

"O Paul," cried Virginia, in an agony, "but I really don't care for truth at all; and you know that, when I broke your tin box open and read your private letters in my search of it, you were very angry with me."

"Ah," said Paul, holding up his finger, "but those were not necessary truths. Truths about human action and human character are not necessary truths; therefore men of science care nothing about them, and they have no place in scientific systems of ethics. Pure truths are a very different character; and, however much you may misunderstand your own inclinations, you can really care for nothing so much as doing a few sums. I will set you some very easy ones to begin with; and you shall do them by yourself, while I magnify in the next room the parasites of the missing link."

Virginia saw that there was no help for it. She did her sums by herself the whole morning, which, as at school she had been very good at arithmetic, was not a hard task for her; and Paul magnified parasites in the next room, and prepared slides for his microscope.

When they met again, Paul began skipping and dancing, as if he had gone quite out of his senses; and every now and then, between the skips, he gave a sepulchral groan. Virginia asked him, in astonishment, what on earth was the matter with him.

"Matter!" he exclaimed. "Why, Humanity is at last perfect! All the evils of existence are removed; we neither of us believe in a God or a celestial future; and we are both in full enjoyment of the higher pleasures and the apprehension of scientific truth. And therefore I skip because Humanity is unspeakably happy; and I groan because it is so unspeakably solemn."

"Alas, alas!" cried Virginia, "and would not you like to kiss me?"

"No," said the professor, sternly, "and you would not like me to kiss you. It is impossible that one-half of Humanity should prefer the pleasure of unlawful love to the pleasure of finding out scientific truths."

"But," pleaded Virginia, "cannot we enjoy both?"

"No," said the professor; "for, if I began to kiss you, I should soon not care two straws about the parasites of the missing link."

"Well," said Virginia, "it is nice of you to say that; but still—Ah me!"

XVII

Virginia was preparing, with a rueful face, to resume her enjoyment of the higher pleasures, when a horrible smell, like that of an open drain, was suddenly blown in through the window.

"Oh, rapture!" cried the professor, as Virginia was stopping her nose with her handkerchief, "I smell the missing link." And in another instant he was gone.

"Well," said Virginia, "here is one comfort. While Paul is away I shall be relieved from the higher pleasures. Alas!" she cried, as she flung herself down on the sofa, "he is so nice-looking, and such an enlightened thinker! But it is plain he has never loved, or else very certainly he would love again."

Paul returned in about a couple of hours, again unsuccessful in his search.

"Ah," cried Virginia, "I am so glad you have not caught the creature!"

"Glad," echoed the professor—"glad! Do you know that till I have caught the missing link the cause of glorious truth will suffer grievously? The missing link is the token of the solemn fact of our origin from inorganic matter. I did catch one blessed glimpse of him. He had certainly a silver band about his neck. He was rolling in a lump of carrion. It is through him that we are related to the stars—the holy, the glorious stars, about which we know so little."

"Bother the stars!" said Virginia; "I couldn't bear, Paul, that anything should come between you and me. I have been thinking of you and longing for you the whole time you have been away."

"What!" cried Paul, "and how have you been able to forego the pleasures of the intellect?"

"I have deserted them," cried Virginia, "for the pleasures of the imagination, which I gathered from you were also very ennobling. And I found they were so, for I have been imagining that you loved me. Why is the reality less ennobling than the imagination? Paul, you shall love me; I will force you to love me. It will make us both so happy: we shall never go to hell for it, and it can not possibly cause the slightest scandal."

The professor was more bewildered than ever by these appeals. He wondered how Humanity would ever get on if one-half of it cared nothing for pure truth, and persisted in following the vulgar impulses that had been the most distinguishing feature of its benighted past—that is to say, those ages of its existence of which any record has been preserved for us. Luckily, however, Virginia came to his assistance.

"I think I know, Paul," she said, "why I do not care as I should do for the intellectual pleasures. We have been both seeking them by ourselves, and we have been therefore egotistic hedonists. It is quite true, as you say, that selfishness is a despicable thing. Let me," she went on, sitting down beside him, "look through your microscope along with you. I think, perhaps, if we shared the pleasure, the missing link's parasites might have some interest for me."

The professor was overjoyed at this proposal. The two sat down side by side, and tried their best to look simultaneously through the eye-piece of the microscope. Virginia in a moment expressed herself much satisfied. It is true they saw nothing; but their cheeks touched. The professor, too, seemed contented, and said they should both be in a state of rapture when they had got the right focus. At last Virginia whispered, with a soft smile:

"Suppose we put that nasty microscope aside; it is only in the way. And then, O Paul!—dear love, dove of a Paul—we can kiss each other to our hearts' content."

Paul thought Virginia quite incorrigible, and rushed headlong out of the room.

XVIII

"Alas!" cried Paul, "what can be done to convince one-half of Humanity that it is really devoted to the higher pleasures and does not care for the lower—at least nothing to speak of?" The poor man was in a state of dreadful perplexity, and felt well nigh distracted. At last a light broke in on him. He remembered that as one of his most revered masters, Prof. Tyndall, had admitted, a great part of Humanity would always need a religion, and that Virginia now had none. He at once rushed back to her. "Ah!" he exclaimed, "all is explained now. You cannot be in love with me, for that would be unlawful passion. Unlawful passion is unreasonable, and unreasonable passion would quite upset a system of pure reason, which is what exact thought shows us is soon going to govern the world. No! the emotions that you fancy are directed to me are in reality cosmic emotion; in other words are the reasonable religion of the future. I must now initiate you in its solemn and unspeakably significant worship."

"Religion!" exclaimed Virginia, not knowing whether to laugh or cry. "It is not kind of you to be making fun of me. There is no God, no soul, and no supernatural order, and, above all, there is no hell. How, then, can you talk to me about religion?"

"You," replied Paul, "are associating religion with theology, as indeed the world hitherto always has done. But those two things, as Prof. Huxley well observes, have absolutely nothing to do with each other. 'It may be,' says that great teacher, 'that the object of a man's religion is an ideal of sensual enjoyment, or—'"

"Ah," cried Virginia, "that is my religion, Paul."

"Nonsense!" replied Paul; "that cannot be the religion of half Humanity; else high, holy, solemn, awful morality would never be able to stand on its own basis. See, the night has fallen, the glorious moon has risen, the stupendous stars are sparkling in the firmament. Come down with me to the sea-shore, where we may be face to face with Nature, and I will show you then what true religion—what true worship is."

The two went out together. They stood on the smooth sands, which glittered white and silvery in the dazzling moonlight. All was hushed. The gentle murmur of the trees and the soft splash of the sea seemed only to make the silence audible. The professor paused close beside Virginia, and took her hand. Virginia liked that, and thought that religion without theology was not perhaps so bad, after all. Meanwhile Paul had fixed his eyes on the moon. Then in a voice almost broken with emotion, he whispered. "The prayer of the man of science, it has been said, must be for the most part of the silent sort. He who said that was wrong. It need not be silent; it need only be inarticulate. I have discovered an audible and a reasonable liturgy which will give utterance to the full to the religion of exact thought. Let us both join our voices, and let us croon at the moon."

The professor at once began a long, low howling. Virginia joined him, until she was out of breath.

"O Paul," she said at last, "is this more rational than the Lord's Prayer?"

"Yes," said the professor, "for we can analyze and comprehend that; but true religious feeling, as Prof. Tyndall tells us, we can neither analyze nor comprehend. See how big Nature is, and how little—ah, how little!—we know about it. Is it not solemn, and sublime, and awful? Come, let us howl again."

The professor's devotional fervor grew every moment. At last he put his hand to his mouth and began howling like an owl, till it seemed that all the island echoed to him. The louder Paul howled and howled, the more near did he draw to Virginia.

"Ah," he said, as he put his arm about her waist, "it is in solemn moments like this that the solidarity of mankind becomes most apparent."

Virginia, during the last few moments, had stuck her fingers in her ears. She now took them out, and, throwing her arms around Paul's neck, tried, with her cheek on his shoulder, to make another little hoot; but the sound her lips formed was much more like a kiss. The power of religion was at last too much for Paul.

"For the sake of cosmic emotion," he exclaimed, "O other half of Humanity, and for the sake of rational religion, I will kiss you!"

The professor was bending down his face over her, when, as if by magic, he started, stopped, and remained as one petrified. Amid the sharp silence, there rang a human shout from the rocks.

"Oh," shrieked Virginia, falling on her knees, "it is a miracle—it is a miracle! God is angry with us for pretending that we do not believe on him."

The professor was as white as a sheet, but he struggled with his perturbation manfully.

"It is not a miracle," he cried, "but a hallucination. It is an axiom with exact thinkers that all proofs of the miraculous are hallucinations."

"See," shrieked Virginia, again, "they are coming—they are coming! Do not you see them?"

Paul looked, and there, sure enough, were two figures, a male and a female, advancing slowly toward them, across the moonlit sand.

"It is nothing," cried Paul; "it cannot possibly be anything. I protest, in the name of science, that it is an optical delusion."

Suddenly the female figure exclaimed, "Thank God, it is he!"

In another moment the male figure exclaimed, "Thank God, it is she!"

"My husband!" gasped Virginia.

"My wife!" replied the bishop (for it was none other than he). "Welcome to Chasuble Island. By the blessing of God it is on your own home you have been wrecked, and you have been living in the very house that I had intended to prepare for you. Providentially, too, Prof. Darnley's wife has called here, in her search for her husband, who has overstayed his time. See, my love, my dove, my beauty, here is the monkey I promised you as a pet, which broke loose a few days ago, and which I was in the act of looking for when your joint cries attracted us, and we found you."

A yell of delight here broke from the professor. The eyes of the three others were turned on him, and he was seen embracing wildly a monkey which the bishop led by a chain. "The missing link!" he exclaimed, "the missing link!"

"Nonsense!" cried the sharp tones of a lady with a green gown and gray, corkscrew curls. "It is nothing but a monkey that the good bishop has been trying to tame for his wife. Don't you see her name engraved on the collar?"

The shrill accents acted like a charm upon Paul. He sprang away from the creature that he had been just caressing. He gazed for a moment on Virginia's lovely form, her exquisite toilet, and her melting eyes. Then he turned wildly to the green gown and the gray, corkscrew curls. Sorrow and superstition he felt were again invading Humanity. "Alas!" he exclaimed, at last, "I do now indeed believe in hell!"

"And I," cried Virginia, with much greater feeling, "ing into the arms of her bishop, 'once more heaven.'—Contemporary Review"

POETS OF CALIFORNIA.

VIII.—FRANCES FULLER VICTOR.

(Mrs. Frances Fuller Victor is a native of the State of New York, but was educated in Ohio, and has lived more among Western than Eastern people. When she was fourteen years of age and lived in Wooster, Wayne County, Ohio, she wrote her first complete poem, which was published in the Wooster Democrat. It was received by the editor, Mr. Sprague, with complimentary remarks, and this trifling encouragement unseated a volcano of verse that continued to find its way into the newspapers for several years. These, though somewhat immature in thought, are remarkably correct in form, and bear the test of metrical rules quite as well as her later poems. When in her teens she wrote often for the Cleveland Herald, edited by Colonel A. J. Harris, and some of her poems were copied by an English journal, which so pleased the Colonel that he wrote her a complimentary letter and sent her the first pay she ever received for authorship. At this time her sister, Metta Victoria, though younger than she, was writing, and as the Cary sisters then lived in Ohio, the papers of that State often referred with pride to the two pairs of poet sisters. The Cary sisters afterward went to New York, but the Fullers remained in the West until they were married. In the meantime the two sisters wrote for the Home? in was, then, conducted by X. P. Willis, and George P. Morris, both received great praise. Edgar A. Poe, in his criticisms on American female poets, made flattering allusions to the poems of the older sister. In later editions this has been expanded, probably because living so far from New York she had been lost sight of. While still young girls a collection of their poems was published by A. S. Barnes & Co. When Mrs. Victor came to the Pacific Coast she wrote for the Golden Era, then in its palmy days; also a series of articles, over the signature of "Florence Fane," with occasional poems for the Pacific. Afterward she was correspondent for the Bulletin, and also wrote letters for the Sacramento Union, and at times for the Call and Chronicle, and was a regular contributor to the Plant Monthly. On going to Oregon she became interested in the peculiar topography of the country, its scenery, and its history, and finding it a new and almost untried field wrote several books relating to it, these were The River of the West, All over Oregon and Washington, and The Vera Peninsula. Mrs. Victor, like many of our California poets, is better known and has done better work as a writer of prose than of poetry. Her work is fresh and vigorous, and without being very "finished" is always correct and agreeable.—R. E. W.]

Waiting.

I cannot wean my wayward heart from waiting,
Though the steps watched for never come near;
The wearying wait clings to it unabating—
The fruitless wish for presences once dear.

No fairer eye e'er blessed a poet's vision;
No softer airs e'er kissed a poet's brow;
No scene more truly could be called Elysian,
Than this which holds my gaze enchanted now.

And yet I pine—this beautiful completeness
Is incomplete to my desiring heart;
'Tis beauty's form without her soul of sweetness,
The pure but chiseled loveliness of art.

There is no longer pleasure in emotion,
I envy those dead souls no touch can thrill,
Who—"painted ships upon a painted ocean"—
Seem to be moved, yet are forever still.

Where are they fled? they whose delightful voices,
Whose very footsteps had a charmed fall;
No more, no more their sound my heart rejoices;
Change, death, and distance part me now from all.

And the fair evening, with remembrance teeming,
Pierces my soul with every sharp regret;
The sweetest beauty saddens to my seeming,
Since all that's fair forbids me to forget.

Eyes that have gazed upon you silver crescent
Till filled with light, then turned to gaze in mine;
Lips that could clothe a fancy evanescent
In words whose magic thrilled the brain like wine;

Hands that have wreathed June roses in my tresses,
And gathered violets to deck my breast;
Where are ye now? I miss your dear caresses—
I miss the lips, the eyes, that made me blest.

Lonely I sit and watch the fitful burning
Of prairie fires, far off, through gathering gloom;
While the young moon and one bright star returning
Down the blue solitude leave Night their room.

Gone is the glimmer of the silent river;
Hushed is the wind that sped the leaves to-day;
How through silence falls the crystal shiver
Of the sweet starlight on its earthward way.

And yet I wait, how vainly! for a token—
A sigh, a touch, a whisper from the past.
Alas! I listen for a word unspoken,
And wait for arms that have embraced their last.

I wish no more, as once I wished, each feeling
To grow immortal in my happy breast;
Since not to feel will leave no wounds for healing—
The pulse that thrills not has no need of rest.

As the conviction sinks into my spirit
That my quick heart is doomed to death in life,
Or that these pangs must pierce and never sear it,
I am abandoned to despairing strife.

To the lost life, alas! no more returning—
In this to come no semblance of the past—
Only to wait! hoping this ceaseless yearning
May ere long end, and rest may come at last.

Sweetser & De Long, manufacturers of sweet cider, have made a nice little point on the managers of the Mechanics' Fair. It appears they have been giving away samples of their beverage as an advertisement of its quality from the stand in the Pavilion, but the managers notified them to quit, as it conflicted with purchased privileges in the dispensing of cider. The firm promptly took the case into court, claiming that they entered their sweet and non-intoxicating drink at the Fair in consequence of circulars and advertisements of the managers, calling upon all persons to send to the great industrial exhibition whatever natural and manufactured products of this coast they might have, promising that all possible facilities should be extended to such exhibitors; therefore the plaintiffs brought their sweet cider to the Pavilion, and it was accepted as an exhibit. How the law will decide this question is as yet undetermined.

They were talking about the weight of different persons in a certain family in Oakland the other evening, and the daughter's young man, who was present, spoke up before he thought, and said: "I tell you that Jenny isn't so very light either, although she looks so." And then he looked suddenly conscious and blushed, and Jenny became absorbed in studying a chromo on the wall.

Patti, says a sympathetic French chronicler, is now a drowning woman, whose face only is seen floating in the water. She is beginning to suffer, and has aged visibly during the past year. She is thin, sad, nervous; her splendor is turning gray and going.

ARCHERY.

Within a very short time, comparatively, the Americans have taken up the old English sport of archery, which at one time was so peculiar a feature of English sport and practice as to make the names of Robin Hood and Littlejohn, the noted foresters of a by-gone age, and Maid Marian, famous in history. Since the sport was introduced here, it has so grown in favor, especially among the ladies who have a timid horror of touching any explosive weapon, that it bids fair to drive out the former popular game of croquet. Archery clubs are springing up in all parts of the United States with such rapidity that the importers of English bows and arrows find it impossible to supply the demand, as the English makers can not manufacture the weapons fast enough to meet the wants of clubs and private individuals. One importing firm in New York has orders on hand for over $5,000 worth that it is impossible to supply, in consequence of the inability of the English makers to make and send on the goods. The English bows are usually made of yew and lance woods; the ornamental bows being pieced with fancy woods which would not be elastic enough in themselves to be so used, but which, when united with a tough, springy wood, make a very handsome looking bow, as well as being serviceable. As the United States Government has placed a heavy duty on imported bows and arrows, American makers have been stimulated by the great demand to attempt the manufacture of bows and arrows out of American woods. Handsome bows are being made in two pieces, after the style of the English, from snake-wood and hickory; the elasticity of the latter overcoming the brittleness of the former. The service bow is made from lance-wood imported from Cuba. Some arrows are made of Georgia pine on account of the wood being light and straight; and prize arrows are being constructed of Georgia pine with snake wood points, an improvement being added by binding the ends of the feathers in the head with silk, so that the damp will not remove them from their places—a disagreeable result which often happens to English arrows if left on the grass during the night. It is estimated that one of the Eastern firms has manufactured ten thousand arrows since the sport began to be popular, and has not in any way been able to supply the demand made upon it from all parts of the country. Orders, often peremptory, come in daily; and, as the English bows and arrows are oversold a long way ahead, and the American makers are not yet ready to fill the demand, many of the would-be archers have to wait for a supply of the articles they so much need. The archery clubs are mostly located in country places, where the owners of real estate have room to spare for archery grounds. The clubs, therefore, visit each other's residences, and form pleasant parties in which the ladies take an active part.

A London writer draws this sombre picture of the distinguished guests at the recent banquet of the Lord Mayor, when the Prime Minister was formally given the freedom of the city: "Never have I seen two faces more painful to look at than those of Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Salisbury, as they passed slowly up to the seat of the Lord Mayor in the Guildhall Library. The countenance of the Prime Minister was of a far more ghastly color than usual, and the only trace of life which it exhibited was a sepulchral and fearfully artificial smile. The really tragic effect was heightened by the Court uniform, the brand-new ribbon of the Garter, and the flash and sparkle of Sir R. Wallace's diamond star. Lord Salisbury looked in the last stage of physical exhaustion, a good twenty years older even than on the day of his return from Berlin. His gaze was fixed on the ground, as if he was not proud of the company in which he found himself, and his face seemed to quiver with intense and suppressed excitement. If this was the progress of triumph, what, I wonder, would that of humiliation have been like?"

Owing to the necessity of settling at once and forever the Chinese question, and many others of kindred importance, and of presenting to our readers, at the same time, the tolerably long selected story concluded this week, there is an accumulation of excellent original matter at this office, the writers of which will, we hope, be as patient and reasonable as we are ourselves. Who waits wins, but the impetuous writer who demanded back the article he had left with us because it did not immediately appear met with a fate that should serve as a warning to all others: he got it.

What a touching story is that of Abelard and Heloise! How they lived and loved away back in the eleventh century, more than seven hundred years ago, and are now lying peacefully side by side in the same grave, carved in enduring marble and stretched out full length upon the same stone! When last in Paris we visited their tomb in the Pèrre le Chaise. It is an open temple built of stone from the ruins of the celebrated Abbey of the Paraclete, founded by Abelard, and of which Heloise was the first Abbess. The iron railing was rusty and brown, the grass was dry, the place was dirty, and, alas! each of the carved figures had its stone nose broken short off.

By thrift he had become a millionaire, and he had a splendid St. Bernard dog which he was very proud of. One day the servant came to him terror-stricken. "Master, master, Caesar is!" "Is what?" "Mad, I'm afraid. He won't touch water any more than if he were a crude apostle of temperance, and there's as much foam about his mouth as if he were the sea in one of Swinburne's poems." "Great Heavens, it is lucky you have discovered it in time. We must not lose a minute. Take the animal, at once, before he has bitten any one." "Yes, sir." "And sell him!"

Mr. John Russell, who was himself shot while attempting to shoot an ex-Supervisor, is denied the sympathy of the public. This community does not approve the shooting of ex-Supervisors while there are a dozen Supervisors still in office.

"Of all Shakespeare's plays," says a witty lady, "that which shows the most creative power is the Two Gentlemen of Verona; for I have been half my life in Verona, and could never find a gentleman in it."

TWO CHURCH ORGANS.

At the Metropolitan Temple there is a huge organ, thirty feet in height, twenty in breadth, and, we presume, thick in proportion. Having no music in our soul we can not say whether this monster of tubes and stops and pedals has any music in it or not. We attended a lecture recently at this place, and from the moment we entered its tremendous bellows was worked by some hidden monster in its cavernous depths at a tremendous rate. A strong-armed, broad-chested young man stamped its pedals, thumped its keys, tugged at its stops, and produced a most marvelous and unprecedented noise. A sick behemoth struggling with a pain in his vast stomach could not have uttered a more unearthly, and, to our uneducated ears, a more unmusical sound. We think perhaps the instrument is less to blame than the strong-armed young man, for he wearied after a time, and when he let the instrument partially alone it emitted some soft and pleasing musical notes.

Traveling once in Switzerland we stopped at Friburg to hear its organ played. It is the thing to do—that is, for tourists to do. Friburg seems to have been built to order to accommodate the cathedral, and the cathedral to have been constructed for the purpose of containing this most famous organ in the world. It plays at midnight. The tourists gather in the cathedral; it is dimly lighted; its solemn aisles are illuminated by only a single pair of wax candles. At the hour of twelve, as the chimes of the cathedral clock finish striking the hour of midnight, the soft and dreamy tones of this magnificent instrument come gently stealing through aisle and corridor, filling the vast vault with its voluptuous music and witching sound. Airy forms, shadows of angels, spirits breathing melodies, seem to outline themselves in the "dim religious light," to poise on tenebrous wings, and fill the cathedral with melody. Then one shuts his eyes and drinks in the fullness of a music that satisfies his soul. Anon comes the wild, crashing sound of some splendid composition that arouses the dreaming sleeper to the consciousness of a struggle of wilder shadows in the darkening air, and his imagination peoples the gloom with fiercer spirits. He listens, and from the streets he hears the tramp of armed men, the peal of military bands, the muffled drum, the clang of arms; and again, the lowing herds, the peaceful sounds of farm and cottage. The music dies away, and, like a pleasant dream, fades into awakening consciousness, and the untuned and unstrung soul of him who does not understand or appreciate music is conscious that it has been filled with divine harmonies.

How great the contrast with the glare and gas, the bounce and bang, the noise and clamor of the strong-armed young man, and the big organ in the Reverend Killoch's Baptist Meeting-house.

Some very touching particulars concerning the death of that good man, Michael Reese, come to us by way of Paris. This most exemplary citizen, whose virtuous life of self-abnegation was spent that he might accumulate money, who regarded himself, during his toilsome journey over the rough sands of time, as a trustee for charitable benefactions, and who at his death left more than three per cent. of the entire amount in discharge of that trust, visited his native land to see the graves of his parents. "In order to avoid paying the customary fee to the sexton, he surreptitiously climbs over the graveyard fence, lingers a while, and then scales the fence again. This time he was discovered by the sexton, who, running up, seized Mr. Reese and demanded to know what he was doing in there. Reese denied that he had been in the cemetery. The sexton, who had seen him, told him he was arrested, and should be taken before the Burgomaster, and started off to town with him. Reese became greatly excited over the humiliating position in which he had placed himself, and got into a wordy wrangle with the indignant sexton, whose ire had been roused by Reese's attempt to evade paying him his fee. It was during this heated discussion that the emotions caused by unusual excitement sent the blood rushing to Mr. Reese's head, and while angrily expostulating with the man who had him under arrest, he fell dead." Some of our readers felt hurt, when this rich man died, that we did not drool and snivel over him; did not lie about him; did not wrap the mantle of charity around him; did not pretend a sentiment that we did not feel, and that nobody felt at his death; did not magnify his charities, excuse his hard, useless life, and grow sentimental in describing his pathetic death at the parental grave, in his distant native land. Such lives, such deaths do not affect us. He lived to save $10,000,000. He died to save a silver groschen.

San Rafael.

She sits within a nest as round and snug
As meadow-lark that broodeth in the grass;
The sweetest hills her shoulders white do hug,
And high above her head the tempests pass.
O peaceful town! O sunny, fragrant hills!
In autumn-tide all yellowed o'er with oats,
In spring made noisy by the tender hills!
Of callow broods; in June with full ripe notes.

Dear their every slope and hollow,
Every linnet, lark, and swallow;
Pluck we there the lupines yellow,
Buttercups on long stems swinging,
Freckled bells for fairies' ringing,
Ropes of morning-glories fine,
Saxifrage, and columbine,
Baby's-eyes, and pansies thick,
With the rosy kiss-me-quick;
Snowy-hoods, like vests praying
'Neath oak-leaves like cymbals playing;
Softest beds regale us there,
Banks of mint and maiden-hair.

Protective, behind us, tall Tamalpais standeth,
As standeth a bird and looks into its nest,
More grateful and prouder than king that commandeth—
His foot in the ocean, in cloudland his crest.
The loveliest stars that the pale evening showeth,
She sets in his coronet, one by one;
The moon smileth on him, the brown elves he knoweth,
And the sweet sylphs that live in the red kneeling sun.

WIT AND HUMOR.

With Some Pointed Examples of the Former.

How extremely pleasant it is to be merry! If any one doubts this dictum, let him essay to prove it. Let him begin with a sense of amusement, however faint, and study carefully the "gay science" till he has reached the realm of hearty merriment; and the dawning smile has graduated, a full and rounded laugh. On the word of a philosopher, this man will grant that it is a delightful thing to be merry. And take a philosopher's word again, this man will not be he that is pinched by dyspepsia, or cadaverous from a long course of Calvinistic theology.

Comparatively speaking, it requires very little to amuse people. Though grown up, they are merely children of a larger size, and the tickling process needs only to be a few degrees more adroit to excite an equal risibility. Some one has said that a man's intellect may be fairly gauged by the nature of the jokes he enjoys. But what, then, shall be said of that highly respectable class to whom joking is unknown? Here comes at the outset the old question of the distinction between wit and humor, which so many writers have tried to settle. Perhaps all would agree thus far, that wit pertains to the pure intellect, the reflective part of our organism, and humor to the perceptive qualities. Humor is never wit, but wit may be, and often is, humorous. So, in gauging a man's intellect by his jokes, it must be remembered that many persons are keenly susceptible to humor while unappreciative of wit, and vice versa. Brilliant wit, like brilliant beauty, is a possession so rare that its undoubted presence draws all eyes upon it. It implies a mental mechanism so difficult of construction, depending on such delicate adjustment of the intellectual faculties, that Nature, with a whole universe on her hands, finds only a few leisure moments to spend upon it. Keen to perceive, instantaneous to apply; divining both fore and after thought in slower minds; pointed, pertinent, sometimes impertinent; often a delight, sometimes a terror; thus armored and equipped, wit makes its way through the world. It passes beyond the eternal aspect of a subject, and detects its hidden analogies. It educes a result all the more brilliant and startling, as the process by which it is reached is hidden. Such wit is inimitable, defying repulse; it puts the truth of a matter more clearly in one short sentence than a long and logical exposition could do. For instance, the definition of a bore—one who talks so much about himself that you can get no chance to talk about yourself; or the startling brevity of Foote's rejoinder to one who told him that the Rockingham ministry were at their wits' end and quite tired out: "It could not have been with the length of their journey," said he. And again, Coleridge, when asked by a lady if he believed in ghosts, replied: "No, madam, I have seen too many to believe in them." Still one more, and this time Sidney Smith's definition of charity: "The instinct which leads A to take something out of B's pocket to give to C." For intense sharpness can this last be equaled?

In trying to recall witty sayings, how charmingly our old friends in the land of authors come to the front, and from their graves afford us merriment. Who is there that can tire of the oft-told jests, the delightful exaggerations of Charles Lamb? Even Coleridge, the serenely great, descends, on occasion, to quips and quirk. Smith and Sheridan sparkle like old wine. And Curran—if our dear Irish brethren will give us another like him we will try to forgive them for Kearney. Really, our "dear Irish brethren" are more amusing (though hardly more original) in the retort verbal than the retort political, in America, at least. God bless them; why cannot they keep to the one line and ignore the other? In the late Kearneyite affliction that fell upon Oakland and San Francisco, it was extremely amusing to note the Irish sense of humor struggling with the Irish belligerence. One Irishman, speaking of the Chinese, declared: "Be-gorry, we'll drive 'em to their last point of refuge." "An' that'll be the gallows-noose for shure," says another; at which pugnacity died, and a hearty laugh ensued. At Market Street station a workman hanged a small audience on that fertile subject—"The Chinese must go." "Bedad," said he, in accent most unmistakably Hibernian, "bedad, we'll have no foreigners here; we'll drive ivery one of thim out and have the country to ourselves."

In this connection must not be forgotten the Irishman who jumped on the ferry-boat just as the plank was removed. He fell on his face, and by the time he had picked himself up some thirty feet or more lay between the boat and the landing. With mingled delight and admiration at his own prowess, he exclaims, as he surveys the widening distance: "Jaysus! what a lape!"

Volumes might be written on the fertile humor of Ireland, but we spare the reader. In strong contrast with her ready brilliancy is the slow action of the average English brain and the Scotch disposition to try a joke by the rules of logic. And again, how broadly these contrast with the acute wit of France. Indeed, there appears to be a subtle aroma in the French intellect that is rarely attained by our Saxon minds. It may be race, it may be a peculiar direction of culture, but whatever it is, it is inimitable. It gives an iridescent glow to their entire intellectual fabric. Where have we anything like the random brilliancy of Merrimée, in his "Lettres à l'Inconnue"? Here are a few examples taken carelessly, almost as the book fell open: "Renan," he writes, "has just published an idyl, which he calls the 'Life of Jesus.'" "Women at Athens, in the time of Pericles, were already a recognized force; they made men commit follies." He was once taken seriously ill while paying a fashionable call, and wrote about it afterward to his friend, saying: "I almost committed the indiscretion of dying at a house where I was not sufficiently intimate to take the liberty."

In comparison with writers of this stamp, our Saxon perceptions lack fineness; our sarcasm, polish. Moreover, in America at least, our intellect is of that extremely practical and business-like order, which admits of the reductio ad absurdum method rather than of purely satiric analysis. Of humor, America is full; wit is almost lacking as a national characteristic. No other country has produced an Artemus Ward, a Mark Twain; but, on the other hand, we have no Heine or Charles Lamb, no Talleyrand or Curran, no Thackeray. If we are to possess their like, it will be a product of the future; the present knows them not. E. N.

THAT PROPERTY OF MINE.

"Thou shalt not steal."—OLD PLAY.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Your journal claims to be independent. Let us see. If you publish this, you are. I am the owner of five hundred shares of the Spring Valley Water Company's stock. I have owned it from the beginning; have thus been benefited by all the waterings, all the legislation, and all the litigation that have given it value. I am the owner of other property, and I am not an orphan. I am not a horny-handed son of toil. I do not even possess the virtue of poverty. I assert, without fear of contradiction by Mr. Fitch of the Bulletin, or Mr. Pickering of the Call, that my five hundred shares of Spring Valley water stock is as honest property and as honestly acquired as their newspapers. I assert that it has not done more in the way of creating fictitious values, that it has not been guilty of oftener controlling and securing beneficial legislation for itself, than these two papers; that it has not been oftener in the courts in defense of itself than they have; that its water-rate collectors are not as vexatious as the advertisement solicitor, nor as the agent that goes from door to door in search of subscribers; that it does more good in putting out fires, in sprinkling streets, in promoting the public health, in preserving the public morals, in sustaining property values, than the two journals in question, by their eternal, never-ending quarrels, their sensational scares, their dishonest misrepresentation of business men, their encouragement of sand-lot adventurers, and their minute exposition of all the disgusting details of crime. I assert that Spring Valley does not as dishonestly and meanly evade paying its taxes as do the journals in question. The ARGONAUT has said that the Call is worth $300,000, and pays taxes on $7,500. I assert that the papers—in proportion to the importance of their relation to the public—get more money out of the public treasury, for advertising and by other indirect means, than does Spring Valley. If more money is spent in San Francisco for water than bread, it is also true that there is more expended for newspapers than Bibles. As to the personnel of the management, I assert that the directors and stockholders of Spring Valley are as respectable, as honorable, and as honest as Mr. Fitch or Mr. Pickering. I assert that there is no one honest way to get the Spring Valley property, and that is to buy it. I assert that water is not more indispensable than bread, and that the city would have the same right to seize a bakery as to steal Spring Valley. I assert that there is no city where the cost of water is lower than here, and if the whole cost of water for fires, sewers, streets, parks, and public buildings is placed upon 17,000 rate-payers, and all property of non-consumers shirks its duty of providing water for security, health, and pleasure, is it not the company's fault? I assert further, that the company is so firmly entrenched in its legal rights that it cannot be disturbed by ambitious politicians or newspaper editors, who cover subversion to one corporation by angry assaults upon another. This property pays me nine per cent. per annum; it formerly paid six, and for a long time nothing. To assault its value, attack its management, and misrepresent everything in connection with it, are cowardly and unjust things to do. Messrs. Fitch and Pickering ought to be ashamed of their course, and of the dishonorable motives that prompted them to the mendacious assaults they have made upon the rights of private persons. I write this communication, not to defend the Directors nor the President, but because I am indignant that my property, honestly acquired and lawfully maintained, is forever being undermined by these blind underground moles and gophers of the press. In order that this argument may stand upon its merits, I make the further admission that I am not an American citizen, thank God, and never intend to be. I am an Englishman, and I know enough of the law of both our nations to prophesy that when a debauched public sentiment shall be strong enough to justify the courts in stealing my five hundred shares of Spring Valley water stock, no other property in San Francisco will be worth holding.

Air-Flushed Sewers.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—Some remarks of yours last week call my attention to a system of sewer ventilation which, it seems to me, might be adopted with very little expense at the foot of some one of our large sewers as an experiment. I would build a tall chimney, or tower, practically air-tight, which should be of equal capacity in cubic feet to the inlets or catch-basins above, and with a self-adjusting valve in the sewer just below the location of the tall tower to cut off the draft from the open end of the sewer. The top of this tower should be arranged with a cover supported on rods a sufficient height above the top of the tower to prevent downward or counter-currents. It seems to me that the large volume of air constantly demanded by the tower would draw the foul air down through the sewer, and out at the top. This might not be complete, but it might materially assist in promoting more satisfactory results than could be otherwise obtained. Such a tower for experimental purposes could be constructed at slight expense. T.

Everybody ought to know how to make ice cream in these days; so a lady has kindly sent us the recipe for what she considers the "best brand." It is necessary that the cream should be of the best quality; and the utensils in which it is made must be absolutely clean. With every quart of the cream mix six ounces best pulverized white sugar, a very little vanilla bean, and the white of one egg. The latter imparts a smoothness and delicacy to the cream that can not otherwise be obtained. The prepared mixture is then to be stirred in the freezer until it is entirely congealed. Those who desire first-rate ices or cream should follow these directions carefully, and avoid the use of corn-starch or other thickeners. Instead of vanilla as a flavor for the cream, a trifling amount of any desired flavoring syrup or juice may be used, as strawberry, pineapple, orange, lemon, etc.

When we reflect that Captain Bogardus is the only man living who can shoot 300 glass balls inside of twenty-one minutes, and that if he were prostrated on a bed of sickness, or laid in the silent grave, the world would contain no man who could shoot 300 glass balls in less than twenty-two and a half minutes, we can appreciate, to some extent, the importance of his health to the nation.

THE POMP AND CIRCUMSTANCE OF LABOR.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—In one of your late issues the employees of the California Street Railroad felt gratified that you alluded to them as gentlemen although they occupied so humble a sphere in life. Three-fourths of us did not believe that the article published reflected on us or needed a reply, more especially to insult you. In fact, we felt pleased to believe that it might prevent further flunkysim, and have some weight with the powers that be, as the cap was only a feeler for a uniform. But among so large a number of men as are employed on the road, a few flunkies, or suckers as they are vulgarly called on railroads, will creep in; the California Street Railroad is no exception, and the four men that head the Call's advertisement (three engineers and one conductor) are ours—four extras making from $40 to $54 per month, not $75, as they say. This worthy four discovered some time ago that their exterior needed embellishing, and by persistent toadying induced the superintendent to allow them to wear the odious gold braid and bullion, and thus force it upon the rest of us, who are not proud to wear it. Soon after, they discovered that their pride could not endure the word "driver," although three of them are ex-horse-car drivers, and forthwith received permission to substitute "engineer." And had it not been for your timely article, that threw a bombshell into their camp, they would, by the same influence, have forced on us the blue uniform and brass buttons. They were balked in their darling object, but in their conceit thought they were equal to the emergency. They would appeal to the public, and concocted, and with the assistance of some one possessed of more brains than the whole quartet, wrote that absurd advertisement. It might be asked why so many of us signed this foolish document? I think I can give the answer of the majority. Because many of us are married, and all anxious to obtain an honest living, and it was generally understood that the superintendent wished it signed, and the quartet went round with "You will find it to your interest," or "Your situation will be in peril." Can the public or yourself wonder in these hard times that many of us sacrificed our manhood and did not refuse? I do not write this individually, but express the views of all but the four real flunkies and two or three of their friends. My object in writing is to give you the true facts under the hope that you may see fit to reply to these "noodles." Passengers freely express the opinion that we are all fools, and we wish you to disabuse their minds to some extent, and should you wish to verify the above I refer you to—* Yours, etc., "DISGUSTED EMPLOYEE."

*Our correspondent here appends the numbers (which for obvious reasons we omit) of thirteen conductors and drivers.

Conundrums.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Is Mr. Pond, now acting as agent of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, the same who on one occasion in San Francisco was impresario of a dog show?

Has the sand-lot gone to the Rev. Mr. Kalloch, or the Rev. Mr. Kalloch gone to the sand-lot? On Tuesday evening's lecture at the Baptist Temple, I observed Messrs. Wellock, Dr. O'Donnell, Clitus Barbour, and other eminent agitators upon the stage.

If Clitus and his associates could be baptized by immersion—in soap and water—what a blessed conversion it would be. If cleanliness is next to godliness, they would be more than half way on their journey to regeneration—from dirt.

How many cases of baptism by immersion are known in the Scriptures? 1st, The flood, where the only family that was not immersed was the one that was saved. 2d, The swine that jumped into the sea, filled with devils, and they were drowned. 3d, Jonah, who was thrown overboard, and rescued from death by immersion by being swallowed by a whale, and thrown back upon dry land. 4th, Peter was sinking, and it took the power of the Divine Master to rescue him in response to his outcry.

If it is wicked to drink wine, why did Christ deem it necessary by a miracle to convert water into wine at the marriage feast?

Ought diplomatic relations to be broken off between the governments of the United States and China because of articles published in "an obscure weekly paper of limited circulation?"

[We don't know any of these things.—EDS. ARGONAUT].

It was a law among the Thessalians that women should not drink wine, but that, of whatever age they might be, they should have water only. Theophrastus affirms that a similar law prevailed among the Milesians. In the early ages of Rome it is certain that the use of it was altogether interdicted to the female sex. When any of them infringed this rule their husbands, or nearest relatives, were authorized to chastise them; and, in the time of Romulus, there was even a law which subjected them to capital punishment if found in a state of intoxication. While the women were thus wholly excluded from the pleasures of wine, the men themselves indulged in them but moderately; but when, in later times, drinking to excess became the vice and boast of the male sex, they could not in consistency refuse to the partners of their joys some share of participation in the dear excess. The laws on the subject, being once relaxed, fell quickly into desuetude; and at length we find the ladies of Rome boldly rivaling their husbands in their bacchanalian orgies. Seneca represents them as passing whole nights at table, and, with charged goblets in their hands, not only vying with, but surpassing the most robust debauchees.

A New Haven young lady snuffs candles and cores apples with a pistol, and when a young man in that town thinks that he loves her, and wants to propose, he mails her a letter from some distant town, or pokes it over the back fence on the end of a pole, and then makes a dash for home and his life.

Remorse is the least active of all a man's moral senses. We grieve at being found out, and at the idea of shame or punishment, but the mere sense of wrong makes very few people unhappy.

When Charles Fox's house was on fire, he four to save it useless, and, being a good draughtsman, up to the next hill to make a drawing of the fire.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

MY DEAR EM:—I am more than glad to be able to tell you that it really begins to look as if business is getting back again to its old briskness. Everywhere I find brighter faces and more hopeful looks than I did even a month ago. Keane, one of the most industrious of men in catering for the insatiable feminine appetite for novelties between you and me, we are not so very much worse than men after all, has just opened his new department this week, for cloak and dress making. The whole rear of his spacious store has been converted into a show room, lined with handsome glass cases to contain choice and delicate suits, and stands for the exhibition of cloaks. The samples already completed give promise of excellent work, and the prices are all that can be desired. Mr. Keane has put this department in the care of Mr. A. Keating, for years the head of an extensive cloak house in Philadelphia, so I can guarantee that everything will be done in first-rate style. Some very handsome novelties in outside wraps will be ready for showing during the coming week, and I shall give you a full account of everything handsome and new as it comes out. Over at the Ville de Paris I chanced upon a "treasure-trove" yesterday, in the shape of some of the loveliest hand-embroidered cashmeres you ever saw. One was in the rich chocolate brown shade, the sprigs scattered over it being done in colored sewing silks, in that long "satin" stitch that used to be so much used in embroidering satin and velvet vests for gentlemen, the same, by the bye, too, as that piece of Marie Antoinette's court dress, which I showed you once, is worked in. You remember it, with its silvery, shimmering shade of green and net-work of peach color and white silk embroidery, that looks like a flower of the most delicate lace. Well, this, in its way, is almost as beautiful: and the patterns are only fifty dollars each. The new dress goods are still "bourette" in character, but so much more beautiful than anything we have yet had, that one can forgive them for not being absolutely new. They are heavier, more silky, more oriental than ever, and there are a dozen at least of fresh patterns on the same counters, with the appropriate colors in velvets for combination suits draped against them in the most tantalizing fashion. Mr. Bernard called my attention to a pretty neck ruching for morning wear, made of colored satin, edged with Valenciennes, as a bit of home manufacture, made, I think he said, at Muser's. New ribbons for the hair and neck for misses come about an inch in width, reversible and figured in chinois patterns. Neck ties of the latest styles range as high as five dollars, so you may know they are very elegant; chenille tags and embroidery of the same being largely used. But the cutest little things yet are the crib blankets, with the name "Baby" worked in the centre of each in worsted chenilles, some with large bunches of flowers or wreaths surrounding the name; others plainer. It was so long since I had been in to Vanderslice's, that I went in on Thursday for a moment's chat, and found myself well rewarded, for I saw one of the handsomest silver sets of the season, which had just been sold for a thousand dollars a day or so before. I should have fancied it a special design for some victorious General, for the design was purely military, soldiers, flags, cannon balls, and all the paraphernalia of war being used in the ornamenting; but it was bought by one of the most peaceable of men, whose name I regret I am unable to divulge. You will see and recognize it some day, I do not doubt. But the pièce de resistance in the exhibition way was the magnificent service of plate made by this firm and presented by Mr. L. L. Bradbury to the Superintendent of the "Tajo" mine in Mexico. It contains 108 pieces, two dozen of each size in forks, spoons and knives, and cost $2,700. Nothing has been forgotten. There are tea and coffee urns, cake basket, castor, and an immense silver, rich, massive handles, in the middle of which is the inscription, "Tajo, Dec. 20, 1877," and the monogram of the recipient is made entirely of silver from the one mine. On each side is a fine piece of chasing; one design being a picture of the mill and works, the other, a miner with pick on shoulder, and implements scattered around. The set is made of silver from the one mine, and is a triumph of goldsmith's work. The chest that contains it is fully three feet high and nearly square. You can form an idea of it when I tell you that seventy-five dollars worth of silk velvet was used in lining it. I saw, too, the $4,000 service, of solid silver, the fac simile of the one Mr. O'Brien presented to Mr. Flood not so very long ago. It is probably the only full dinner service in solid ware in stock in San Francisco, at present. Everything is massive and glistening, and the largest dishes furnished with covers of silver; but I really like the Bradbury set best after all. A graceful vase in silver and gold, a repetition of the one presented to Edwin Booth by the ladies of the San Francisco Hospital, stands on the counter, and attracts universal admiration, as well as the Centennial Trophy given by the city to the best marksman in the National Guard. The design of this last is very handsome. It is a vase, plate shaped, supported on one side by a Continental, on the other by a Union soldier, each resting on his gun. Back and front, in the centre, the appropriate emblems of war, flags, liberty caps, and so on are done in gold. There is a deal of work in these small figures, as they are all cast like any other statues before being wrought in the metal. The manufacturing branch of the business, suspended during the past year, is to be reopened the coming month—still another evidence of an improvement in the financial market. Those pretty "Marguerite" teaspoons you used to admire so much are a specialty with this firm. You recollect them; each has a daisy in white enamel and gold on the handle. "Our mutual friend," Charlie LeGay, has capital taste, if one may judge from several of his selections of jewelry for Mr. Vanderslice since he has been in Paris. There are some exquisite sets, paintings on pale blue and on black enamel, that will bear the closest examination with the microscope: and I have been told that the most elaborate piece of cameo cutting on the Pacific coast is their $300 set with the design of a medieval knight and lady in a Romeo and Juliet attitude. I certainly never saw anything finer. The medallion head of Vanderslice, the painter, is another beautiful thing. There is an air of fascination to me in fine table linens, so that I am wont to send them out whenever anything new and handsome comes in; and that special right-hand counter at the White House frequently sees your friend lingering over its treasures in that line. Among the newest styles are the "Kusse" and the "Oriental" patterns. The "Moresque" is a mass of graceful lines and tangles, and the "Grecian" combines the regular border of that school with a mingling of tropic palms, mistletoe, fuchsias, and convolvulus for the centre. The floral scroll is another beautiful design: the whole length is formed of cunningly joined flower wreaths, the upper portions of which are made light and airy by spears of wheat, rye, and graceful grasses, the lower being filled with lilies, asters, and other massive blossoms. The north of France, you know, is particularly famed for the gloss, finish, and beauty of design of its linen goods; though it would be difficult to make a choice sometimes on the latter point between them and the Irish goods, the designs for a single piece of which sometimes cost four hundred dollars, before it is put to the loom. For à-la-lite luncheons are the pretty checkerboard napkins that, in the larger sizes, are used as table covers. What are you going to have in the way of fall suits? Will you let me advise? There are some new cloths—just the thing for this weather—opened this week at Kennedy & Durr's—the Pavilion—on Market Street. They are heavy in appearance, but their softness makes them really light to wear; of the richest dark colors, and the pattern is a small square, or nearly square, in a heavy silk cord, in which gold is the predominant color. For all that, they are not at all glaring, and made up over velvet kilts of the same color, are simply charming. The deep blue would suit you to a "T." They are known as the "Princess Thyra" cloth, after Denmark's favorite daughter and the younger sister of the Princess of Wales; come in double width, at $2, and are going to create a fièvre, I think. The $2.50 and $3 velvets, both in the dark colors for suits and the light shades for evening, are specially excellent. Black velvets, too, usually higher than colored, are here the same price—which is well to know now that the fall season is coming, when heavy suits will be needed. Rich black brocaded silks are another feature, the finest qualities coming from $3 to $4 a yard. I am glad you gave me carte blanche as to the corsets you desired me to get. I have sent you a pair from this same store to try, as they are something quite new, the front steel being made quite broad at the lower end and rounded into the figure, like the patent "Moody" corset, but much better in shape, and there are side lacings to insure a perfect fit over the hips. Where was I? Oh, yes, telling you of dress goods. Well, here are some points as to their make up: The "Lavandière," or washerwoman costume, quite short and fuller about the hips than has lately been allowed, is going to be a favorite this fall. The skirt is plaited up to the knee, above which is a second plait folded upward and fastened at the back, to simulate an overskirt. The body is made either in blouse form, gathered into a yoke, or else plaited back and front without the yoke, and belted in at the waist. The triple Carrick cape, or the sleeveless basque, are worn with it. The "Balsamo" is another novelty. It is short, coming to the ankles; kilts Scotch fashion, and the upper skirt slightly draped across the front, but looped in plaits at the back. The bodice is a cuirass and very long-waisted, and opens in front over a waist, either of silk or white pique, or even of white cloth, for full dress. A deal of shirring, the finer the better, is the thing on all silks, just now, backs, fronts, cuffs, collars, pockets, vests, backs of sleeves; in fine, wherever shirring can possibly be compassed. For children's dresses it has come to be an absolute requirement of fashion, and in the light silks especially it is certainly very pretty for both old and young. Cashmere polonaises are handsome made with the "Princess" back and shirred fronts. I greatly fear that we are rapidly and surely drifting away from the simplicity of the ancient Greeks, those models for all ages. Just see the difference between the Greek "chiton" and the present fashions. It was made exactly the height of the wearer, from crown to heel, the width twice the length, so that, when sewed up, it forms a square. There was a hem at the bottom, perhaps a narrow band of embroidery just above it. Four loops on the upper edge, back and front; a small bunch of plaits at each and a length of ribbon crossed over the back and breast, and fastened at the waist before putting it on; two ornamental buttons just in front of the shoulders on which to hang the tunic, and if desired, one or two buttons and loops to form sleeves, and that was all. By the bye, if you want to make a change in your dressmaker, Mrs. de Lorme has gone back into the business for herself since you went away, and is doing very tasteful work, I hear. The present place, Thurlow Block. My friend, Mrs. Kate Boyd, who, I told you some weeks ago, is teaching a class in porcelain painting at the Clarke Institute, and another at the Cosmopolitan Hotel, has lately been doing those beautiful menu cards at Bancroft's that are being so greatly admired for their daintiness and originality. These are of the new shape, and similar in that respect to the latest visiting cards, about an inch wide and three inches long. I believe they intend decorating some of the turn-down corners of the large cards in the same way for "visites." I know they will be charming. The billets de correspondance get prettier and prettier with each new invoice. The last I saw have certainly reached a climax, for what with the cases of dark leather, "leatherette" I think they call it, lined with satins in pink, blue and purple, stamped on the top with a coronet, and fastened by a gilded lock, they are elegant enough for holiday gifts to any one. The boxes, when emptied, make very suitable little jewel boxes besides. Infants' cards, with envelopes to match, come in the same shapes as those for larger folks. On them is inscribed, either in printing or writing, the name and date of the arrival of the new-comer. As to shoes, there are really some novelties. One, the Chinese slipper, is quaint enough with its pointed, turn-up box-toe, and equally pointed Louis Quinze heel. They don't look comfortable, but at Maynard & Jones', where I saw them, they assure me they are exceedingly so. There is a strap across the instep and the back of the shoe extends and forms another for the ankle. Coarse linen and prunella slippers are a new affectation, or, rather, an old one revived. The latter are bound round the edges, and have ribbon bows of the same color as the dress worn. The prunella are always made with three narrow straps across the instep and cut-steel buckles in the fashion of daisies. Again, the linen ones may be embroidered with linen floss to look very pretty. The "Pompadour," a slipper of silk or velvet, richly embroidered with silk or chenille, with a thread of gold or silver in it, will come in with the later fall stock. Very handy and equally sensible are the gaiter tops of check or plain goods, to be used with the low house shoes when one wishes to avoid the trouble of an entire change. The old proverb, "a lady born and bred, dresses her heels and then her head," comes in here, and suggests that I have some pretty things in the way of millinery to discourse about to you. At Miss McCarrick's I found several novelties. Among them the "Cromwell," one of the prettiest of the new styles, which has a very wide brim that is either to be turned up or worn down to suit the fancy of the wearer. A pattern hat was trimmed with a full feather, black, with tiny golden tags on the tip of every spray, a full bow at the back of velvet and silk mixed, and a face trimming of black velvet with a double row of gilt braid on the edge. Another, a dress bonnet, was of cream-colored chip, ornamented on the outside with quantities of ivory satin ribbon an inch in width, and a massive wreath of rich red, pink, and tea roses on the top and one side. The face trimming consists of rose buds and half-blown blossoms. One of the most noticeable hats is a white chip with face trimmings of pale blue, and a blue ostrich feather and broad, flat bows of the same delicate shade on the outside. It is to be worn slightly tilted back on the head, and is as pretty and à la mode as can be. The new trimmings are striped velvets, the same plain or brocaded, and for lighter hats, the "Nabob" gauze, which combines all the rich oriental colors, and several new styles in ribbons. Among these last is the "palm-leaf" pattern, which has small palm-leaves scattered through it over rich, dark satin ground-work. The "mottled" ribbon is another new one, with minute designs in Persian colors on a similar background. Scarfs, even of velvet, will be much worn. The "bouquet bow," a pretty novelty, bids for popularity. It is made of twelve loops of ribbon in six different colors, and the whole is arranged in the form of an irregular rosette. The newest thing in feathers is the shaded ostrich and the cock's plumes, tipped with gold or steel beads. A pretty fancy, and one easily indulged in this climate where flowers are so plentiful, is to adorn the hat or bonnet with fresh, natural blossoms every day instead of the usual trimmings. For this purpose the "porte bouquet," an oxidized silver affair, usually in the form of a coiled snake which fastens by a pin in the bonnet, is the convenient thing. I hardly think, however, that the fashion will be largely followed, for artificials are now made so exquisitely as to rival even Nature herself, and they are, moreover, a deal more convenient. At Miss Stacom's, on Post Street, I saw some very tasteful mourning bonnets that by their graceful trimmings seemed to lighten them of much of their usually dreary character. The close-fitting bonnet seemed best adapted for this sort of wear, but the "Ruthven," a pretty shape, and likely to become a favorite here from its adaptability to our windy climate, and even the "Ellerslie," with its high, square crown, and brim turned up on the edges, trim very handsomely with crape and lustreless silk. In colored hats, the prettiest there were the "Jura," in split straws of all shades, and the "Cleopatra," a feathered braid of all tints and colors mixed together, are the newest for little girls and misses; but, as you see, in all of them, there is not yet a very marked difference from those of the past summer. The later fall will probably bring us the real novelties in the shape of the latest productions of English inventive genius—the "Mother Hubbard," the ancient poke bonnet, trimmed only with a huge scarlet bow on top, and strings of the same color tying directly under the chin; the "Dame Trot," and the "Mother Bunch." The "Beefeater," an exact reproduction of the headgear worn by the heralds in royal processions since the days of Henry of matrimonial memory, I hope will give us the go-by, for I am sure it must be simply horrid; the others, queer though they are, have something picturesque to commend them. The new millinery, Werner's, on Kearny Street, near Sutter, has opened during the past week or so with a handsome assortment of flowers, feathers, and untrimmed hats and bonnets. A new firm that will be in fine running order in the course of the coming week is that of Billings, Harbourn & Co., who succeed Mr. Beach, the popular stationer and bookseller of Montgomery Street. The business, I understand, is to be continued at the same place as formerly, together with the premises adjoining now occupied by Burr & Finck, as the large stock lately expected from the East will render extra room necessary for some months to come at least. The gentlemen themselves have all been with Mr. Beach for some years, and have a large commercial acquaintance. I do not doubt but that they will be fully successful in their new venture. Now I'll tell you of something lovely, but you must not breathe it to a living soul, for Mr. Ackerman told me the other day in the strictest confidence. He is thinking of giving a dolls' matinee before long, and such dolls as he has this year you never saw! The dresses were all made in Paris by leading dress-makers, of the richest brocades, silks, and velvets, and in the latest fashions; also the hats. Some of them—the dolls, I mean—are as large as a child three or four years old, and the faces are the most perfect I ever saw; teeth and everything complete. Don't, for mercy's sake, say I told you, or I shall never get a first look at anything again, and there were any number of deliciously suggestive packed boxes clattering up their sidewalk yesterday; so I know the Christmas wonders must have begun to arrive. Write soon, and believe me always yours,

LILLIAS DUBOIS.

To COOK MACARONI, AS SKEWER IS NAMED.—Have a half pint of rich meat gravy in which there are some of the shreds of the meat; two tomatoes, half a clove of garlic, chopped very fine and well cooked in the gravy. Take half a pound of macaroni in long pieces, soak in warm water ten minutes; after which place in a tin pan, cover with boiling water, and immerse the pan in a larger vessel containing enough water to boil well. Pour off water and pour in the gravy. Season well with cayenne pepper and a little salt. Add three ounces of old cheese. Shake the ingredients occasionally (do not stir for fear of breaking the macaroni), and cook fifteen minutes. When done add a tablespoonful of butter, and sprinkle two ounces of grated Parmesan cheese over the top when dished. A la mode beef gravy is the best, and we find soup is better than water to cook it in. This receipt is given the second time by request.

An Indiana preacher made use of the expression, "the iconoclastic segregate of sin," last Sunday, and has already received a call to a church in Boston.

EXTRACTS FROM MY DIARY.--V.

By an Early Californian.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

Upon leaving Sonoma, our first stopping-place was the embryo city of Napa, and there we decided to pass the night, at the store of one of our acquaintances. The principal building in all our new towns is the store. We saw some very fine looking Indians here who came from Clear Lake, at the upper end of Napa Valley, to work for the rancheros in harvesting their crops. They did not appear to understand Spanish, but got along with a word here and there accompanied with signs. The men wore pieces of wood, nicely smoothed and rounded and about four inches long, in each ear, and their hair was tied with grass in a bunch on the front part of their heads in helmet shape, giving them a martial look. With the exception of the waist cloths, both men and women were naked, which gave us an opportunity of admiring their fine figures. As it was warm they frequently refreshed themselves by a dive into the waters of the creek, swimming like Kanakas, and apparently enjoying every moment like so many children. The next morning we were early on our way, and, after fording the creek, came up with a party just breaking up their camp. As they were undoubtedly for the mines, we rode up and assured ourselves of the fact. The party consisted of three trappers and a Columbia River squaw. My companion was acquainted with two of them, named — Kelsey and Jacob Green. So we concluded, although we knew from their pack animals that they would travel slowly, to join issue; they were to take a short cut which we hoped would be to our advantage. A very high mountain had to be crossed between Napa and Suisun valleys, but we at last climbed it and reached its foot, and came upon the house of some American settlers. Here Mr. — and I stopped for breakfast, letting our companions trudge on by themselves for a while. The breakfast was good, but the luxurious part of it, to my taste, was two large tumblers full of milk. The conversation, of course, turned upon the mines, and "I calculated" from it that our host would follow close upon our heels. We caught up with the trappers after a three-leagues' gallop, and found them squatting near the adobe of Don —, a New Mexican by birth and a great rascal by reputation. I admired some fine horses he was driving into his corral; and, upon introducing myself, he invited us all in to take a drink of milk. Our road, after leaving —'s, lay through a perfectly flat prairie, which to the extreme right joined the sky, forming a horizon like that at sea. We could distinctly see the windings of the Sacramento River, marked out by the trees upon its banks, but we could not approach it on account of the tulare—a sort of bog not dry at this season. Our course was a roundabout and monotonous one, with nothing to relieve the flatness of the view but an occasional band of antelopes or a solitary elk, which occasionally approached us from curiosity. Our mouths watered for one at supper time, but, with all Jacob's ingenuity, he could not get the wind of them. The little squaw, who was Jacob's property, amused me much. She seemed to be the happiest of mortals. She was a vaquero, and her little pony and herself seemed to have a perfect understanding as they twisted and turned in their efforts to keep the animals in the road. She rode Lima fashion; but so ingeniously had she wrapped a blanket around her left side and foot that we did not make the discovery, until sometime after we joined them. Whether this was her own idea to prevent shocking us or others they might meet I can not say, but it spoke volumes for innate delicacy somewhere. The sun left us on the banks of a dry creek. It was a pretty place for a camp, only that the wild oats were so high that we had to spend some time in treading them down. We placed our saddles around the spot marked out for the fire, and after watering our horses and staking them out to feed, we began collecting wood. We soon had a bright fire, in which Marie cooked dried bear meat and venison, and boiled the coffee for our evening repast. Delmonico never set before me a meal more to my taste, and we chatted over it and after it most pleasantly. Jacob and I had a long talk in French. I found that he was born in Switzerland, and had been in New York, where he knew Mr. de Rham; afterward he was tempted to go to Canada and turn trapper, and at last, a short time since, he had found his way to California just in time for the gold. There was something charming in the independent, healthy, out-door life which the old fellow was leading—every moment active and enjoyable, probably, until death approached, perhaps suddenly, and then a welcome rest. When bed-time came I laid my saddle-cloths and machillo on the ground, and, rolling myself in my serape, laid my head on my saddle-tree, and was soon sound asleep. In the morning I found my serape somewhat damp from the heavy dew, but it harmed me not, and I never felt more refreshed. Mr. — and I were early in the saddle, resolving, as our fellow-travelers were of the slow and easy kind, to push on and make our forty miles by times. When twenty-five of them were accomplished over the same prairie land, and we had passed Cache Creek, we stopped to refresh ourselves with a wash. Our next halt was at Knight's rancho, where we intimated that breakfast would be acceptable, tying our horses before the door in anxious expectation of the event. We found Mr. Knight to be a graduate from that great school, the world, and of wonderful experiences. Time passed rapidly as he related stories about Fremont, the Bear Flag, and the placers of New Mexico. A very pretty girl soon announced the almuerzo, introducing us to ham and eggs, beef-steaks, frijoles, good warm bread, and, above all, to fresh milk. I complimented Mr. Knight on the fair complexion, good looks, and the altogether American appearance of his son. "Yes," said he, "pretty fair complexion, considering that his mother was a Mexican, and hers an Indian. I took her from the mines of New Mexico." He was already preparing to leave for El Dorado. We wished him luck, paid our reckoning, and did not stop again until we had crossed the Sacramento River, which we did in canoes, towing the horses behind. We reached Sutter's Fort at supper-time, and were in the gold region, the largest placers being twenty-five and sixty miles away, with less important ones at intermediate places. On entering the only store yet opened here just outside the walls of the fort I saw a succession of rough customers coming and going, with gold to be weighed and with purchases made, and I began to realize that the bags, and heaps, and rooms full of gold in the Arabian Nights were by no means impossible. What a pretty thing to look at is gold, whether it comes from a steel-beaded purse in mint drops, or a Hoosier's buckskin bag in the virgin dust! As my fellow-traveller was now called away on business, I determined to accept the convey of —, of the Brooklyn, who was to leave the next morning for Mormon Island, and a placer which he calls his own. Little did I think when I saw him leaving New York that we could ever make a pilgrimage together, and to so golden a shrine. The lower placers were discovered by two Mormons, whom — induced to share their pickings with him. Being on government land the three insist that they have a preemption right to it, and by such title claim one-third of all the washings made within a mile of the spot. About thirty men work in the neighborhood and strange to say they pay the strange tax. Many of them I knew, and, after taking dinner, I borrowed a tin pan and tried my hand at washing. A young fellow very kindly showed me where he was working successfully, filled my tin basin, and instructed me in the art of cleaning it. The dirt is clayish, red in color, full of pebbles, some of them as large as paving stones. You see but little of the gold until you have washed the dirt all away, which is done by a rotary motion, which allows the muddy water to slop over gradually. When the remaining water becomes clear you see at the bottom of the pan what appears to be black sand. It is emery; and on pouring off the water and moving the emery with your finger, you discover bright particles and scales of gold. Generally the settling is dried, and then the emery is blown away, and with it often some of the finer grains of the precious metal. So I carried mine home with me as it was, determining to use quicksilver in its separation, and to send you the result of my half hours' labor. Unfortunately, however, after I reached home, it was put into a champagne glass with the quicksilver and left to amalgamate on the side-board. The servant, not looking particularly at it, supposed the glass was dirty and washed it with the others. Probably it would not have amounted to over $2 worth. As I had seen enough to determine me to form an association by which the business of washing might be organized to make it very profitable, I arranged to return immediately to San Francisco. It would not be right, however, to take unceremonious leave of Captain Sutter to whom I have not even introduced you. Ere this you have undoubtedly seen his name in the paper, and have perhaps heard something of the history of this enterprising gentleman from —. A Swiss by birth, he held during the reign of Charles X. the rank of captain in the French army. He purchased the buildings at Ross, just north of Bodega, of the Russians, and as he proposed to settle the wilderness to the north of the Bay of San Francisco with European immigrants, the Mexican government made him a grant of eleven leagues of land on the Sacramento river. When he went to take possession of this property the portion of the country where it lies had never, I believe, been explored by the Californians. He reached it by launch from Yerba Buena (now San Francisco), manned by four Kanakas (Sandwich Islanders) and accompanied only by a few Mission Indians. After landing he camped, surrounded by hostile savages, in the open plain where the fort was afterward built, and the next morning after dressing in full uniform, he went, accompanied by his Indian servant, both well-armed, to the Indian village in the woods near by. The savages were informed through the interpreter that he came to them as a friend, and that if they would help him a little with their work, he would make them presents; and at last, showing them a colored shirt, he induced one of them to say that he would come next day and work a week. Fearing, as he took leave, that they might attack him in the rear, he got the chief to go ahead of him, and show him the way out of the woods, and reached his camp in safety. 'Twas several days before the Indian made his appearance. But at last he arrived with others, and all of them were set to work to make adobes, of which the fort was built. It is a parallelogram in form, with two bastions. In the middle of the square is a building two stories high, containing four rooms, and a counting-room up stairs. A blacksmith's shop, mill for grinding corn, serape manufactory, and dwellings are around it, built against the walls of the fort. The Californians, when they at last ventured into the Indian country, were surprised to find a castle there, and asked the Captain what it was for; he answered, "to protect himself from the Indians." At one time he had a well-drilled force of thirty Indians within its walls, with guards posted night and day for its defense. Although he has not performed his part of the contract with the Government, which was to induce European immigration, it has not seen fit to interfere with his possession so firmly established. The fort has been a refuge for our people. No one reached it without being fed and lodged, and employed in the various projects which the Captain always has on hand. Not being systematic and prudent in carrying them out, his business has been going behind-hand for some time past. He still owes the Russians for the Ross property, which he was to pay in wheat; and all the merchants in San Francisco for goods, tools, etc. In figure he is of medium height, rather stout, but well-made. His beard is round, features regular, with smiling and agreeable expression; complexion healthy and roseate. He wears his hair close cut, and his moustache trimmed short, à la militaire. He dressed very neatly in frock coat, pantaloons and cap of blue, and with his gold-headed malacca in hand you would rather suppose him prepared for a saunter on the Boulevards, than a consultation with Simphon, his Indian alcalde, about hands required for the day's work, or ox-teams to be dispatched here and there over his estate. I passed the evening of my arrival, after supper was over, in his company, partly in talking over business long unsettled, but mainly in listening to his account of events transpiring. We did this over wine distilled from his own grapes, which was very palatable. His manners are polished, and the impression he makes on every one is very favorable. I left him in the sincere hope that he may derive, at an early day, from the mines or the increase of his property, what will enable him to pay off all his debts. I had an unpleasant trip of six days in our launch, or launches; for the first one I was in grounded, and I thought prudent to change into another passing at the time.

July 22, 1848.—We are interested in a gold-washing machine which can but succeed. It is built on a plan brought from Chili by admiral Wooster, late of the Chilean navy, a native of Connecticut, and he takes part interest in it. Dr.

F—, also, has a share. The machine is expected to wash three or four pounds a day. This place is almost deserted; so is every town in California as far south as the news has reached. We are about petitioning Congress for a mint. Coin is very scarce; it is much needed for duties at the Custom House. Although so many have left, we managed to assemble a sufficient number for a ball on the night of the Fourth by sending for the señoritas in all the country round. The last news from Mazatlan was not at all peaceful, and the squadron will remain there until September or October. When will the government open a way of communicating with us? Your last letters were dated January; this is too long to wait. The storekeepers are actively employed from early morn till eleven at night. Their customers are a strange looking set, made up of Californians, trappers, Oregon emigrants, and a very few late from the States—all from the mines, ragged and dirty, having perhaps landed from launches which came in during the night. Each man has his little bag of gold, and buys blankets, boots, shirts, fine tooth combs, and soap, paying the prices asked without question, and promising to return, after cleaning and feeding—to trade. They have from $500 to $5,000 apiece. Vessels are beginning to arrive from the Sandwich Islands, Peru, Chili, Canton, Manilla, and the States, and many of them must remain for a while, as the crews all leave for the mines whenever they have a chance to desert. The United States soldiers—regulars and volunteers—are leaving in bands, and not a few of the officers are longing to follow them.

XLVII.—An Ancient Toast.

"I drink to one," he said,
"Whose image never may depart,
Deep graven on a grateful heart,
Till memory be dead—
To one whose love for me shall last
When lighter passions long have passed,
So holy 'tis and true—
To one whose love hath longer dwelt,
More deeply fixed, more keenly felt,
Than any pledged by you!"

Each guest upstarted at the word,
And laid a hand upon his sword,
With fiery flashing eye,
And Stanley said: "We crave the name,
Proud knight, of this most peerless dame,
Whose love you count so high."

St. Leon paused, as if he would
Not breathe her name in careless mood
Thus lightly to another;
Then lowly bent his head, as though
To give that name the reverence due,
And gently said: "My mother!"

XLVIII.—The Playmate.

The pines were dark on Ramoth Hill,
Their songs were soft and low,
The blossoms in the sweet May wind
Were falling like the snow.

The blossoms drifted at our feet,
The orchard birds sang clear,
The sweetest and the saddest day
It seemed of all the year.

For more to me than bird or flowers,
My playmate left her home,
And took with her the laughing Spring,
The music, and the bloom.

She kissed the lips of kith and kin,
She laid her hand in mine;
What more could ask the bashful boy
Who fed her father's kine?

She left us in the bloom of May;
The constant years told o'er
Their seasons with as sweet May morns,
But she came back no more.

I walked, with noiseless feet, the round
Of uneventful years;
Still o'er and o'er I sow the Spring
And reap the Autumn ears.

She lives where all the golden year
Her Summer roses blow;
The dusky children of the sun
Before her come and go.

There, happily, with her jeweled hands,
She smooths her silken gown—
No more the homespun lap wherein
I shook the walnut down.

The wild-grapes wait us by the brook,
The brown nuts on the hill,
And still the May-day flowers make sweet
The woods of Folly Mill.

The lilies blossom in the pond,
The bird builds in the tree,
The dark pines sing on Ramoth Hill
The slow song of the sea.

I wonder if she thinks of them,
And how the old time seems—
If e'er the pines of Ramoth Wood
Are sounding in her dreams.

I see her face—I hear her voice;
Does she remember mine?
And what to her is now the boy
Who fed her father's kine?

What cares she that the orioles build
For other eyes than ours?
That other hands with nuts are filled,
And other laps with flowers?

The winds, so sweet with birch and fern,
A sweeter memory blow;
And then in Spring the vöcées sing
The song of long ago.

And still the pines of Ramoth Hill
Are moaning like the sea—
The moaning of a sea of change
Between myself and thee.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 31, 1878.

Stocks again are booming all along the line. Millions multiply on paper, and everybody rejoices. The street is lively, money is in demand, real estate feels the impulse of an occasional transaction, cheerful faces have taken the places of the doleful mugs that have for these last few months greeted us on the streets. Dry goods stores are doing a better business, and half our thread-bare friends have doffed their old, seedy coats, and spring hats, and come out in brand new suits. Either there is more credit or more coin, we do not know which; confidence and currency are about the same thing. This stock business is something exceedingly curious. There are no new discoveries, that we have heard of, on the Comstock. No new dividends have been declared, but there are new prospects, new hopes, bonanzas in expectation, developments looked for; and all at once the dark clouds of hard times roll away, the bright sun of prosperity shines out, banks give up their treasures, old red trunks under the bed pour out their coin, stockings and hiding places and savings banks give up their accumulations, and everybody is happy. We are a little suspicious that this is a deal and not a discovery; that the servant maids, mechanics, and clerks are to be milked again; that the hook is baited to catch the grain crop; still we know that our advice won't be taken; no one's advice will be taken in stocks. Everybody gambles. Utah is going to $200. Union Consolidated will be worth $500 a share before spring. There is a pool in Sierra Nevada that will send it to $1,000. Flood is bearing California and Con. Virginia to buy them in, and then they will go back to old figures. Hale & Norcross has a bonanza flooded with water; Chollar will take a leap in a few days. Yellow Jacket has got it sure. Now is the time to go in; a homestead sold now or mortgaged may realize a large fortune before spring. Nothing venture, nothing have. Any one that has ever lost before in stock gambling should embrace this opportunity to get even. Look for your money where you lost it, is the thing to do. Money in a savings bank produces only 8 per cent. a year interest. If you happen to strike it you can make a fortune. Just think; Flood, Mackay, Fair, Sharon, Lent, Skae, Barron, Finnegan, Cook, Morrow, Keene, Baldwin, Graves, Jones, Hayward, Barton, and others, were once poor men, and now see where they are! We rejoice at this turn of fortune's wheel. Out of it we will get a new crop of millionaires; and if there is anything we do absolutely delight in, it is rich men. More new houses on Nob Hill, more villa residences in the country, more new carriages in the Park, more nice entertainments, with pâté de foie gras, truffles, champagne, and two-bit cigars, at somebody else's expense. San Francisco will, in time, become a city of palaces and princes. We hope none of our readers will allow this opportunity to go by without risking what little they have accumulated, to secure for themselves an ample fortune.

It seems almost too bad that the Bank Commissioners should just at this inopportune moment make their report on the Clay Street Bank, and after a careful and painstaking examination declare that it is solvent and well managed; that its securities are ample; that its losses by Pinney were carried to profit and loss two years ago, and that an unimpaired capital of $500,000 is a guarantee to depositors against loss. Such a report as this is calculated to renew confidence in savings banks, locks up eight or nine millions of money in land securities, and takes away from depositors the excuse to withdraw their money and put it in stocks. It is evidently a bull movement in the interest of real estate.

Farmers should hurry up their crops, get their grain to market, and realize their money upon it as soon as possible. It is of course not improbable that as the season advances the market may advance in Liverpool, and by holding they can realize higher figures; but this is not to be considered if the farmer proposes to invest his earnings in mining stocks. We are now on the eve of an immense deal. Every one that goes in early when stocks are low, and sells when they advance to the top figures, will make money. The prudent farmer who desires to avail himself of this opportunity of enriching himself, so that he may be able to leave his retired country life and reside in San Francisco, will let his mortgages remain unpaid from this crop, and not expend his money in farm improvements and agricultural implements, when he can bring it to the stock exchange with such a certainty of profitable investment.

A writer in one of the Eastern magazines has been severely criticised by our city press for pronouncing universal suffrage a failure. The sand-lot brigade wants a government by the people and for the people. But if that was all the idle and discontented needed they should rest satisfied, for ours is preeminently such a government. The people is the substratum on which it rests, and if the superstructure is unstable the fault must be in the people. The agitators from England, Ireland, and Germany have realized on this continent all they ever dreamed or hoped for in the way of government; still they are not satisfied. They were voiceless in the governments they were born under, but here they are invested with all the rights and privileges of freemen. Do they exercise those rights to their own advantage or that of their fellow-citizens? The sand-lot mutterings answer that question in the negative, and go far to show the incapacity of the people for self-government. If they understood their rights they would have no grievances to redress. And this brings us to the question of universal suffrage. In our municipal governments is it not a dead failure? Does not every intelligent citizen and every newspaper editor know it? But they have not the independence to confess it. The newspapers might lose subscribers, the politicians votes. The writer in the magazine was evidently controlled by no such motives. The bankrupt condition of almost every city in the Union is proof positive of the utter failure of universal suffrage in city government. In other countries, where none but tax-payers have a vote in elections, the result is that stealing, jobbing, dirty streets, and unflushed sewers are the exception, not the rule. San Francisco is the rendezvous of the lawless, the idle, the vicious, the bodily and intellectually lame, sick, and blind of the whole Pacific Coast. These classes toil not, neither do they spin. They are maintained at the expense of the industrious, with whom they have no feeling in common. They have no interest in good government, yet they control our elections. We can not expect a change for the better in city affairs as long as the non-tax-payers outvote the tax-payers. Let the Solons about to assemble at Sacramento embody a clause in the new Constitution disfranchising non-tax-payers in municipal elections, and a reign of prosperity will assuredly come to our now mis-governed city.

A friend of ours, holding an honorable position at the San Francisco bar, gives us the following piece of interesting information. We were discussing the question of the disposition of the estates of our rich men, and the writer was complaining that so few of our wealthy men gave largely to the endowment of public institutions. Our friend then said: "I am now being consulted from time to time by one of our millionaires and instructed to examine the law with reference to the disposition of what, if his life is spared, will be a most enormous accumulation. The gentleman is now not far from fifty years of age; he is in good health, lives a temperate life, comes of a long-lived race, and promises himself to retain his business faculties to the age of eighty years. At that time he will be worth (according to his calculation of the increase of his present wealth by the compounding of interest and by the actual employment of a part of his capital, not less than $120,000,000. His idea is to pay the then debt of the city of San Francisco. It is now some $4,000,000, but if Spring Valley water works are purchased, or if, as in his judgment, the city should own its own water and gas works, the municipal debt he figures at the time of his death will be, say $20,000,000. He will have purchased and will own the entire bonded debt of San Francisco at that time. This debt he will cancel, and leave the balance of his wealth, say $100,000,000, so invested in government securities that its interest will pay all the annual expenses of the city government except salaries. Salaries shall as now be raised by taxation; this in his judgment will secure the selection of the best men for office and those who will most economically administer municipal affairs. The fund will increase, he says, as the city increases, and if prudently administered will preserve the citizens for all time to come from any other municipal tax than is necessary to pay the salaries of its officers. It will provide a sufficient fund for streets, parks, and public places, and enable the authorities to beautify the city in the highest degree, and thus make it one of the most attractive of all cities upon the American continent. 'My monument,' he says, 'shall be the gratitude of coming generations, who live in a beautiful city, where they have no taxes to pay, and where every public edifice, every delightful drive, every pleasing comfort, shall remind them of my name.'"

An ill-natured and irreverent Bohemian writing for the Washington City Gazette thus satirizes Grant and his aspirations for power. It is a hit at San Domingo. The suggestion is to acquire the Samoan Islands, establish a kingdom there with Ulysses for king, giving to him the following gentlemen for his Court and Cabinet: "Prime Minister, Baron Belknap; Chancellor of the Exchequer, Hon. A. R. Shepherd; Measurer-General to His Majesty, Baron O. E. Bahcock; First Lord of the Samoan Admiralty, Rt. Hon. Secor Robeson; Minister of War to His Majesty, Baron Rufus Ingalls; Lords Commissioners of Woods and Forests, John O. Evans and Hallett Kilbourne; Keeper of the Privy Seal, Hon. W. J. Murtagh; Groom of the Stole, Hon. A. M. Clapp; Equerry in Waiting, Baron John Russel Young; Goldstick in Waiting, Rt. Hon. Richard Harrington; Puffer General to His Majesty, A. Dam Bad O; Men at Arms, McDonald, Joyce, Avery, Clephane, Sylph, and numerous other patriots." It is possible—we say possible—that Grant may be monarch of a broader realm and ruler of a greater people. It is possible—we say possible—that he may be a third term President of the United States, and, having thus broken down one of the traditions that seemed to guarantee the permanence of republican government, may work the initiative of a change that shall not end till the United States of America shall drift away from the simplicity of democratic form to something more in accordance with that of all existing European countries. It is possible—we say possible—that our present republican institutions may be improved upon, and that it would not be an unmixed evil to eliminate from our institutions some of those ultra democratic features which our politicians delight to magnify and our stump orators delight to dwell upon. Somehow, there seems to be a growing conviction among intelligent persons that the government and political organization of England, after nine centuries of progress and natural development, is very nearly as good as that which our beloved forefathers improvised upon the borders of a wilderness to govern a cluster of colonies. There is developing in our midst a sentiment that the elective franchise is abused and prostituted in the hands of the idle, the ignorant, and the vicious; that the judicial system, as in practice among us, does not secure the highest learning, the purest morals, nor the men of most incorruptible integrity; that the jury system, grand and petit, is abused, and is likely to be abused; that the legislative councils of our Nation are not, under our present arrangements, filled by the higher intelligence and the purer patriotism of the people; and hence, it is possible—we say possible—that the future may be pregnant with important changes, and that one of the first steps in that direction may be the election of General Grant to be President of the United States for the third term. In that event the Samoan Islands must look for another king.

The man who will take 20,000 acres of land, unproductive for want of water, bring water to it in sufficient quantity for irrigation, and divide it into one thousand parts, and so dispose of it that an industrious man with a working family may go upon it, and in time acquire the title to it, making of it a home for himself and family, will have builded for himself a monument loftier and more enduring than that of James Lick with his observatory, his baths and bronzes, or Michael Reese with his $50,000 library, or A. T. Stewart with his memorial church of marble and stained glass windows. A thousand intelligent, industrious workmen, with a thousand families in a thousand cottages, with orchards, gardens, and vineyards upon a thousand twenty-acre allotments, is a spectacle which any man might be proud to look upon and say, "This is my achievement. In the centre of such a colony he might plant his monument of bronze or marble, but the inscription of his achievements or his virtues would be stamped upon more enduring material. There are in California a hundred great land owners, men of enlarged ideas, who, if they would turn their minds in this direction, would acquire vast fortunes that no poor man would envy them the enjoyment of; would acquire a fame that would not dim, but grow brighter as fathers told their children the tale of their early struggles and blessed the name of the generous man who helped them. Such enterprises would solve the labor problem, would illustrate the communism that Christ preached, would answer the question of what to do with our boys, and would lay broad and deep the foundations of a government anchored in the virtues and intelligence of a moral and industrious people. The State that rests upon the men who till the soil they own has a perpetuity that no revolution can disturb. Intelligence, industry, and ownership of land, are the rocks against which the gates of hell shall not prevail.

The newspaper that allows its columns to become the medium of distributing police news is by a distinguished lecturer likened to a common sewer. An apology should be made to the common sewers for a comparison. Sewers are necessary and indispensable for the purpose of carrying off the cumulative filth, while news journals of the kind alluded to gather the offal of police courts, the detail of crimes, the sensational recital of immorality and vice, for the purpose of distributing it through society.

AFTERMATH.

It is interesting to observe that a number of the public writers of this country have been dreadfully scandalized by the cable dispatch narrating the decapitation of the miscreant Hoedel for attempting the life of the Emperor of Germany. The manner of his taking off is variously characterized as "brutal," "disgusting," "medieval," etc., and one imaginative journal describes it as "despotic" and "monarchical." To the unaided human intelligence it is not quite apparent why it is not as merciful, and at the same time effective, to lop off a criminal's head with a sword or ax as to half pinch it off with a rope. We believe it to be the cleaner and better method, but if hanging is good enough for our contemporaries we shall not advise a change.

Mr. Beecher may not do as much good by his preaching as his admirers believe, but he had at least one notable success in quickening the conscience of a sinner. When his relative, Mr. William C. Gilman, was detected in his long course of forgeries and straightway confessed the crimes he could no longer conceal, Mr. Beecher "improved the occasion" to preach an eloquent sermon on the salutary effect of confessing sin. In the congregation, closely veiled, sat a lady who by copious weeping gave evidence of being deeply moved. This penitent little reprobate was no other than Mrs. Tilton, and she never rested until she had made a clean breast of her sin with Mr. Beecher—who at once published her as a liar and had her expelled from his church. He had preached "not wisely but too well"—had "builded better than he knew."

A local daily journal gravely asserts that the opal is a stone of ill-omen. Such absurd superstition in this age of reason is a disgrace to journalism: nothing brings such good luck as the opal if worn upon the left hand.

In a car of the overland train, the other day, two elderly gentlemen occupied the same seat, and one of them, fancying himself too warm, rose and threw open the window, the other, of course, vehemently protesting. A heated altercation ensued, and when it had lasted about half an hour with much exertion by the one to close the window, by the other to keep it open, the train stopped at a station, and there was a suspension of hostilities. When the train started again the battle recommenced. Just as the belligerents seemed about to come to blows a quiet person, who sat near by, arose and said: "Gentlemen, this is a most interesting controversy, and each of you maintains his argument with the intelligent firmness that his comfort demands; but permit me to point out that during the temporary armistice at the station you inadvertently changed sides. It was you who opened the window, and you, sir, who wanted it closed." When they remembered that this was so a great silence fell upon them, and they hated the peace-maker with a quiet intensity that transcended expression.

Our good Presbyterian clergymen do not seem to be quite in accord upon a Sabbatarian law. We would suggest that the old Scotch covenants, the Blue Laws of Connecticut, and the Puritan rules of early New England, be consolidated or crystalized into an iron code, be printed, and that our clergymen of the Congregational denomination just try it for a year, and see how they like it themselves. The writer had a grandfather who was a Presbyterian deacon, a godly man, and pious. He began to observe the Sabbath at sundown on Saturday, and if by any accident he did not feed his pigs on Saturday before the sun went down, those pigs went hungry all the Sabbath day. This was hard on the pigs, and the pigs thought so themselves. The pigs squealed.

The good grandfather gave his family cold brown bread and cold baked beans for Sunday's breakfast. The morning service at the meeting-house stretched out to seventeenthly. The recess brought a meagre lunch of caraway-seed cookies, and a Sunday-school that gave long chapters of Bible lessons to learn by heart; an afternoon sermon of awful length, and a dreadful, tedious, melancholy, fearful drag till the sun went down, when, with a bounce and a whoop, the children thanked God that Sunday was over, that it came but once a week. They hated God, and Sunday, and religion, and sermons, and progress, and Bibles, and preachers, and deacons, and Sunday-school books, and one of them resolved that if he ever grew up and edited a paper, he would proclaim emancipation from all this senseless and bigoted stuff, and rebel against the unchristian teachings of a smileless Sabbath.

In ten years the city of Boston has expended for the poor nearly $9,000,000. The result is a permanent pauper class increasing from year to year. San Francisco has no pauper class, and if its citizens will provide a working fund, giving to every workingman the choice in winter to earn a dollar for eight hours' labor on a public park, it will, at the end of ten years, have the finest parks of any city in America, and have no vagabond class to support. Our benevolent ladies made a mistake last winter that should not be repeated this. Free meals encourage the tramp and idler to come from all parts of the State to join the innumerable caravan of bummers in the city. Let charitable ladies look out for poor women and children, and give them relief at their houses. The woman who busies herself in providing indiscriminate lunches for the idle poor may be suspected of motives other than charitable. If the ladies will look out for the poor of their own sex, their duty will be accomplished. We would deal with paupers without sentimentality. Work and bread for the willing; punishment for the idle and vicious.

An enthusiastic admirer of Henry Ward Beecher triumphantly asks us how, unless he be a great man, great orator, and highly esteemed, can he come to San Francisco and draw such audiences of intelligent people. And we answer: How is it that Denis Kearney can lecture at Faneuil Hall, in Boston, and travel through the East, drawing immense concourses of people to hear him speak? To be famous is one thing; to be notorious is another thing.

By "pooling our issues," Kearney probably means nothing more than that we are to fling them into "the filthy pool of politics." And then, we suppose, this celestial creature, like the angel at the Pool of Siloam, would come down and "trouble the waters."

The ARGONAUT office. Enter colossal and warlike man, scowling. He protrudes his arm with last week's issue of the paper in his fist: "See here, Mr. Editor, what the devil do you mean by this paragraph about me?" Facetious friend of ours, who happens to be occupying the editorial chair while awaiting the editor's return from luncheon, takes the paper, solemnly peruses the paragraph and mildly inquires: "Do you find this offensive, or in any way disagreeable, sir?" "Yes, I doooo!" "Ah, very sorry, very sorry, indeed; always willing to correct such oversights as this." So the facetious friend picks up the scissors and gravely cutting out the paragraph returns the paper with an engaging bow and a smile of angelic sweetness.

The New York editors have struck out something bright and original in the way of making one another unhappy, without violating the decent amenities of impersonal journalism. They nominate each other for Mayor, and nothing is in better taste than a dispassionate review of a candidate's personal history and antecedents, and a severely minute analysis of his mental condition and moral character. There is, we should think, no other city in the world where the press is so exacting with regard to the qualifications for municipal office, and at the same time so sensible of human fallibility.

Mr. O'Donovan Rossa is confined to his bed by his legs. While traveling in Canada recently he was informed that at the next station was an assemblage of those hardened characters who believe in law and order and support the existing government. The great Fenian prudently left the train (which was making at the time some thirty miles an hour) and received such injuries in the legs that it is feared that when his forces join battle with the Dominion troops he will be unable to run away.

Mr. Lawrence Barrett, it is said, will not appear, on the stage with a woman who is attired in "tights." In deference to the scruples of this unusually sharp-sighted man most actresses are willing to leave them off.

Some benefactor of his race has invented, and is selling in New York, a "tidy" button. It is covered with plush of any desired color to match the furniture, and inserted with a corkscrew shank. If this useful device is not already in this market we implore our local philanthropists in the upholstery line to have the goodness to put them on sale at once. Then when a man rises from an easy chair with a "tidy" adhering to his back it can be neatly fastened there instead of being left to fall off in the street.

Mr. Troy Dye turns out to have been, at one time, the Superintendent of a Sunday-school, a man of exemplary piety and religious life. He then became a butcher, then a saloon-keeper, then an office-holder, and finally a murderer. His course has been ever onward and upward. Young man, begin at the bottom of the ladder.

Jones meeting Smith remarks: "I've struck it rich, my lad—reg'lar bonanza!" "What is it?" "Found a place where I can get first rate beer for five cents a glass. Save twenty dollars a month, clean!" "Why, that will go a long way toward paying your rent." "Rent? Do you think I'm so timid an operator? I shall put the twenty right in, and make the whole thing or lose every cent."

President Hayes has given utterance to the heretical sentiment that "the intelligence of the country ought to govern it." This is a direct blow at the Democratic party. It is a declaration against the sand-lot. It is the expression of an opinion that the 4,000,000 of enfranchised negroes are not to be trusted as the governing class.

Orvil Grant says that his illustrious brother now sees Babcock "in his true light." He can now afford to.

Mr. John Sherman, the Secretary of the Treasury, is a truly representative American statesman—not over honest, yet conscientiously devoted to the interests of the country where these are not in conflict with his own, which, in turn, he will on occasion subordinate to those of his party; a shrewd, hard man of business, practical in practice, sentimental in sentiment only; having, withal, a glib facility in the kind of pious cant which is not offensive because evidently not intended to deceive. Mr. Sherman's "record" is about as bad as the average, but if the Potter Investigating Committee do not succeed in "showing it up" and actually proving him to be as unscrupulous as we all know him to be, and are satisfied to have him, he will probably retire with honor at the end of his term, leaving the Treasury a good deal better off than it would have been without him, himself being a good deal better off than he would have been without the Treasury.

These remarks are suggested by Mr. Sherman's address to the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce. The speaker began by congratulating his audience on the largest crop ever gathered in this country "since the world was born," and piously ascribing the credit to "the bounty of Divine Providence," a civility which no doubt every rascal among them vigorously applauded, and which we think entirely proper. He informed them that we were paying off our national debt at the rate of one hundred millions a year, a statement that he knew to be false, knew that his audience knew to be false, and knew that they knew he knew to be false. But it sounded well, and there is no good reason why he should not have made, in his character of entertainer, an assertion which, in his character of finance minister, it is his duty, and no doubt his pleasure, to constantly refute. Our unwritten code of political morality is broadly tolerant of lying if it produce the effect of a dash of light on a sombre canvas, and our Secretary is one of the most picturesque of all harmless liars.

It is curious to observe in Mr. Sherman's speech how fixed is the prudent habit among politicians of toadying the press. Alluding to a Cincinnati newspaper, which had an unpleasant way of charging him with all the bankruptcies of the country, and divers other villanies, the complacent statesman, with perfect seriousness and from the mere force of habit, described it as "an able and influential journal," a bit of politeness like that of the general who civilly mentioned the opposing forces as "our friends, the enemy," or that of the parliamentary orator who alluded to "the right honorable gentleman who lied about the revenue."

The Call goes in for the cultivation in California of the Egyptian lotus, by eating which men lose the love of home and friends, and are content to dawdle away their lives in a condition of dreamy indifference. But we don't need any vegetable diet to make us scorn a country in which the Call is published.

What we can't quite understand is this: When a reader sends us "the inclosed article," the publication of which "will increase the sale of our paper by five hundred copies," why he does not arrange with the Business Manager for that number of copies at carriers' rates and sell them himself at ten cents each, pocketing the difference.

A New York paper tells a rather bad one on Mr. Levy, the cornet player, whom the ladies of the San Francisco adored in their pre-Rignold-Montague days. While "out of town" for good reason he received a delicate note: "I met you at Brighton Beach recently, and your glances gave me courage to address you. I am a married woman, and, therefore, cannot invite you to my house. Will you meet me on Monday morning, at 10½ o'clock, at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Eighteenth Street?" Mr. Levy gallantly kept the appointment, and was promptly served with a summons by a Deputy-Marshal, from whom he had long been hiding. But his bold decision of character was equal to the emergency—he took to his heels and legged it up all manner of streets till he got away.

In one of the few articles which he did not bodily steal from this paper, the editor of the Boston Courier solemnly explains that the selfish propensities are uppermost in California.

When Admonition's hand essays
Our greed to curse,
Its lifted finger oft displays
Our precious purse.

Senator Spencer, of Alabama, declines to become a candidate for reelection because his private interests require his entire attention. One of the reasons why we shall be glad to see him out of the Senate is, because when he was in it we thought his private interests required too much attention for the public good.

"I vos meet mit an occident yesterday, Yawcup. I dakes mine dog Kaiser on dot warf to drown 'em, but shleep mineself in and he bulls me owet und safe mine life." "Dot vos a goot lesson to you, Hans." "Yew, yaw." "I vos game no more: I dakes de dog und zhouts 'em."

OLLA-PODRIDA.

What an absurd little fantastic tea-pot of a city is San Francisco, after all. It simmers, and comes to a boil, and boils over, and cools off, and runs at the spout, and does all the things that our old nurse's little britanna tea-pot used to do. When company was coming and there was to be a tea night among the gossips of the village, the little tea-pot was conscious of its own importance. It puffed steam at the nose, its lid danced up and down, it was replenished and emptied, it listened with a wise silence to the most suggestive scandals, it would bubble and hiss at the slightest provocation, and, in its own opinion, it was a wondrous little tea-pot. It was full of self-conceit. It was too far away from tea sets and silver urns, and other more pretentious vessels, to have its self-importance wounded by the idea that any other tea-pot was its equal. It was the best tea-pot of the village, and in its complacent self-satisfaction, it did not know that there were any other villages in the world, or any other, or different, or larger, or better tea-pots in them.

San Francisco calls itself a city; but a city it is not. We delight to style ourselves cosmopolitan; cosmopolitan we are not. A cosmopolite is a citizen of the world, one whose home is in every place and who is attached to none. We have no such population. Now and then a stranger comes and goes; now and then are seen in our streets the strange garb of some foreign person; but the great bulk of our people are fixtures; some are fossils. Ours is a great, gossiping country village, smaller than a city, larger than a hamlet. Everybody knows everybody; everybody knows the business of everybody else; good society has only one circle; business men are all cogs of the same revolving machinery; the city has only one centre where loungers and loafers meet, only one place where business converges. Its press are cats and dogs in the same basket. Its politicians flounder in the same filthy pool. The real fact is we are the smallest small potato of a city in the United States of America. This comes from our isolation; we are so far from the world's great centre, so removed from the great throbbing arteries of trade and commerce, that we have but little in sympathy with the bustling, active world in which we do not live. Ours is a little side eddy in the great rushing stream of life where, like chips and bottles and apples, we swim around each other in eddying circles, exclaiming, "Behold, how we apples swim!" Every shower is a storm, every breeze a tempest, every agitation an earthquake, every incident a sensation. We go from the depths of despair to the dizzy heights of over sanguine expectation; to-day we are in the doldrums, to-morrow on tiptoe with exultant hope. Stocks are down, real estate declines, business is dull, and long-visaged mourners go about the streets. Stocks go up, real estate advances, business improves, and in anticipation the town smokes two-bit cigars, every gambler buys a fast team and drives to the Cliff. Like children we are tickled with straws, like school girls we are scared at ghosts. Some small scandal will amuse us for a day, but there is no scandal so small that it will not ripple through the whole circle of society from centre to circumference. One little sensation succeeds another in quick succession, each sufficient for the time to absorb the entire attention of the entire town. When we are in the dumps we are the bluest of the blue, and think that San Francisco is going to be desolated and ruined by Frazer River, Goat Island, or Oakland; when we are not, we boast in tones of loudest exultation of our future glowing prospects, of the trade of the Orient, of gold and grain, of inexhaustible resources, of wine and wool, of huge vegetables, of a climate where flowers bloom every month in the year, of the apple and the pine apple, the olive and the vine, of milk and honey, and all is coulour de rose.

Anon, the great corporations are going to gobble us up. The Central Pacific Railroad Company is expending its money and its energies grasping the trade of the East, the commerce of the Orient; building northward to Oregon, southward to Arizona; determining, with iron rail, to span the continent, uniting the Pacific with the Gulf of Mexico, the commerce of Europe, the agriculture of the valley of Mexico; bringing from all these sources and distances all the vast business of these empires now beyond us, in order to destroy San Francisco and ruin its people. The press, in discordant unison, howls its dismal prophecies of distress, and proclaims us the destined victims of a grasping and soulless power that has the senseless indiscretion to crush the community upon which it lives, and kill the goose that lays in its nest her golden eggs. Then the moneyed power is to destroy us, and the men who gamble on California Street, and milk the servant maids and tailors' apprentices of their gains to penetrate the hearts of mountains and drag out the hidden treasures of the mines, are held up to public scorn and scalped. Because men will gamble, we are alarmed at a business that snatches wealth from the rock-ribbed hills, and hides it in iron vaults, or wraps it up in national bonds.

Then the water works business is destined to drown us all in the extravagance of its costs, and the tyrannous nature of its exactions. The newspapers set to digging artesian wells on paper and sinking the augers of their dismal prophecies deep down into the fears of our oppressed people, and we are educated to the belief that, as cleanliness is next to godliness, and water is necessary to cleanliness, we have a right to steal the property of the Spring Valley Water Company. Why not steal a soap factory as well and thus make our salvation sure? And then the little municipal tea-pot boils over on the sand-lots, where a soapless gang of foreign idiots giber their senseless slang against republican institutions, against free government, and against the hospitalities of a nation that gave them rescue from pauperism, and lifted them up from bogs and huts, from starvation and military servitude in their native homes; that clothed them with sovereign rights as American freemen and presented, to them the opportunity of a boundless empire of free lands. Even this band of worthless gypsies frightens us, and the community springs to pick-handles, with its military enthusiasm aroused and its warlike ardor excited, to resist the breath of garlic, the smell of Limberger, and the fumes of whisky and the dardene.

We shall be glad when San Francisco gets out of her long slumber, gets over her infantile diseases, has outlived the follies and indiscretions of youth, and begins to assume the dignity of a genuine, resolute manhood. We shall rejoice when she gets large enough to stop boasting, and so populous that everybody will not think himself charged with the responsibilities of everybody else's business; when good society is something more than a clique; when exclusion from one set will not be felt as exile; when business shall become so extended and classified that business men shall be content to confine themselves to their own affairs; when the press shall have the resolution and strength to exhibit some independence and individuality. We shall delight in that coming time when a municipal government shall be able to deal with its vicious and idle classes without fear of politicians and demagogues. We shall especially rejoice when a sufficient number of our rich men shall have gained enough to retire from active business and become a conservative element in the community. We pray for the hastening of the time when twinges in the toes, flatulence in the stomach, pains at the base of the brain, sleepless nights and nervous derangements may admonish our millionaires to lay down their poles, get out of the persimmon orchard, and give somebody else a chance. This time is coming; our consolation is that we are young and can bide it.

San Francisco is just now going through the experience that comes to all new cities, but it is going through more rapidly than most of the other great cities of the world. It is growing, not steadily, for no city advances with unchecked progress, but spasmodically; to-day slowly, to-morrow rapidly; a year of depression, a decade of advancement, but all the time moving steadily onward to become one of the great commercial cities of the world. The causes and sources of that prosperity are as infinite as the oceans, as boundless as continents, as enduring as the hills. It is the ocean and the continent, the plains and the mountains, that underlie that growth. It is the commerce of the Pacific, the fruitfulness of half a continent, the exhaustless treasures of eternal hills, that invite the restless energy of labor and reward the daring adventure of capital.

The Masonic Bank may go into liquidation, the Clay Street may call in its loans, Epstein & Co. may fail, Consolidated Virginia peter out in its lower levels, money grow scarce, times grow hard, real estate values decline; the railroad may oppress with fares and freights, the water company with excessive rates; taxes may be high and rents be low; these and all other vexations are but temporary, only tempests in the municipal tea-pot, to be followed by prosperous days. San Francisco has a destiny beyond the control of millionaires, of mine or railroad, of gamblers, grumblers, editors, politicians, and sand-lot adventurers.

If Henry Ward Beecher was a pulpit orator who had come to California to get up a Christian revival; if he had taken only his staff to tramp across the plains, leaving purse and scrip at home, that he might preach the gospel to all unbelievers; if he was on his Divine Master's business, and came to snatch us as brands from the burning, to warn us that the wages of sin is death; if, like Peter the Hermit, he came to preach the rescue of the holy sepulchre, we should feel the embarrassment of subjecting him to criticism. But, as he came like a circus, with his bill-sticker in advance, and charged us a dollar and a half to see the show, we feel quite at ease in submitting him to the same candid analysis of motive and the same estimate of powers as we would the theatrical star, the gifted tenor, or the most bewitching of prime donne.

Would it not sound funny if we should hear that St. Paul had gone from Jerusalem to Damascus for coin? But then Henry Ward Beecher is not St. Paul. We overcame a prejudice against this most famous of preachers and went to hear him. Our prejudice is not altogether based upon the fact that he is a preacher, or that he is famous; and yet we admit that in our judgment preachers and priests should only be famous for their piety, their learning, their pulpit eloquence, their zeal in their holy calling, their usefulness in a spiritual way to their sinful fellow-mortals. If religion is anything, and the ministry is aught but a money-making industry; if the soul of man is immortal and destined to a life beyond the grave, the happiness or misery of which depends upon the acts of this life; and if clergymen are the elect and chosen of God to become the teachers of men, and by precept and example to point them to the narrow way that leads to infinite joy beyond the grave, then indeed theirs is the grandest calling, the noblest mission, that an infinite God gives to man. If we accept this estimate which clergymen themselves put upon their profession, we have a right to regret the fact when politics, ambition, and money-making draw them away from their holy calling.

That the reverend Henry was the victim of a brutal conspiracy of mean-minded men and women, who undertook to blackmail him for coin, we have believed. Whether he was guilty of the crime alleged against him or not, it seems the veriest nonsense to inquire. That the investigation of this alleged offense should have engaged for months the attention of a legal tribunal, the talent of the ablest lawyers, the interest of Christian men and women, and absorbed the press of the nation, is one of those marvelous conundrums that no sensible mind can ever possibly find out. That this trial was public is the crime of the age; and, should Henry Ward Beecher live as long as the Wandering Jew, with the religious fervor of Savanarola, the eloquence of St. Paul, the innocence of the apostle John, he can not undo the infinite wrong and demoralization that that nasty trial wrought in the youth of the nation. He could have prevented the publicity of that trial by rising in his seat and saying: "May it please your Honor, I desire that spectators and the reporters of the press may be excluded from this court-room, and that in the interest of public morals this trial may be conducted in secret." He did not do it. He sat and smiled, accepted bouquets, received the congratulations of his friends through the long, wearisome, and nauseous details of a trial that made innocence blush throughout the nation.

We have heard the Reverend Henry Ward Beecher deliver his lecture, "The Reign of the Common People." His voice is not melodious, it is clear and distinct; his manner is not impressive, it is easy and self-possessed; his diction is not elegant, it is common and simple; his imagination is not brilliant, and he did not display any oratorical pyrotechnics. He exhibited no poetry, made no flights, and no effort at elocutionary display. His theme was not an original one, there was not an original idea expressed in it, and he gave no utterance to any thought beyond the conception of an ordinary mind. He was earnest, at times forcible, and at no time uninteresting. His comments upon workingmen seemed to us harsh, cold, and unsympathetic; his estimate of the honesty of all public men, statesmen, professional men, artists, and the common people, cynical and suspicious of every man's honor, integrity, and patriotism. He suggested nothing for the improvement of the age, except in a general way to uplift the mass by education, and clearly admitted that the result of that education had been of but questionable success in the experiment of representative government. His argument was illogical, inconclusive, and to those of his audience who did not feel themselves listening to the oracle of a god of their own idolatry, unsatisfactory. Mr. Beecher is a man of superficial learning, but versatile talent. There are but few men in the nation more generally informed upon all questions, or who can better discourse upon a variety of topics. For thirty years he has held his position in a pulpit distinguished for the character and learning of the men and women who gather around it. He is beloved, esteemed, and honored by those who know him best; so far as we know he has been only traduced by the vicious and bad. During the war he did the country eminent service; his patriotism is admitted. Of his large earnings he gives largely to the poor, and benevolence is claimed as one of his distinguishing virtues. All these things, all these excellent traits of character, we concede him.

That we have written our estimate of this distinguished gentleman at all is due to a conversation of two friends drunk with Beecher, who claimed for him, in the enthusiasm of their partisanship, that he was the greatest, purest, best, most learned, most eloquent, most logical, most benevolent, most patriotic, most—take in all the other good adjectives—of men. As an orator we should not compare him with Tracy, Baker, Starr King, and others whom we might name. As a thinker we would not put him upon the same plane as Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, Harrison, Darwin. As a lecturer, if we had not known that it was the Reverend Henry Ward Beecher to whom we were listening, we should have thought that a dollar had been a fair price for admission. In religion he agrees with Ingersoll that an honest God is the noblest work of man. His religious belief is liberal, sensible, and consistent. He has thrown off the shackles that bind the ignorant mind and fetter intellectual freedom. He interprets the Bible in consonance with science, and makes the Christian faith keep step with the progress of the age. He is bold, daring, and resolute in the enunciation of what he believes to be true. He follows his reason. He thinks. Upon the whole, we have written ourselves into the conviction that the Reverend Henry Ward Beecher is, after all, a pretty good man, for a preacher.

To Sophie.

My light-winged yacht flew over the sea,
A sea that was blue, neath opaline skies;
Fair were the waves and the wind it was free,
And sailed my boat as the sea-mew flies.

Sailed I for Ind for gems or for gold?
Spread I my sails amid Fortune's fleet?
Nay! With a heart and a hand, too bold,
I steered for the haven your breast holds, Sweet.

LE PREMIER AMOUR.

O charme des premières illusions, fraîcheur du sentiment, naïve jeunesse des desirs, vous passez comme le songe du proscrit qui rêve le soleil de la patrie absente! Qu'ils sont rapides ces jours si beaux que l'on nomme le temps des peines. O amour, quand la vieillesse vient dessécher le cœur, flétrir l'imagination et désenchanter la vie, si l'homme te regrette, c'est moins pour tes derniers plaisirs que pour tes premières faveurs.

Les femmes vont plus loin en amour que la plupart des hommes, mais les hommes l'emportent sur elles en amitié.—La Bruyère.

L'âge où les femmes sont encore femmes ne saurait se fixer; il dure autant qu'on les trouve aimables et qu'elles sont aimées.

L'amour ne se gagne que par l'amour. Si donc vous voulez être aimés, aimez d'abord vous-mêmes.—Sénèque.

Il n'y a point de femmes à qui il soit plus aisé d'être vertueuses qu'à celles qui manquent d'agréments.

On n'est point l'ami d'une femme lorsqu'on peut être son amant.—Balzac.

—Il importe peu que les amants s'aiment avant de se connaître, disait un jour M. de B., mais les époux doivent nécessairement se connaître avant de s'aimer.—Allons donc, dit Champfort, s'ils se connaissaient la plupart ne se marieraient pas.

La politesse est l'expression ou l'imitation des vertus sociales.

Dis-moi ce que tu manges, je te dirai qui tu es.—Brillat-Savarin.

La fierté est la pudeur de l'infortune.

L'amour rend chastes les plus voluptueuses jouissances.

Tous les plaisirs sont dans la jouissance, il n'en est pas un dans l'excès.

—Allez vous placer là-bas, disait au spectacle une dame à un de ses adorateurs, et quand il sera temps de sortir, je vous ferai signe (cygne). —Oui, mais à condition que vous serez Léda, répondit-il.

ADVICE GRATIS.

Do you mean what you say? Did I hear aright?
Were you in earnest or in sport?
In love with a poet? Are you quite
At odds with sanity, to assert
That you, with beauty, and wit, and grace,
Instead of the station these might buy
Have smilingly set your feet and face
Toward paths where such low choosings lie?

A poet—a maker of verses—one
Who daily coins, for his daily bread,
The blood of his heart in rhymes that run
His brain to fever with fear and dread,
Lest that he mar, in speaking it,
The tone of the Voice that comes to him
Somewhere out from the infinite,
Somewhere out from the vast and dim.

You need not answer; I know your thought.
You tell me that, since there must be those Whose lips, like the throats of birds, are wrought
Chiefly for singing, it follows close
That God, attuning them to such pitch,
Accepts their songs for service—thus Making our sneers at a soul on which
He has laid his pressure perilous.

And this in a sense is true. But this
Is also mystical; we should take
The world in the gross; we must not miss
Of ease and elegance for the sake
Of dreams and dreamers; and I opine
It would strike fresh heat in your poet's
If you dropped some aloes into his wine—
They write supremely under a curse.

Will that invisible Truth of things
Which shines on your minstrel compensate
The lack of the visible comfortings,
The tangible gifts and goods that wait
On stocks and dividends? Which are best—
These vagabond inspirations, or
Hard cash in hand, and the sense in the breast
That you have gained what you bargained for

It is good, no doubt, that a man should be Cast in such weird and singular mould
As dowers his vision with power to see
God's splendors flaming, where you behold
Only the flaring of lighted gas;
But with a husband we demand
(Letting the gift of prophecy pass)
The coin that is current in the land.

Therefore I should advise you, dear,
To give your lyrical vagrant such
Sufficient hint of a prudent fear,
As—without wounding him overmuch—
May serve to smite his insistent hopes
Down to levels of lesser range;
Sending him back to his crowding tropes
Wiser and sadder for that change.

The Dead Bird.

"I saw some one kill a bird, and the world lost a song forever."

O little queen of bird-land,
Slain in the midst of a song!
A region of quavers and trills,
A region of blossoms and trees,
The murmur of passionate rills,
The music of infinite seas,
The love of the sun and the noon,
The peace of a star and the night,
Trill-flutters that swell to the moon,
Song-waves whose fringes are white,
Noon-bugles, star-voices, out led
In a victory-song, far heard—
All these lying dead, lying dead
In the broken heart of a bird;
For dead is the queen of bird-land,
And slain in the midst of a song.

NILES, August 5, 1878.

Recess.

The little folks have now recess,
In merry groups they play;
Once I, whom sorrows now oppress,
Was light of heart as they.
As gay was I in years gone by,
Though very sad to-day.

I close the tome of ancient lore
And rest it on my knee;
Sweet voices and gay laughter more
Of pleasure bring to me;
To me they bring youth's golden spring
And joys that used to be.

Life's Summer-time is on the wane,
Its fire is burning low;
Winds sweep the hearth, and lo! again
The dying embers glow.
They glow, they blaze, and bygone days
Come back from long ago.

The weary book aside I fling,
I stretch my arms apart,
And youth and love on spirit wing
Come fluttering to my heart.
Ah, nestle there, ye happy pair,
And nevermore depart!

Love's Trinity.

Kiss me!

It is the first, placid and pure as prayer;
Tender as kisses of saints in heaven are.
Peaceful as God's own smile; angels above,
We, too, have entered heaven—O love! O love!

Kiss me!

It is the first, which is of earthly dower,
Holding the flame and strength and passion's power.
O whirling world! we blot you out with this,
And make us gods, and crown us with a kiss.

Kiss me!

It is the first, which bears the cross of pain,
The cross that from the heart shall never lift again.
Kiss me! O God, it has the bitterness of hell!
Kiss me! It is the last—it is farewell.

OUR BITTER HALVES.

"We can call these delicate creatures ours."—Shakespeare.

Dog-Seller: "That 'ere animal's the real stock, mum, and dog cheap at twenty dollars." Young widow: "It's a sweet, pretty darling, black and white; but, in my present state of bereavement, you must procure me one entirely black. This will do very well for half mourning in about six months."

When the rich widower arrived with his two children, and servants, and horses, and equipage, etc., our stylish young lady was fully prepared for an attack upon them all. It was just after sunset when she came upon the piazza of the hotel with a volume of Taine in her hands. She looked at no one, but seated herself in the most graceful of attitudes, and in the very best light, and buried herself in the brilliancy of this great and persistent candidate for the French Academy. She was dressed in a gauzy black robe, all flecked over with old gold. Her black silk stockings were embroidered in gold tints, and her pretty little slippers did their very best for her delicate feet that refused isolation under her tie-back. All other ladies were costumed in white muslin with many ribbons, frizzed, or waved, or curled coiffures, but the stylish young lady. Oh! she knows but too well the powerful effect of contrast. The widower's pretty little daughter was wandering up and down in front of her, but the child was apparently unnoticed. (Oh! wasn't she?) Her little white dress and black sashes fluttered not in the eyes of the wise actress. (Didn't they?) By and by the heavy volume of Taine slipped from her hand, at the exact moment—by accident, you know—and it fell upon the little feet of the passing child. If you could have heard the purring sorrow, the sweet soothings, and the tender apologies, all mingled with flattery to the really unhurt child, while the father stood by endeavoring to say that it was of no consequence at all, which, of course, it was not, as the little one was laughing, and liked it, and also have seen the eloquent, upturned face of the stylish girl as she said to the father, "Pray permit me take the little one to its mamma and make apologies to her," you would have exclaimed, "What great genius is lost to the dramatic world while this young woman performs for only limited audiences." While I am writing (and the volume of Taine fell only five days ago), I look from my window to see him lift the stylish girl into the saddle for a gallop with him through the twilight upon one of his own superb horses. She never looked handsomer than in her riding-habit upon a fine steed.

It is the fashion nowadays for young wives to wear for a necklace a yoke of tinkling bells, so that when they go to pastures green their hubbies may trace them to their browsing grounds. Some fashions have homely precedents.

The late Miss B—, of Newtyle, Scotland, was an enthusiastic admirer of the Free Church. Sometime before she died she posted a letter, containing a five-pound note, with the following address: "To the Church of Christ, Edinburgh," meaning thereby, of course, her own denomination. A few days afterwards the letter was returned to her, with the startling announcement marked on it, "Not to be found."

She is a daughter of the gods, divinely tall and most divinely plump. Stupid, too. She is singing the popular piece entitled, "I Wish I Were a Bird." "If you were," thinks a guest to himself, "you'd be served with apple-sauce and sage dressing."

A graceless scamp who writes for the Baltimore Every Saturday, confesses that he has a sinful habit of going to camp-meetings and capturing kisses from presumably godless young women while the brethren and sisters are at prayers, and that he likes it. He'll get converted some day if he does not keep away from such places.

Ladies' long boots with a series of horizontal straps from the instep upward are called "Jacob's ladders." We really cannot imagine why.

A correspondent in Constantinople has been peeping into the seraglios, and of course "knows all about it." He says that while some of the Serailis are refined, others delicate and interesting, and all moderately pretty, there is one class who seem to have been made by the devil for the torment of the eunuchs. These are called Deli Serailis, wild, wanton and ungovernable. It is only necessary for one of them to know that anything is bad to at once make up her mind to do it. Walls, sentinels, scimitars and eunuchs are all in vain. They laugh at locks and bars, and flirt in spite of imminent death if found out. If, as is said, love's sweet favors be dear in proportion to the danger of the theft, then certainly a Deli Seraili must find flirtation heavenly.

Speaking of Turkish women, it is to be observed that while it is doubtless an exaggeration to aver, like Lady Mary Wortley Montague, that they are in all ways more free than Europeans, Signor de Amicis, who has recently written of them with keen judgment, instructed by long and close observation, assures us that whoever has been at Stamboul cannot but laugh when he hears them spoken of as slaves. Ladies, when they wish to go out, order the eunuchs to prepare the carriage, ask no one's permission, and come back when they please, provided it is before nightfall. Formerly they were obliged to submit to the company of a eunuch or female slave or friend, and if any woman appeared alone in an unfrequented street, some policeman or rigorous old Turk was sure to accost her with, "Whither goest thou? whence comest thou? why art thou alone? is this the way thou respectest thine effendi? return straightway to thine abode." But now they go out alone by hundreds, and are seen at all hours in Mussulman suburbs, and in the Frank quarters. Nor is there any sign of a man accompanying or following them, nor would any now presume to accost them, even when quite unprotected.

A woman named Jardine has just died in Scotland, aged exactly one hundred and eleven years. But she was a true woman for all that, and declared on her death-bed that she was but one hundred and ten years and eleven months.

A FEW FROGS FOR BAIT.

One day they wanted some frogs for bait. They found some boys.

"Bring us," said the tourists, "some frogs. Bring them to us this evening, fresh and alive, for we would fish on the morrow."

And the boys spake unto them: "How many frogs would they want?"

And they said: "Go to; bring us as many as you can catch."

For they wist not that the boys were lightning on frogs. And the boys were astonished, and marveled within themselves, and said: "So many?"

And the tourists were wroth, and entreated the lads roughly, and said:

"Yea, so many. Up; get thee away, for the day waneth."

And straightway the lads got up and got.

And it was so that the two fishermen sought yet other boys, and spoke unto them in like manner as they had said unto the first, for they feared there would be no bait for the morrow's sport.

Now, the fishermen desired that they might have twenty-five frogs and no more, but they withheld this matter back from the lads, and said unto them:

"Bring us all the frogs you can catch. See, is here not silver and nickels?"

Now, when even was come the lads returned, and they brought with them frogs. In oyster-cans, in fruit-cans, sardine-boxes, old beer bottles, in earthen vessels, and in tin buckets, in baskets and gunny sacks, in their hats and in their pockets, yea, in everything wherein a frog might be contained brought they frogs, little frogs, fat frogs, lean frogs, old frogs, young frogs, male and female brought they them.

And the fishermen were amazed, and one said:

"Lo! what have we here?"

And the lads spoke unto them, saying:

"Frogs."

And the head fisherman entreated them, saying:

"Lo! Here are more frogs than we want, but we will take them. We will lump the lot at a hundred. Here is silver. Let that suffice thee."

But the lads said:

"Nay; we will count 'em."

And they tallied the tale of frogs, and the number thereof was two hundred and three score and nine. And the people laughed, and clapped their hands, and made merry.

But the fishermen were wroth without cause.

And it was so that yet other lads came in, by ones and twos and threes. And they brought with them, each lad his full share of frogs, so that the like of it had never been known before—no, not on all Lake Minnetonka.

And they counted each boy his frogs, and he said:

"Pay me what thou owest. Lo! is not there the frogs thou hast commanded?"

And they paid them, and entreated them that they would cast the frogs into the lake."

But the lads said:

"Not so. The frogs are thine. Do with them as thou mayest please."

And all the country round about Chapman's was filled with frogs, for it was so that they escaped from the earthen vessels, and the fruit cans, and sardine boxes, and baskets, and the empty beer bottles and gunny bags, and spread themselves abroad over the land. And they lifted up their voice, and made great lamentation, so that no man slept that night.

And the people sat at the windows, and at the gates, and said, with a loud voice: "Blastem!" which by interpretation is, "Frogs!"

And when the morrow was come, the fishers went forth to fish, and they take with them, as was their need, twenty-five frogs. And they used four of them.

But they had paid for three hundred and eighty-seven.

A German editor turned the leisure afforded him by the Easter recess to account by making a collection of mixed metaphors. "We will," cried an inspired Democrat, "burn all our ships, and, with every sail unfurled, steer boldly out into the ocean of freedom!" Justice Minister Hye, in 1848, in a speech to the Vienna students, impressively declared: "The chariot of the Revolution is rolling along and gnashing its teeth as it rolls!" A pan-Germanist Mayor of a Rhineland corporation rose still higher in an address to the Emperor. He said: "No Austria, no Prussia, one only Germany, such were the words the mouth of your Imperial Majesty has always had in its eye."

If there are two women there he sneaks up behind them and tries to wink to the clerk to get his mail. But when one of the women enters into conversation with the official as to the reasons why her magazine has not come, and how long before it will be here, and if he is sure he looked in the right box, the clerk, with his hat down over his eyes and strides out of the lobby in a way that would do credit to a professional trian. The next day he negotiates for a lock-

SAN FRANCISCO, August 30, 1878.

DEAR MADGE:—Do you remember the time we went together to see the Romance of a Poor Young Man? I fancy we were impressible then, and found something romantic in all young men who were poor. Dear me, what a very large section of the population we unconsciously embraced within the pale of our sympathies. I have met hosts of young men since, but have always found poverty more prevalent among them than romance. Jack looks over my shoulder to say that I need not expect present company. What an original remark! But to return to Octave Feuillet's poor young man, I still find him interesting, Madge, but realize that, to make him so, the author, although handicapping him with poverty, makes him an Admirable Crichton and a Marquis. I thought, even in my salad days, that the manner of showing off his accomplishments was something too ridiculously transparent, but it seems even funnier now. They are ticketed off as if he were an auction inventory. In the first act he volunteers to play the piano—a kind offer which is briskly refused by the leading lady in order to tide the leading man over a difficulty. Usually the leading man does not play the piano. There was a time when this would have been an item to his credit, but the days are past when the possession of an agreeable accomplishment qualifies a man, in the opinion of a great many, for the Retreat for Idiots. Some speech to this effect, which would once have brought down the house, falls from young "La Roque's" lips quite unmarked now. In act second young "Manuel" is a horsebreaker. I wondered the other night that, in these days of realistic effects, the stage manager did not introduce a wild, untamed steed, and let Mr. James O'Neill exercise the Rarey taming process upon him. But they forbore realism on this occasion, and gave the scene in the old way. A couple of supernumeraries stamped wildly on the floor in the wings, everybody cheered and hurrahed, and the poor young man entered calmly, with one hyperion look displaced, and shook hands with the old lady as if he had just returned from the next province. In the next scene he is an artist. We were not permitted to gaze upon his sketch—another realistic effect lost—but every one on the stage leaned over it rapturously and said it was charming. We unhesitatingly accepted the statement. In the next act "Manuel" is a gymnast, and makes a frightful leap of several feet, but comes safely out of the blood-curdling scene. In the next, he performs an act of disinterested generosity, and, in the last, is bountifully rewarded by having a very rude and disagreeable young woman throw herself into his arms and tie herself to him for life. I observe that she does not accomplish this little feat until it is found out that the poor young man is a Marquis, and inherits a few of the West Indies; just how many is left to the prolific imagination of the audience. But, with all its strained and superficial French sentiment, it is clean and wholesome, and has some very pretty quotable sayings. The Romance of a Poor Young Man had such a run in New York at the time of Montague's first season in America, that an actor can not play "Manuel" now without instituting comparisons, and comparisons are always odious to the party invidiously compared. I suppose the first duty of the actor in such a part is to make himself interesting. When "Mme. La Roque" complains, five minutes after he is brought upon the stage, that her new steward is a fine gentleman, when the entire party are completely paralyzed by his air of high breeding, when the group of young women in the background, arrayed in various tints of paper cambric, surround him like a parcel of ticket sellers at an orphan's fair, "Manuel" requires a native elegance of manner quite surpassing in extent to carry out the illusion. Then he must pay some tribute to the picturesque. There is no use in arguing the matter, Madge, dress has a great deal to do with success on the stage. There is no appreciable difference between a lot of people all dressed alike; that is to say, of course, excepting in the treasures of the mind; but people do not go about with diamond drills looking for treasures of the mind. They are content to judge by the face of the prospect. In the wood scene, for example, in the Romance of a Poor Young Man, you must remember how much that velvet morning coat and picturesque cap had to do with the sylvan harmony. A man sketching in the woods, in gray trousers, and frock coat, and a big six, is an anomaly. Some people do not mind these things, but you know how it is with "us girls," Madge. The eye must be satisfied first, and then the understanding. In justice to O'Neill, I must say that he did not wear a big six. He wore no hat at all, and, in this climate, one could not help thinking that he was exposing himself to influenza and neuralgia, to say nothing of earwigs and other trifles. His poor young man was really a very agreeable, manly, and spirited fellow. In fact, O'Neill plays it well enough to play it very much better, and make the part his own, if he will. But, he wants to study a thousand of its little possibilities, for oh, how many pretty little points he did miss which I looked and waited for in vain. You know how often, Madge, some little thing introduced by the player impresses itself upon your memory forever after as a material part of the play, and you really feel as if you had been defrauded of your right if some other player of the same part fail to give the same little touch of fancy. What a really excellent company they have at Baldwin's, and what a meagre return the public makes for all their efforts to please. Ah, well! the reaction must set in some day soon. I hope the management will not have become disgusted by that time and reduce the standard as John McCullough did. I am very much afraid that is what it will end in, for Mackay and Louise Sylvester, the very pick of the company, are going away, and they have not spoken of replacing them. Mrs. Sylvester, this week, quite reveled in the part of the lachrymose "Aubrey." She arranged her hair in four corkscrew curls on each side of her face, after the fashion of ancient maiden ladies a half century ago, and accompanied this extraordinary coiffure with a harmonious toilette. To the toilette she added a most lugubrious expression of countenance, a low comedy snarl, and a wail of weeping which may not have been strictly according to the canonical rules of art, but which invariably brought down the house. To bring down a house when their apparent sympathies are several degrees below zero is a feat. Rose Wood played the haughty "Marguerite." She is a very natural actress, a perfect mistress of comedy, but she always falls short in the stronger situations. Perhaps it is because she is natural in them too, for of course people never do go on in real life as they must do on the stage to make a scene. How funny it would be if they did. Fancy us all going about the world striking attitudes after the ancient models, and expressing our feeling by Rush's or Russell's rules of elocution! Rose Wood, as usual, indulged in a superabundance of looks. She is too small a woman to wear such a bale of hair, and too pleasant to look at to disfigure herself thus. I wish she would not, but she will, and I find my eye enchained against my will by that great swinging braid when I should be studying her face, which is delightfully expressive. They have replaced Mr. Home by Mr. Bradley, a most acceptable change. It is not pleasant to sit through a long evening contemplating what looks to be a case of semi-strangulation. I used often to find myself wishing that some one would loosen Herne's necktie. Miss Annie Adams played the governess, and seemed to have seized the opportunity to rehearse for a star engagement of "Lucrezia Borgia." It was really quite dreadful. I momentarily expected to hear her assure everybody that they were all poisoned, but she did not. That dear little fresh-natured child, her daughter I believe, had a few little lines. What a pity it will be if she ever becomes like other stage children. How I like to see Mrs. Farren play the grande dame. She is a very stately old lady, and has such nice, old-fashioned ways. In fact the Romance was very well cast and very nicely played, and if the scenery was rather miniature in some parts it served the purpose very well. At the California they have been giving a remarkable drama, called Birds of Passage. The gentleman who wrote it appears to have followed in the wake of some operatic company, who saag by turns either light opera or opera bouffe. He has picked up a number of characters and incidents, grouped them, Americanized them thoroughly with dialect, idioms, and slang, and called the conglomeration a drama. As an instance of the delicate quality of his taste I must tell you that the heroine, a strolling singer of the Perichole pattern, falls in with the Viceroy of Mexico—I can not say in what period of Mexican politics the play is located—and lie, being struck by her beauty, invites her to dine. She accepts the invitation with all the alacrity of the species. The Viceroy plies her with champagne until she gets gloriously tipsy. At a later stage of the play it transpires that he is her father. To say the least, the old gentleman would look back upon this earlier scene with very mixed feelings. Poor Maggie Mitchell! she is so often a foundling in the drama that I should think she would find a deep-seated satisfaction in carrying around her own baptismal certificate. She tried very hard to carry on her tiny shoulders the weight of Birds of Passage, but it was too heavy for her. Also, it was unworthy her consideration. I can imagine that even a professional reader can mistake the fate of some plays, but I can not imagine any one reading Birds of Passage and thinking that any rational audience of fifty people would ever sit it out. If any one ever did sit it out, I think he, or she, either must have fallen asleep, or been completely crushed by the sublimity of its stupidity. Truth to tell, Madge, Maggie Mitchell's style and plays have had their day. To succeed she must take a new departure, like Alice Lingard, who has passed through all the stages successively from highest burlesque up to modern tragedy, for they tell me she is a tragedienne now, and plays "Mary Queen of Scots." I wonder if she plays it with the Frou-Frou drawl. Perhaps if Maggie Mitchell had opened in Jane Eyre, or Fanchon, it would not have been so easy to count the chairs every night. Well, her doleful season is past, and next week Robson and Crane will be here with their new play—Our Bachelors. We shall have a good laugh once more, and I hope there will be people enough there to give a hearty ha-ha, for the laugh of a thin house has in it something of the ghastly hollowness of a demoniac revel. Also, next week we are to have Olivia at Baldwin's. Strange what an interest this hapless daughter of the Vicar of Wakefield rouses at this late day; and, stranger yet, that this simple, rural English story should be filtered through French imagination to become dramatic. They seem to like it everywhere, too. It is running yet in London, where Miss Terry's "Olivia fachu" has set a fashion. There's a triumph, indeed. In New York Fanny Davenport is playing it to crowded houses, although the newspapers publish her birthday about twice a week. I trust Rose Wood will have good luck with it here—but she will be obliged to create the part, while Fanny Davenport paid three guineas a night to sit and study Miss Terry in London; so she says. Dear Madge, have you heard of the production of Zapha? I suppose all the people who are playing in it feel as if they had died and gone to heaven—the heaven of an engagement. Only an intermediate Paradise perhaps, but acceptable, for there are many of them who have not had one for a long, long time before. I fear this week will preclude some of them getting one for a long, long time after. I was going to tell you all about Zapha, but, on second thought, I will spare you until we meet. The pen is inadequate to express it all. We continue to hear nothing more of Kennedy's theatre than that they have put backs to the seats. That, in itself, is a comfortable announcement, but it is not enough to open on. Wise man! he is waiting till the Fair closes, and meantime whetting our curiosity by letting us know nothing. This is a new kink in theatrical advertising. I will let you know how it works when the house opens. For the present, adieu. Yours, BETSY B.

We have received a printed circular reading as follows:

"You are hereby required, in the name of the Uncommonwealth of California, to appear before the Folly Court, holden at the Bush Street Theatre, within and for the County of San Francisco, on Friday, the sixth day of September, 1878, at eight o'clock in the evening, and from hour to hour thereafter until the action hereinafter named is heard by said Court, to give evidence of what you know relating to an action of Amusement, then and there to be heard and tried between Gus Williams, plaintiff, and Ben E. Fit, defendant."

If this is an invitation to go somewhere, we decline with thanks; if it is a command to do something, we won't; if it is a bill, we paid it last week. In the "action" obscurely mentioned, our sympathies are with Mr. Fit.

Speaking of Nilsson (says a writer in the London Truth), I was grieved to learn from her that America has run away with all her earnings; so that she has to recommence coming money with her voix d'or. It is almost good news for the musical public, which is guaranteed by this necessity from any defection from the stage it might have dreaded; but it is hard upon the poor little woman, who must now sing for her supper.

EXCITEMENT.—We noticed quite an excitement in front of Messrs. Dames & Hayes' photograph gallery last evening. It seems the firm have been devoting some time to perfecting the art, and succeeded so well that they have "astonished the natives." The new designs and elegant effects they have just placed on exhibition at their door are perfectly exquisite, and fascinates the crowd as it passes along, eager to behold. Very good taste is displayed in their mode of taking children's pictures. Some are sitting in a boat, sailing on a miniature lake, dotted with pond lilies; others are enjoying the pleasure of a cool swing in the wood; and others, after wandering about till they are tired, have seated themselves on an old log to enjoy the refreshing shade on a summer afternoon. In fact, every picture is a scene of ease, comfort, and pleasure. The exterior and interior decorations for ladies and gentlemen are perfect. We understand they have applied for patents for many of them.

The "illustrated catalogue," published by Mr. Herrmann, the well-known hatter, is quite a work of art in its way. It is surprising how much character and expression a good artist can put into the picture of a hat. Some of those in this book have as much individuality as human faces; and if one were to take a pencil to draw heads below them, one would necessarily follow certain imaginary lines, and produce a face in perfect accord with the hat, determining the type. The book has a literary value, too; it is full of pleasant things, all variations of the one theme—Hat. The next best thing to having a nice hat is to have this catalogue.

It is said that the prophet is without honor in his own country. The same may be remarked of the jeweler. We go by the Diamond Palace every day; we see in its beautiful show window revolving gems and jewels of rarest beauty; we see the cheerful countenance of Col. Andrews, and say to ourselves, "fine store," "fine jewelry," "clever man, Col. Andrews." We note the effect of the mirrors, and stroll carelessly along, not reflecting that this very Diamond Palace has nothing like it in any city in the world. The New York Graphic, sending its artist to do San Francisco, lights upon the Colonel's show windows, and thus writes of Col. Andrews' Diamond Palace: "There is no institution, among the many constituting a nucleus of attraction in this beautiful city of the Pacific, so imposing in its arrangements, rich in its contents and rare in its collections, as the 'Diamond Palace.' Nor is there, in the world, a similar establishment. Eligibly located, on a leading thoroughfare, it is literally walled with mirrors, arched and frescoed in costly oil paintings, by a foreign artist of distinction, ornamented with crystal chandeliers, with reflectors attached, and set off with floors inlaid with black and white marble, like tessellated pavements, and wood work wrought in ebony and gold, with the most tasteful figures in relief. But no description can photograph its magnificence or convey a conception of its displays of elegant jewelry, of original and striking manufacture. Col. Andrews' exhibit at Paris is said to be unequalled by any other display. It is known as the great quartz casket, and has already received an offer of a fabulous sum for its purchase. It has been so much talked of by connoisseurs and written about by correspondents from the Exposition that any detailed account of this chef d'œuvre would be superfluous. It is pronounced a gem of the rarest cunning and artistic handicraft. It is universally conceded at the Exposition to be a superb specimen of jewelry, and is continually centering crowds of admirers. It is rich and massive, and in these, as in other regards, is considered without a parallel in the world. Many thousands of pieces of rare quartz and rich ores are introduced into the casket, forming a solid whole of tracing, arrangement and disposition of minerals of extreme beauty and uniqueness. It certainly establishes Colonel Andrews' priority in the line of master jewelers. No one visiting San Francisco should fail to see the Diamond Palace."

THE DANCER.

He met her at the picnic,
He melted at her glance,
And he murmured sadly in her ears,
"Dear heart, I can not dance."
Now the green shadowed woods resound
With airy foot of sunny France;
In many figures over the ground
The youths and maidens prance.
But who is he, far down the glen,
Who eyes this scene askance?
Who shuns the eyes of maids and men?
'Tis he who can not dance.
Not dance? Yet see, behold him there!
Observe him leap and prance;
High climbs he in the empty air
A wild, weird, fiendish dance.
He leaps, he kicks, he slaps his legs;
Ah, ha! His wide, wide pants
Are full of fifteen thousand times
Ten thousand thousand ants.

The nose appears to be a rather reasonable and accommodating feature, easily estranged but readily reconciled, as many circumstances will prove. Sir Leonard Floravanti, of Bologna, states that, when in Africa, he saw a quarrel between a Spanish gentleman and a military officer, in which the latter struck off the nose of the former, and it fell in the sand. The surgeon washed it in warm water, carefully replaced it, bound it up, and at the end of eight days found it perfectly healed. Tallacutus records a similar case, in which a man, losing a nose, left it in the gutter while he pursued his opponent. On his return the nose was applied, and adhesion followed. Dr. Bartholmey records the case of an officer at Lyons, in 1815, who had the end of his nose cut off in a duel. He put the severed portion in his pocket, kept it warm, returned home, and sent for a surgeon, who replaced it, and adhesion followed. Dr. Reynault gives a case in which a nose adhered after it had been bitten off and kept in the owner's pocket for five hours. Garengot, a celebrated French surgeon, asserts that he has seen a nose, which had been bitten off in a quarrel, thrown upon the ground, and allowed to cool, taken up, fixed to the face, and made to adhere again; and he records in his third volume that M. Gallo produced a similar union, when a large portion of a nose had been bitten off and spit out into a dirty gutter. The soldier who had lost it pursued his adversary, and the nose was replaced on his return. On the fourth day the union was complete. Blegny, Lombard, Loubet, and others, record similar cures where noses have been lost by sabre cuts. Time is of considerable importance in this matter: the nose must be replaced before it has formed another attachment.

To possess a brooch in the shape of a reptile of some sort seems to be the ambition of every well-directed young lady; out-stretched lizards and coiling snakes, made brilliant with powdered garnets or some other sparkling substance, are the most acceptable novelty of the kind.

When a fellow's entangled
By a girl that is bangles;
If she smiles on him once
His hopes are bespangled;
But if he has dangled
On the book that was angled,
When she frowns on him twice
All his joy is bangles. —Doubtful

Stepping into a larger beer saloon which was swarming with flies, on Saturday, a customer asked the proprietor why he did not get some fly paper and catch the insects. His reply was: "Well, you see, ven I gets dot baper und puts it on der gounter dey spile it in five minutes."

"The sun rises in the East," explained the teacher, "Yes, an' there's suthin' rises in the West, too," chimed in one of the smaller boys. "Well, what is it?" asked the school-ma'am. "Injuns!" shouted the urchin.

Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud
When the summer time comes with its insistent crowd
Of flies and mosquitoes and fluttering gnats
That utilize all of our features for mats?
That stab us and jab us and tickle our pates,
That swim in our saucers and bathe in our plates,
That drive us to words with iniquity fraught,
And make us say things that we oughtn't to ought?

ORDERS FROM EUROPE

have increased to an extent, necessitating the establishment of Warerooms in London, England, and connected with it is a Concert Hall, the whole combined making the most elegant Piano Warerooms in Europe, and stands there as a monument of American genius and industry.

It is impossible to mention in the limited space of an advertisement the numerous fine instruments they stand foremost as vendors in Piano building in America, and in that respect, no small compliment to their inventiveness is the undeniable endorsement of all their competitors, as shown in their imitative efforts. Certain principles of the Steinways are however so completely protected, that no imitation or substitute is attempted at all, and the shallow method of crying such inventions down are resorted to and relied upon.

The Steinway designed and perfected the Overstrung and Iron Frame systems. The application of the Agraffe Arrangement to Square and Upright Pianos. The Patent Duplex Scale creating the most beautiful treble tones, (the Duplex Scale is of recent invention and only to be found in Pianos sold recently). The improved Double Dampers. The later ideas extending the Agraffe to every string in the Piano. The highest finish to all parts of the instrument, including first qualities of ivory, ebony, felt, cloth, etc. The wood work and varnish of such first-class character, that the employment of large capital and experience alone permits.

The name of Steinway has become a "household word" in American homes, and the satisfactory record of 18 years' trial on the Pacific Coast, in itself assures the purchaser that the investment is no speculation, but one of perfect security.

The oft-repeated story of rival makers claiming to have been Steinways' foreman, etc., should have no weight with purchasers. An immense manufacturing business like the Steinway's is divided into departments for the various classes of work, and a foreman of one department superintends that alone, and cannot be perfect in other details.

The Steinways (a numerous family) are the inventors and designers of the principles of their Pianos, and are alone responsible for the thorough execution of their own ideas.

In the Machinery Department at the late Centennial Exhibition Steinways were awarded a special medal for an invention for testing their iron frames under a pressure of 8,000 lbs. per square centimetre. (This award was distinct from their medal for the best Pianos exhibited.) The iron frames in Steinway Pianos are the only ones so tested, and while other makers rely on castings from an ordinary foundry, the Steinways maintain their own foundry, and manufacture a frame of composite metal, which adds greatly to the resonant qualities of the instrument in general.

It frequently occurs that the attempt is made to raise the character of Pianos constructed on less costly principles to the rank that the Steinway maintains, by naming a price, the same or nearly the same. This method is frequently exposed by the perfect willingness of the dealer to make astonishing discounts for cash or extremely long credits; systems not entertained in any first-class business. In selling a Steinway Piano, a guarantee of worth is given protecting the purchaser for 5 years, and catalogues issued by the Pacific Coast Agencies have a uniform rate of prices in gold, and where desired a liberal installment plan is offered to responsible buyers, with an additional charge of simple interest on deferred payments. Mechanics Pavilion, San Francisco, Aug. 28. 1878.

My Dear M — This "Industrial Show" of ours, about which your curiosity has been excited by frequent mention, is an institution, so thoroughly sur generis, that I almost despair of being able to convey to you, any very lucid idea of the concern. Ostensibly the Mechanics Fair, is an industrial exhibit, made to illustrate the progress of mechanical art, and stimulate the inventive mind. Really it is a place of popular resort, at this season of the year, a huge, sheltered promenade, where people pay "four bits a head," to wander about in space, and look at each other. The building is a great barn like structure, covering nearly a block of ground, and noted for its architectural beauty. (see sketch). It is built of wood, and the interior is very open, and unfinished, after the manner of all such tremendous places.

The Pavilion, as it is called, will comfortably hold 50 or 60,000 people, and as many as half that number have been known to patronize the place at a time. The Fair is usually announced for the 1st of August, and lasts from five to seven weeks. At one of the little holes in the Pavilion front, you purchase your admission ticket—or if a customer for the season, you are loaded down with a small bale of card board, subject to bewildering purchases—consideration $5.

But finally you are safely inside—a vast hall with arching beams, and trusses, confronting you. To the left a band of wild musicians struggle frantically. Above are corridors, or promenades, running entirely around the oblong central floor, which is filled with exhibits of general merchandise, artistically stacked in pyramids, and grouped to a rather pretty ensemble.

This sketch gives a good idea of the general view from the entrance — showing the large fountain, leaping to the alarm bell, hung high in the roof above.

You wander about the lower floor for a while, and then mounding the stairway, at either hand, find yourself in a second story, or gallery, filled with lighter exhibits.

This is the popular portion of the Pavilion, being something like a Parisian boulevard, or bazaar annex, and is extensively used as a promenade. Here are located the sewing machines, and the pianos, and the glass blowers, and hundreds of miscellaneous exhibits. On one side is the Art Gallery, filled this year with a collection of pictures by our local artists. The illustrations on the next page, will be better understood by a visit to the gallery itself, and a very careful catalogue comparison.

One of the interesting things to do, is to sit down on one of the benches, running through the centre of the Art Gallery, and watch the indiscriminate throng as it circles about you. It is a funny study - this stream of curious faces
- a running commentary on the community at large, for here you see the proud aristocrat, and the humble plebian, side by side. The sketches I send, are altogether of the character type,
and selected to illustrate the percentage of odd faces one can eliminate, in a short half hour, from the procession that comes through, to take a critical view of the "pretty pictures," as they designate them.

POP CORN

I don't know that it is exactly the correct thing to thus fix the features of people, but you will enjoy it nevertheless - especially the nasal features. The Pavilion noses are some of them very funny, and plainly indicative of the fact, that their ancestors once worshiped in the Temple.

And the faces belonging to these noses, are often as expressive, as the noses themselves. When lighted up with joy, or expectancy, the fact is very apparent - see sketches above - and when the languishing look, and soul exhausting glance, has been repeatedly, generously, but alas! vainly bestowed, vacancy itself could not better tell the mournful tale, than does the pen and ink exhibit herewith presented. It made me unutterably sad, and sick, to see it.

But look here! I have gradually drifted from description, to drivel, and so abruptly shutting off your Pavilion panorama, I remain:

Yours &c.

Mechanics Pavilion Aug 30 1878

My Dear M - With this I send you a view in perspective of the garden, or floral portion of the Exhibition. It is not in the main building, but is a separate structure, just at one side, like a great hot house, only the roof instead of being of glass, is made of canvas stretched across immense wooden frames. This tempers the wind which flows terribly at this season of the year, keeps out the dust that comes flying over the Pavilion in clouds, and gives a quiet, twilight effect to the interior, as peaceful, and soothing, as an autumn evening. Before this canvas covering is put on, the plants and grasses have attained a healthy growth, and blanche but little for ment of the direct sunshine. The garden is prettily laid out. From you enter from the Pavilion there is a kind of terrace with steps leading down to a central walk, which runs the entire length and forms a cosy little promenade.

At the extreme end is a rustic tower, and in <sup>the</sup> left hand corner has been constructed an artificial rock grotto, over which a miniature cascade plunges, and bubbles, in the pool below—that is when the pumps are in working order. In front of the rustic tower, a prismatic fountain tosses up its silver spray, and over the top, a painted perspective lends distance, if not enchantment, to the supposed sylvan scene. Through the grotto, and under the miniature fall, there are passage ways into the Machinery Hall, and in a moment you can exchange the tinkling music of the fountain, for the mournful throat of the steam pump or the continuous and deafening clatter of the diamond drill, and the stamp mill.

All along the sides of the garden evergreen trees have been placed, and they give a very charming effect. Among the prettiest of the exhibits are the two stands of ferns from Woodward's Gardens. They are artistically grouped, are in perfect foliage, and make a delightful setting to the Terrace, on the railing-of which, other of the long-leaved tropical plants are clustered, in vases of elegant and unique design. I give a sketch of one of the many pretty little nooks, with a very funny incident that occurred at the time it was taken of an inquisitive poodle belonging to a lady who had smuggled him into the Fair - deliberately sitting up on his haunches, like a small lion, and staring at the warning board "Keep off the Grass." The keeper literally "fired him out" as soon as he was discovered, and his owner flounced out after him, in a most exasperating frame of mind. - the poodle, never, returned.

The sketch to the right, is of the Australian tree fern, common to many of our gardens, and a beautiful ornament it is. The stem runs straight up like an immense club, and from the top, as from a vase, spring the fern-like leaves, litely tossing like a phantom plume.

At the back of the terrace, and to the right as you enter, Mr. J. Huffy - one of our local manufacturers of rustic wicker - has a fine exhibit, comprising every variety of garden arbor, and hanging baskets, and knotted vases, and stands of wonderful form, and workmanship. The above sketch is a view from behind the huge fan palm - forming the centre piece of the garden - looking toward the Terrace steps. This is a favorite place for the beaux and belles to linger, especially in the evening, when the line of gas jets on either side are lighted, and the immense reflectors throw a perfect glory blaze down on pretty faces, and buxom figures. There is nothing like gas light, and a ball room conservatoire, to show off handsome dress goods; and the fair ones knowing this, always congregate where the proper effects are produced. Nothing is prettier than the appearance of the garden on a Saturday evening, - unless it be the people in it. Here are sketches of some of the old habits <sup>(over)</sup>

Emmy's Shapere

Indus nose

Grassy

Carmilla

Highly combed

Wardrobe

Like the girls the little prismatic fountain shows at its best in the evening. During the day it is quiet, and very lonesome looking, but given the gas light beneath the panes of parti-colored glass at its base, and the shimmer, and sheen of the light from above, and it tosses bushels of liquid diamonds high in the air, and gushes, and gurgles, and makes things generally interesting, for the plants that fringe the pool around, and the dissipated little fishes and reptiles, that have learned to bourn about in the water, half the night, instead of going to bed with the twilight. But with all its beauties the garden gets to be monotonous, and toward the close of the Fair, the grass begins to look sickly, and the invitation to "Keep off" of it is a miserable mockery, for nobody ever thinks of getting on, and the evergreens go into a decline, and things generally get cold, and damp, and dreary, and distressing.

There is just one thing lacking in this wilderness of early green, and that is the rich, warm, colouring of flowers—"the soulless things"

as a celebrated humorist once said,
"that God ever made and forgot to put a soul to."

There are a few waxy looking legume blossoms, and a collection or two of great, big, musty smelling, dahlia's, stuck in the necks of green glass bottles.

Unless, of course, there is absolutely nothing in the way of a floral display, and this in a country of gardens, literally
loaded down with the choicest blossoms,
of tropic, and semi-tropic store.

But as some one practically remarks
"you can always see posies in big bunches on the Oakland boat."

Good argument I hope why they should not be a feature of the Fair. But enough of this.

'Here's Rosemary—that for remembrance"—Accept it?

Yours &c.

The Pavilion, Boulevard Aug 31st

My Dear M. — This is a Saturday afternoon
— a time that I have especially chosen to describe to you, the beauties of San Francisco's great social exhibit at the Mechanics Fair — flirting.

It is by no manner of means a "mechanic art," yet it has its little inventions, and improvements, to display with each recurring season, and with open handed liberality, give to a waiting world, without even the handicap of a patent right.

Everybody appears to enjoy this exhibit amazingly. It is really a study — the most fascinating, and absorbing one, I ever made. There is not much of a crush at the doors just now, but there will be in less than an hour, and in the early evening, a variegated

lital now of beauty, will sweep through the corridors, sweeping many a susceptible, and unsuspecting soul. At present there is not much damage being done, except by the omnipresent sewing machine girls, who are always adept enough in the art, to entertain the few masculines in the hall at this hour — but there are indications of a desperate, and very animated engagement, eye and eye — plenty of them.

Singly, in pairs, in squads of three and four, the fair ones come sailing through the entrance vestibule, dressed in their best, and receive it with the most artistic touches of the toilet. There is no particular attraction at the Theatre; it is not a place for the theatre winds are whirling the dust on the downy lower sidewalks.

... a long come here to see and be seen.

Most of them are un-escorted, but the rest is a couple, piloted by an artist in the art of promiscuousing. That graceful grip of the arm, I am sorry to state, is altogether too common. It suggests that of a policeman, running his reclines in. To reverse the situation don't help the matter either.

Now the corridors begin to fill, and little groups fringe the railing, to watch those who enter below. They are coming in a pretty steady stream, and from every portion of the City — a panorama of pretty faces, and gorgeous hats, and bonnets, and tastefully trimmed dresses, and smiles of all possible dimensions. It is a fine time and opportunity to study styles — not only of dress, but of budding beauty. Here a brunette, rich, and rare in color, with eyes deeper than a mountain pool; there a blonde of the purest golden type. These are the magnificent extremes.

As glorious means, we have the serried ranks, of each — the above being sketches of a few in my immediate neighborhood. No two faces alike in the Pavilion. Some fair, and fat; others lean, classically cut, and severe. Not all of them pretty, but full of character. As evidence of this, see <sup>the</sup> next page.

The little scene at the left, was one witnessed not ten minutes, in the garden - nobody supposed to be looking - and the one to the right, is probably the beginning of a romance, of unknown proportions.

It is exceedingly interesting to watch the progress of these incipient flirtations. The eyes appear to be the storm-chasers, for a closer acquaintance. A simple glance - perchance of curiosity - at the first meeting, a smile, full, and generous the second time around the Pavilion, a simper, and a snicker, at the third accidental jostle in the crowded corridor, and a flirtation is accomplished. "Stuff!" you say. Yes stuff it is; but such stuff is nearly all of us are made of. "Filly!! stupid! disgraceful!" Admitted, but you would be astonished to see the almost universal tendency to be thus complicated.

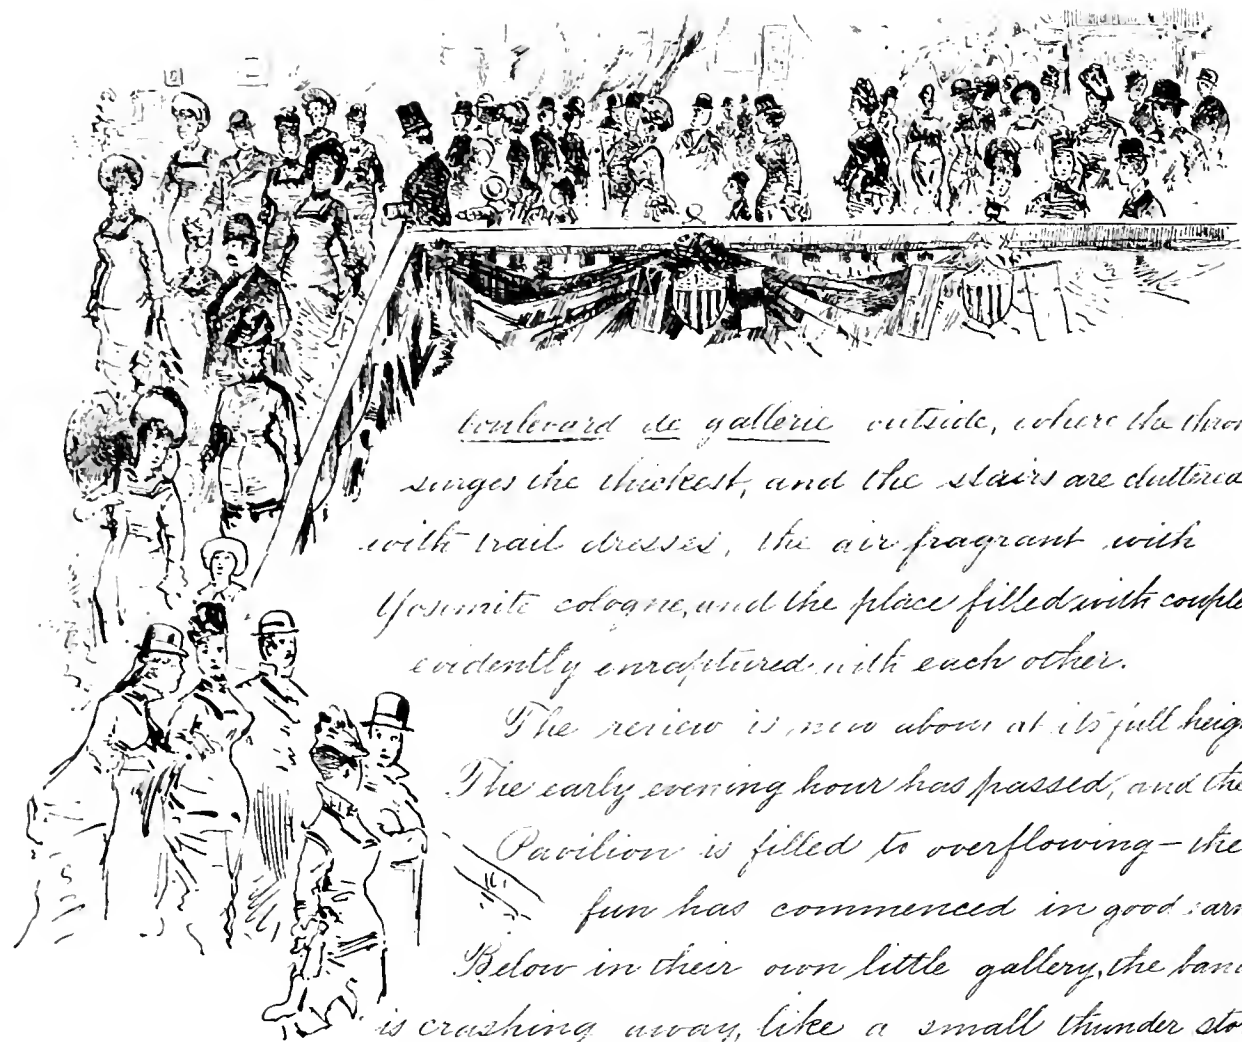

And the pastime "callow brood," I and the middle disgracefully disciples, the chosen and discreet - is not confined to the can assure you. The old aged, are even as disreputable, as the younger. The Art Gallery is one of places for the more sedate - to flirt. The pictures are a most excellent excuse for sentimental conversations, it is quiet, and retired, very much different from the boulevard de galerie outside, where the throng singes the thickest, and the stairs are cluttered with trail dresses, the air fragrant with Upsonite cologne, and the place filled with couples evidently enraptured with each other.

The review is now above at its full height.
The early evening hour has passed, and the Pavilion is filled to overflowing—the fun has commenced in good earnest.

Below in their own little gallery, the band is crashing away, like a small thunder storm.

Thousands of feet shuffle an accompaniment along the corridor above,—the maids—while pre-empted hats
crab, and make short, which drags
getting as many recruits, as it loses its worn out stragglers, and never ceasing till the closing hour is announced favorite and aristocratic prom-those fortunates, who have along the railing, sit, & remarks about the passing its never ending length along,

It is astonishing how precocious the youngsters all are, and how readily they come to the example set by the "children of larger growth."

The two sketches herewith presented were taken from life in the lower floor of the Pavilion, and near one of the smaller fountains. Their parents, or guardians, or who so accompanied them, are in all human probability very similarly engaged — in fact I suppose to know they are.

The above sketch is a quiet afternoon scene, before the crowd gets to be troublesome, and when the young married women, are privileged to visit the Fair — under the protection of their little ones — to renew for the nonce, the memories of many happy, and interesting hours, before matrimony and its requirements, divorced them from nonsense, and the whispering, of soft, and sentimental nothings.

The scene above depicted, needs no particular explanation.

The spirit being as apparent, and self sufficient, as the bearing of the two needlework girls, on the extreme right, who with their hands crammed hard down in their sack pockets, stroll along with the regulation swagger.

The sketch to the left, is the "long," and the "short;" of this whole subject of love—as a broker would say. So you want a terrible ending? I give it in the shape of a howling

Cupid—so sorry that his task is done, regretful that it is begun.

Sincerely and Sentimentally

The Pavilion, Sept. 2<sup>d</sup>

My Dear M— With regard to the different exhibits, I don't know that I can give you any lengthy or satisfactory description. The machinery department— usually one of the most interesting features of the Fair— is very commonplace this year. Of course there is a big, and a little engine, and steam pumps, and brass fittings innumerable, but the novelties are very few, and far between, the only new thing, being a steam mangle, or ironing machine, procured through the patent agency of John L. Boone, 320 Sansome St. The best displays in the Pavilion, are made by some of our wholesale, and retail, dealers in household goods.

The above sketch gives an idea of the display made by Geo. H. Tay & Co., one of the attractions being a sewing machine run by a neat little water power, which can be attached to an ordinary house faucet. Landsberger & Co. also have a fine exhibit of their excellent Champagnes, and IXL bottles, and the Pacific Pottery shows handsome terra cotta, and vitrified stone work.
